The first impulse of the patriotic and reflecting part of the community in every section of the country, is in favor of all supplies which may be demanded by the department entrusted with the direction of the military operations of the government, when a war is flagrant. This measure bears the impress of Executive recommendation, and those who oppose it will be strictly reckoned with. The people will require sufficient reasons. By the theory of our system, our voice is not so much our own, as that of the constituency we represent. I came to Washington expecting to give my support to every such measure as the present, that might be brought before the Senate, and in doing so, I would be responding to the general sentiment of the State, which I in part represent—as that sentiment existed a few months ago. I am proud to have it in my power to say of the people of that State, that they will permit no considerations of party interest or prejudice to embarrass the government in the prosecution of an existing war, whatever objections they may have to its origin, or the motives and objects with which it is waged, unless those objects shall appear mischievous and ruinous to the country. Those objects as heretofore understood, though not approved by a large portion of them, yet as there seemed to be no other mode of terminating the war consistently with the avowed policy of the administration, than by a vigorous prosecution of it, they were favorable to that course. But, sir, since the further developement of the views of the Executive in the late message and other official documents, some of them clearly enough, and others darkly stated and shadowed forth, I must suppose that a corresponding change in public opinion and sentiment upon this subject will follow.

Again, sir, I consider, that to vote for this measure is to approve, to the full extent, the policy of the administration in the further prosecution of this war. To set in silence and to suffer it to pass without remonstrance, would be an acquiescence in that policy, not in the power of those who are now silent, when hereafter the evil is upon the country, to retract or deny. They cannot say that they were not sufficiently forewarned by the administration of what would, or might be the final and momentuous result of this policy.

I believe, with one or two exceptions, the entire Senate has heretofore promptly voted every supply, both of men and money, demanded by the Executive for the prosecution of this war. The Senator from Illinois, (Mr. DOUGLAS,) in his speech on yesterday, insisted that the whigs of the Senate had suddenly changed their tactics, and are now in opposition to their former liberal course. It is my purpose, sir, to show that the administration has changed its policy—that it is no longer what it was twelve months ago.

But, Mr. President, I must be indulged in a few other preliminary remarks, before I proceed to the main purpose of my argument.

I shall not stop to discuss several of the questions which distinguished Senators seem to think of importance, and upon which they have employed much close and cogent argument. I shall not stop to inquire whether the President, by his order to Gen. Taylor of the 13th of January, 1846, intended to bring on a war; whether he ought to have had the sagacity to perceive that such would be the necessary effect of that order; or whether such was in fact its necessary result. I shall not inquire whether Mexico or the United States committed the first act of military aggression upon disputed territory; nor shall I delay to inquire whether the war was constitutionally brought on. It is enough for me that it exists; that it has received the sanction of the legislative department of the government, whatever I may think of the notable device by which that sanction was extorted. I shall not inquire whether the war might not have been avoided; though, I think it might and should. I shall not inquire whether the President was, from the first, actuated by a settled purpose of acquiring territory by conquest; nor shall I examine the circumstances connected with the origin of the war, to prove that it is unjust and iniquitous. If it were so, for myself, I would rather seek to cast a veil over the record, or blot it out forever. But in saying this, I mean no censure upon the course of honorable Senators, or others who take a different view of the question. They doubtless have a deep and abiding conviction of the injustice of this war, and their exalted sense of duty to themselves and their country impels them to proclaim this their honest conviction. But I shall neither seek to fasten this conviction upon my own mind, nor upon that of others. For myself I choose to indulge the pleasing reflection, the illusion, if it be one, that up to this period, at least, no such untoward development of the tendencies of our system has occurred, as that the constituted authorities selected by the free and enlightened suffrages of the people have, in the mere wantonness of power and the unbridled lust of dominion, perpetrated so great an outrage upon a neighboring nation, and upon the rights of humanity.

Sir, I take this occasion to say, that I have little sympathy for the Mexican republic or the Mexican rulers now, or at any recent period. So far as they could, by their example, they have brought opprobrium and disgrace upon the cause of free institutions, and upon the very name of republic. I have none at all for those faithless, gasconading chiefs, who have so long oppressed the masses of their countrymen with their exactions and all the evils of faction and anarchy. I can sympathise with the honest and enlightened patriot, as there are doubtless some such in Mexico, who are struggling to maintain the honor of their country, the integrity of their soil, and the existence of their nationality. I concede that there are with the misled unoffending inhabitants, the necessary subjects, upon the victims of war. But, I repeat, I have no sympathies for their vain-glorious, factious chiefs, nor for any government of their founding.

I shall further avail myself of the occasion to state that I do not hold Mexico to be altogether blameless of this war, and of all its bloody consequences; neither in its origin, nor in the conduct of it, on their part. In the revolution of Texas; in the circumstances of connivance, if not of encouragement, on the part of the government of the United States attending that event in the final annexation of Texas without first negotiating the consent of Mexico; she might well feel her national pride wounded—she might well, as the weaker power, conceive that she had not been dealt with in that spirit of conciliation and courtesy, which the professions of amity on our part made proper. In truth, the annexation of Texas under all the circumstances preceding, and attending it, was not a very neighborly act on our part; nor do I think, without pretending to be well informed on the subject, that the character of this country was duly consulted and respected in the manner in which that act was consummated. Then Mexico had some cause of complaint against this government. But, on the other hand, we had causes of complaint against Mexico. I need not enumerate them. I do not say there was sufficient cause of war, for that might imply that it was expedient to declare war before the collision of arms on the Rio Grande, but if the grounds of these complaints had not been removed; if she had persevered in her hostile policy towards the United States, after all the usual means of conciliation and amicable adjustment, such as we have employed towards other and more powerful nations under similar circumstances, had been exhausted on our part; I cannot say that we would not have been justified in declaring war by any code of public morals or of international law recognized among civilized nations. Hence, I am not of opinion that there is anything in the mode of bringing on this war, nor in its past conduct on our part, nor in the conduct of Mexico, which should restrain us as a just and magnanimous people if we think it expedient to assert our interest, (I speak not of honor, for that has already been amply vindicated—Mexico has fully atoned, both in blood and the other calamities of war for any violation of our honor)—I say, if we think it expedient to any of our great interests, commercial or military, I can see nothing to restrain us from claiming the rights of the conqueror to any moderate extent which those interests require; and which would be neither unreasonable nor oppressive in us to demand, nor dishonorable or ruinous to Mexico to concede as the vanquished party.

But, sir, it is a far different question how far I would go—how much more blood—how much more treasure—I would sacrifice in a war waged under present circumstances—under the recent development of the policy of the administration in the further prosecution of this war. The question, as now presented, involves not so much the consideration of what we may honorably and rightfully do in reference to Mexico as the vanquished party in a war in which she cannot claim to be blameless as of other questions and consequences, deeply and vitally affecting the Union, and the policy and principles of our own government.

I beg, Mr. President, to be indulged in a few other preliminary remarks which now occur to me as appropriate to the subject. When I said that I would not discuss certain questions in regard to the propriety of this war—its justice or injustice—I beg leave to explain, that I would feel that I had a perfect right to do otherwise if I thought that the interests of the country demanded such a course. I have had sir, a pretty large experience in public life, but have not, as yet, disciplined myself into perfect indifference or callousness as to what may be said—whether in this body, or out of it—in regard to the motives which control my own course, or that of those with whom I am associated, in remarks which I am about to offer are prompted by the continued denunciations which I meet with in some of the public journals of the day. I hold, sir, for one, that gentlemen who believe this war to be unjust and iniquitous, or whether just or unjust, that the further prosecution of it is likely to inflict upon the country greater evils than can be compensated by all the territorial acquisitions which the courage and resources of the country may achieve, have a perfect right to arraign the authors and advocates of it at the bar of public opinion, and to thwart them by all the means of speech, writing and voting, which the constitution warrants. I hold, sir, that to deny to them the exercise of this privilege by law, would be an act of despotism under legal forms; and to seek to forestall the exercise of this privilege by intimidation, and the influence of official denunciation, by charging those who avail themselves of this privilege as the allies of the public enemy and their auxiliaries in the war, is an attempt at moral despotism, only to be excused as an emanation of excessive and over-heated zeal, in which neither the judgment nor a proper regard for the institutions of freedom have had much to do.

Why, sir, after Mexico shall have fallen under our conquering arms in the South, and the British possessions in the North, let us suppose that the spirit of progressive democracy, which is becoming so rife in the land, emboldened by past success should succeed in converting this people into a nation of propagandists, and with the aid of such fanatic givings-out as that it is destiny—that it is our mission—should actually involve us in a war with all Europe—if a large portion of the reflecting and intelligent citizens of this country should be of opinion that such a contest can have no other end than to destroy our foreign commerce, exhaust our resources, cover the ocean with pirates, afflict the world with the calamities of war, and retard instead of advancing civilization and the cause of civil liberty, would they not be recreant to their duty and traitors to their country, were they to seal their lips and view in silence the progress of such wild and extravagant schemes. Yet, sir, I dare avow that even in such a war, we should find the organs of the dominant party—all the recipients of Executive patronage all over the country—heralding the same charge of treason and alliance with the public enemy against those patriots who might have the courage to bare themselves to the storm.

Well, sir, if in the present war there are those who honestly believe that the real objects of it—that even those territorial acquisitions which are openly avowed as the objects of it in part—would prove an apple of discord at home, a source of dangerous domestic dissension—would be a curse rather than a blessing to the country—are their lips to be sealed for fear their voice may penetrate the council chamber of the government of Mexico, and disincline it to a treaty? Such a result, evil as it may be, is only one of the inconveniences incident to that system of freedom which is our only guaranty for the preservation of all our liberties, and the boasted superiority of our own over all other forms of government. But, sir, should the tone of remonstrance against this war rise so high in this chamber as to penetrate every vale in Mexico, reverberate among her mountains and rouse the whole population to a spirit of resistance to the attempt to subdue them to our dominion, there are those who believe that a greater calamity may befall this country, in the further prosecution of this war, than even such a result as that.

But it is said the war still goes on; our armies are in the field; the blood of our countrymen still flows in repeated conflicts with an obstinate and infatuated people; our detachments are cut off—and our straggling soldiers are daily pierced by the lances of the murderous guerilleros—and will you not forbear for their sakes? Who forbear? Who should forbear? The opponents of this war? Those who believe—not that the success of our arms, but of the policy in support of which it is employed abroad—would bring peace and prosperity at once upon our institutions at home? And who are they who oppose this war and the policy of the President in the further prosecution of it? Are they of any one section of the Union? Do they belong exclusively to the North or to the South? Have they shunned the perils and privations of the war when called by the constituted authorities of the country to the support of her eagles? They are those who have borne their full share of the burdens of the war—they are those who have given their full proportion, in substance and of blood, to maintain the supremacy of our arms. And what are their numbers? I verily believe that two-thirds of the people of this country are in heart opposed to the policy of this war, whatever may be their opinions six months hence; and but for the tyranny of party, the force of party obligation, and the power of Executive influence, could they be allowed to speak—satiated with the glory already acquired—the honor of the country already amply vindicated—they would strangle this hydra to-day. Would their's be the voice of faction?

Who then, I repeat, should forbear, in order to spare the further effusion of blood in Mexico? The powerful array of those opposed to the war who believe that the further prosecution of it, for the objects avowed, would be mischievous and disastrous to their own country? Or shall not the President and the advisers and the dependents of his policy be called on to yield up their pride of consistency, to sacrifice their visions of national and, may be, their personal glory, in projected enlargement of the boundaries of the republic, upon the altar of public harmony and of the Union? Sir, the voice of a large portion of their countrymen is opposed to their policy; they have a right to cause it to be heard through all the channels of public intelligence. It has long since penetrated the interior of the White House, and if the President and his counsellors shall disregard its warnings; if, having the power in their own hands, wielding, at their will, an army of more than forty thousand of the choicest troops in the world, they shall continue to prosecute this war; if our gallant fellows are still destined to fall by the hand of a defeated, but still resisting foe; should the war be increased in fury and destructiveness, until the plains and mountain passes of all Anahuac run blood, and still there shall be no treaty—no peace—upon whom will rest the fearful responsibility? When the day of accounting shall come—and it will come—from whom will the country demand a reckoning? From those who, reckless of human suffering and in despite the warning voice of their own countrymen, persevere in the execution of an inexorable and fatal policy.

Mr. President: I have occupied more time in these remarks than I intended, and much more than their importance may be supposed to justify. I trust, however, they are not altogether inappropriate.

I have already stated that to pass this bill would be to approve the policy of the Administration in the further prosecution of the war. What is that policy? I desire to speak with all due courtesy and deference to the President of the United States, and his friends and supporters on this floor, but I would earnestly enquire what is the real policy of the Administration in the further prosecution of the war? And with like deference to the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I must be allowed to say, that I have a right, not as an individual, but as a member of this body, to a somewhat more explicit expression of what he holds to be that policy than he has hitherto chosen to give us; and I inquire now, what is the policy of the administration in the further prosecution of this war? I know that one gentleman will very readily answer it is for the purpose of "conquering an honorable peace;" and another will reply that it is for the purpose of securing "indemnity for the past and security for the future." But these are Delphic responses, mere vague generalities, non-committals, and may be construed to mean any thing that may be done in future, provided only that some measure of indemnity is obtained.

The President is more explicit in his message. He informs us that New Mexico and California are already in our possession, and must not be given up. This is all very fair and candid so far as it goes. But what further acquisition of territory is to be demanded of Mexico? If none, and if those provinces now in our possession would be regarded as a satisfactory indemnity, why not, in view of the uncertainty and embarrassments which lie in the way of an early termination of the war, fall back upon those provinces and hold them, and thus limit the waste of life and spare the country the enormous expenditure which attend our present military operations in Mexico? The reply will be: oh! we have no treaty; the war will still be open; we shall have no peace! Well, I will take gentlemen upon their own ground. Suppose that you have, or may have, a treaty with the government now assembled at Queretaro, ceding California and New Mexico, would that be satisfactory to the administration? I would be glad to hear from some honorable Senator whether such a treaty with the existing government of Mexico would be satisfactory to the administration, or do you want still more territory? I should be glad to hear from my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. FOOTE) on this subject. What more does he want than those provinces? I know that he is too candid and too courageous to withhold the expression of his sentiments.

Mr. FOOTE.—I have no hesitation in answering the question proposed; but, in doing so, desire to be understood as having no authority to commit any person but myself. If a treaty can be obtained with some government in Mexico, entitled to respect as such, which should give us the Californias and New Mexico, with a reasonable prospect of such treaty being observed on the part of Mexico, for one, I should be content on the point of indemnity.

Mr. BELL.—I am gratified with the bold, unhesitating reply of the Senator. It is such as I expected from him. He would be satisfied with a treaty made with the existing government, on condition that it would bring with it present and permanent peace.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator misconceives my meaning. It is a question of some delicacy, and one upon which I wish to be understood. It is true, as the honorable Senator says, that for the purpose of securing peace—though I do not dread the result, in case they refuse to make peace—if the government of Mexico, at any time hereafter, or at present, turns out to be such a government as we can rely upon, and such territory as I have spoken of be granted to us, and there be circumstances which would authorize the reasonable expectation that the peace will not be violated—I would be perfectly content.

Mr. BELL.—I believe I understand the answer of the honorable Senator. I understood him as speaking the sentiments of the administration.

Mr. FOOTE.—I speak for myself.

Mr. BELL.—I now understand, I trust, something of the views of the administration. A treaty with the existing government of Mexico, embracing a cession of such territory as he desires, would be satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi, upon the condition that it should bring with it assurances of a permanent peace. But I desire further information. What assurance—what guaranty of peace do you demand? Do you desire a further indemnity in money? The honorable Senator near me (Mr. CASS) will say, no, he scorns it. Then, what further do you want than New Mexico and California, by way of security for the future? What says the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to this question?

Mr. CASS (in his seat,) said that he might choose to answer when the Senator's argument was more fully developed.

Mr. BELL.—I wish to press home the enquiry, and I say to Senators, and particularly to the distinguished chairman of the committee on Military Affairs, will you be satisfied with the cession of New Mexico and California as an indemnity? You would; you want no more territory—no money. What more then do you want? If you say you would be satisfied without anything more, then I put the question to the honorable Senator, (Mr. CASS) when you demand indemnity for the past and security for the future, what is it you mean by "security for the future?" When a question was asked in the progress of this discussion, of some honorable Senator on the other side of the chamber, as to the object of the administration in the further prosecution of the war, the answer was, indemnity. The chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs (Mr. CASS) sitting in his place, added, "and security for the future." Moreover, what does the message mean in declaring that the war must be prosecuted until we obtain ample indemnity for the past and security for the future? Will the Senator answer that the phrase "security for the future" has no distinct or substantive meaning; that it is merely an expletive, the effect of careless composition? I am sure that the able and distinguished Senator will not say so. What then does the honorable Senator say to the question, what is meant by "security for the future?" I will, for the present, answer for him after I shall have stated what I understand to be the real policy of the administration in the further prosecution of the war. From the date of the failure of Mr. Trist's negociation, and the splendid success of General Scott, the President and his advisers no longer limited their views to a treaty which should merely cede the territories of New Mexico and California, but one which should bring with it ample security for the future—security for a permanent peace. That I understood to be the policy of the administration. I understand that no treaty with the existing government of Mexico will be satisfactory, either to the administration or its supporters on this floor unless it can furnish security for the future—security for a permanent peace between the two countries.

Mr. FOOTE.—Do I understand the honorable Senator as referring to me? I have already said that I would be satisfied with a treaty giving us so much territory as is comprised within the limits of New Mexico and California—if adequate security, as to the observance of the treaty on the part of Mexico, should also be obtained. I have always doubted, and still doubt, whether the adequate security could be obtained without establishing the Sierra Madre as a line of military defence, and retaining the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa and other strong places in temporary occupancy.

Mr. BELL.—I think I understand the views of the honorable Senator. I do not desire to misinterpret the views of the honorable Senator, or of the administration. I take the position that the phrase "security for the future," has a substantive meaning. I suppose that the administration can make no treaty with the existing government of Mexico, which will not be liable to be disregarded and repudiated, the moment our armies are withdrawn; unless the contemplated securities be required in addition to the indemnity. Then I press the enquiry what are the nature and extent of the "security for the future" which will be demanded of Mexico? What security of any kind can the existing government, or the faction now in power, give that would be satisfactory? Is it a mere stipulation in the treaty for future peace and friendly commercial relations? I take it for granted that is not the nature of the security intended, as all treaties include a peace and amity clause. Is it intended to stipulate for the retention of the castle of San Juan D'Ulloa for a term of years, or indefinitely? I cannot suppose that any such treaty is expected. Is it in contemplation to have the guaranty of any foreign power? You are precluded from any such resort, by having proclaimed that you will suffer no trans-Atlantic powers to obtain any additional dominion in America; and you will not give them any pretext for doing so.

Having, then no confidence in any treaty the existing government of Mexico can make, or a "security for the future," what is the clear and inevitable conclusion upon this view of the matter? Why, that you neither expect nor desire a treaty with any existing government in Mexico; that the government on which you rely to make such a treaty as shall afford the security you demand, is a government to be formed and nurtured into maturity and stability, under your tuition and protection. This may be regarded as a very bold assertion; but I re-assert that this administration neither expects nor desires a treaty with any existing government in Mexico, and that the government with which they propose to treat is yet to be brought into existence.

No, sir, the administration can make no treaty with the present shadow of a government in Mexico, ceding New Mexico and California, consistently with the determination avowed in the message, of "requiring security for the future." The learned and eloquent Senator from New York, (Mr. DIX,) in a speech to which I listened with the greatest pleasure—a speech, by the by, replete with the noblest sentiments and the soundest views and maxims, in every part of which I concur, except the conclusions to which he came in relation to this war—has given the Senate some further insight into the probable extent of that security for the future, which the administration proposes to demand of Mexico. It is not only to guard against hostilities between the two powers on any boundary which may hereafter be established by treaty, but to insure Mexico herself from the intrusion and interference of any foreign government; to provide against any transatlantic sway over Mexico, to which the present, and ever-recurring factions expose her, or rather invite.

This I take to be the solution of the enigma; of the mystic phrase, "security for the future," so often repeated, and yet never explained by the advocates of the measure under discussion. The policy of the administration is to secure such a treaty from such a government in Mexico as will afford satisfactory guarantees for a permanent peace on our own borders, and prevent any foreign power from obtaining a foothold in Mexico; and this war is to be prolonged until a new government is formed, under the protection of our arms, such as can give the security required. I challenge honorable Senators to say whether this is not the policy of the administration?—and I do not exclude the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Sir, that this was the policy of the administration when the message was delivered, and when the bill was introduced, I think, is clear.

There may be change in the policy of the Executive, in the further prosecution of this war. The cloud which has, for some time past, been gathering over the Treasury, and which every day assumes a more threatening aspect, may have given birth to a modified policy. Of this I can know nothing, but one thing I do know. If a treaty is made with any existing government in Mexico, embracing a cession of territory only, the responsibility of advising it will be thrown upon the Senate. It will not be advised by the President. But in saying this, I mean no disparagement to the President. I mean not to impute one want of firmness or a disposition to shrink from his just responsibility. Sir, I have no rankling feeling here, (pointing to his heart,) that I seek to gratify. In my toilsome ascent up the hill of life, I have long since learned the folly, if not the wickedness, of indulging such feelings, the offspring of past and fierce political conflicts. My experience has taught me, that the most grievous injuries a public man is liable to receive, are inflicted not by political opponents. The arrows that go deepest here (Mr. B. with his hand upon his heart,) are sped by friendly hands; by companions and co-laborers in a common cause, and often by those we have most cherished, most served. No, sir, when I say that the President will throw upon the Senate the responsibility of advising such a treaty as I have described, I mean that he cannot do otherwise, consistently with the policy avowed in the message. And if such a treaty shall be laid before the Senate, and it is reasonable in other respects, I would unite with his friends in extricating him from the embarrassment in which he is placed; believing that in so doing, I would at the same time be extricating my country from the evils which impend over it. This I could cheerfully do, leaving the President in the full enjoyment of all his honors, and his reputation unimpaired.

But, Mr. President, if I have not mistaken the policy of the administration in the further prosecution of the war, I feel warranted in maintaining that the large and enlightened class of patriotic citizens every where, who, though opposed to the policy of this war from its commencement, have yet felt it their duty, heretofore, to sustain the Executive in the prosecution of it, have been giving their support to a masked policy. The whole country has been deluded with the expectation and belief that it was the policy of the Executive to coerce a treaty with any existing government or phantom of a government that may exist in Mexico, speedily, and that a cession of some moderate portion of territory, and the settlement of unadjusted boundaries, were the only terms that would be exacted from Mexico. The country has been led to suppose, that whatever measure of supply might be demanded would have reference only to an early termination of the war; when, in fact, consistently with the policy of the administration, as now understood, the war is to be prolonged with all the attendant consequences of a waste of life and treasure, indefinitely, and until a government shall be built up in Mexico, and attain maturity under the protection of our arms, which can give the securities I have pointed out.

After all, sir, these may be said to be my own individual conclusions. It may be said, that the policy of the Executive is still to obtain an immediate treaty with any government in Mexico, stable or unstable, which may be willing to treat; and that the importance I have given to the words "security for the future" is gratuitous and unfounded. Well, sir, under this view of the question, I beg leave to repeat an inquiry I had before made. If New Mexico and California would be regarded as a sufficient indemnity, and nothing else is sought, why not fall back upon those territories, which you now hold, and are willing to admit to be a sufficient indemnity? You say there will be no peace! Well, sir, when can you promise the country a peace, as the result of your present plan? But you insist, that after such sacrifices of blood and treasure; after having conquered in so many battles; after having captured so many cities and strongholds of the enemy, it would be inglorious and preposterous to abandon them without a treaty. Here, sir, we are met by that fatal argument of the "force of circumstances;"—the same which impelled us into the war, and across the Rio Grande. It is the same that twelve months ago, after the battle of Monterey, and when you had already conquered more than a third of the whole of the Mexican territory, caused you to decline the policy of a defensive line recommended by General Taylor, and urged by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who, from the beginning of this war, had the sagacity to perceive the dangers which threatened the country. The argument then was—we have gone too far to negotiate treat; we have been too successful to abandon further operations without a treaty; we must teach the enemy a lesson; we must prostrate the interior of the country; we must carry our arms into the heart of Mexico. Well, sir, you have carried the war into the very heart of the enemy's country and are now revelling on its vitals; and still you have no treaty, no peace. The argument founded on the force of circumstances, has acquired increased weight and importance. You must now extend your operations; you call for ten thousand additional regular troops to enable you to overrun the whole country; to cause the calamities of war to be felt throughout all her borders, and you are led by the force of circumstances to pursue this "ignis fatuus" of peace and a treaty, which still eludes you and lures you onward into the meshes of a policy from which you can never extricate yourselves.

But you say you will extricate yourselves; that you will overrun the whole country, take all the strong holds and populous states, levy contributions, and in this way coerce a treaty; and if this experiment should fail, you announce your determination to take the full measure of indemnity into your own hands.

How long, sir, is the war to be continued in making this experiment? one or two, or five years? The policy itself indicates that time will be an important element in carrying it out. You cannot recruit these ten new regiments and get them into the field in less than six or eight months. In less than one year then you can expect no result. And what will be the cost of this experiment? To maintain an army of 50,000 men in Mexico, without having any certain data upon which to form an estimate, I hazard nothing in saying it cannot be less than $40,000,000 per annum. Then if you should succeed in levying as much as $10,000,000 on the people of Mexico, this country will still have to supply $30,000,000. This experiment, then, should it last one year, will cost this country at least $30,000,000, and still there may be no treaty; and you may be compelled at last to take the indemnity into your own hands; that indemnity being New Mexico and California, for it is under this version of the policy of the administration that I am now discussing the question before the Senate. Well, sir, did it never strike honorable Senators who support the Executive in making this experiment, that if it should be crowned with complete success, and a treaty should be made ceding New Mexico and California to the United States, the whole cost to the country will be more than five times the value of the territory ceded? Sir, I cannot suppose that gentlemen so intelligent and so well informed upon the subject, can have failed to perceive this consequence, and how preposterous it would be to pursue such a course of policy and for such a result.

I now proceed in my desultory manner, to notice the arguments of honorable Senators in support of this bill, and the proceedings of the General in command in Mexico, in further confirmation of the views I have already advanced. The present policy of the administration and its friends is exceedingly difficult and embarrassing, both to themselves and the country, and they must feel it to be so. While they must necessarily continue to keep the expectation of an early peace prominent before the country, their plan of operations on the other hand has a directly contrary tendency. While they do not mean to abandon altogether the idea of making a treaty with any government that may spring up in Mexico, for that is a resource which may become very convenient, yet their measures are adapted, and their operations conducted with reference to the more settled policy of encouraging the establishment of a government—a government under the protection of our arms—or of holding and governing the country, until by the experience of the "justice of our sway," as indicated by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at the close of his argument, the people of Mexico shall be disposed to make such a treaty as the honor of the country demands.

The difficulty and embarrassment of the argument in support of the measure before the Senate, under such circumstances are manifest, and it struck me as an incident deserving notice, that the distinguished Senator who introduced the bill, should avail himself of the earliest occasion to say, that he knew no more of the policy of the administration, in the prosecution of the war, than what appears in the official documents. Yet, I regarded it as such an avowal, in a gentleman of his distinction and eminence in the country might feel himself called upon to make. His position in the body is one both delicate and important, and, whatever his individual opinion may be upon some particulars of the policy adopted by the Executive Department of the Government, he may feel constrained to sanction them. I can make many allowances for a gentleman occupying the delicate and important relation to the President which he now does, as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

That distinguished Senator in his speech upon this subject, confined himself mainly to the views presented in the report of the Secretary of War; and throughout his argument, the expectation of an early treaty was never lost sight of, while the reasoning employed, will be seen to be based upon the idea of a continuance of the war.

The argument first advanced in support the measure, was that our army in Mexico was in danger. (Mr. CASS shaking his head.) I find that I am mistaken. The argument then was, that contingencies may arise endangering the army. The people of Mexico who have failed to make an obstinate resistance at the commencement of the war, may be roused by a protracted invasion to a high degree of energy and courage. He announced to us, that our army is in the midst of eight or ten millions of a hostile population. This is an argument which appears to me to be addressed to our fears, and the popular feeling which may be supposed to exist in such an emergency. I cannot say that it is one addressed to the reason and judgment of the Senate. I need not say that if any just grounds can be shown to exist for supposing that our army is in danger, that there is not a Senator present, who would not promptly vote, not ten only, but twenty, fifty, or any number of regiments that might be demanded, to insure its safety. But what are the facts, as to the perilous condition of our army? We have now not less than forty-five thousand troops in all Mexico, and new recruits are still going forward. There are not less than thirty-two thousand men, under General Scott; and this is the army said to be in danger. I desire to make a brief reference to what our troops have done, that we may infer what they will or can do. To say nothing of the preceding brilliant and unsurpassed achievements of General Taylor, we have seen him at Buena Vista, with an army of less than five thousand men—of whom not more than six hundred were regulars, and the remainder undisciplined volunteers, who, as it has been properly said, had never before heard the report of a hostile gun—not only repulse, but route and disperse an army of twenty thousand; an army the best disciplined and best appointed that Mexico had been able to bring into the field, since the beginning of the war, and withal, supported by a heavy train of artillery. This he did in an open field. If the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DOUGLAS,) were present, I would say that it was a very obstinate proceeding on the part of General Taylor, not to be willing to be sacrificed; to be driven across the Rio Grande, and thence home in disgrace. We next see General Scott with less than twelve thousand men, landing at Vera Cruz, in the face of the enemy, attacking, and compelling the surrender of the city, together with the Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. In a very short time after, we see him with eight thousand troops, storming the batteries of the enemy, and carrying the heights of Cerro Gordo, defended by an army twelve thousand strong. The fortification of Perote and the city of Puebla, witha population of 80,000 inhabitants, panic stricken, fall before him without resistance. After refreshing his troops and receiving some reinforcements, we next see General Scott precipitating himself, with an army of not more than ten thousand men, upon the valley and city of Mexico, defended by 30,000 armed men, assaulting and carrying the enemy's works at every point; and after a series of sanguinary conflicts, running through several days, with his army reduced to 6,000, capturing by main force the city itself, and triumphantly planting the banner of his country upon the so called palace of the Montezumas. At the time during the course of these operations had General Scott more than 15,000 troops, on his whole line extending from Tampico to the city of Mexico. Upon this same line he has now an army of thirty-two thousand, well provided in every respect. It is under such circumstances that our army is said to be in danger. Sir, I cannot suppose that the argument upon this point is entitled to any weight watever.

The next argument submitted in support of this measure is, that after providing for the safety of the army, and the continued occupation of our present conquests, it is intended to extend the military operations to such other strongholds and rich and populous districts as it may be thought expedient to occupy. Very well; upon this point I regret that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is so able, did not favor us with any estimates of the amount of force that, in his judgment, would be necessary to hold the large towns and states or districts already in our possession. I am surprised that we are furnished with no such estimates from any member of that committee, although there are several distinguished Senators on that committee who have been connected with military service. I pretend to no competency to make such an estimate We are left pretty much to grope our way in the dark upon this point. Still some data we may glean from the reports of the officers of the army connected with the late splendid successes. We learn, for example, that the gallant Col. Childs held Puebla, which by some estimates contains a population of 80,000, with a force of no more than 500 effective men, for thirty days and nights, and during a part of that time, against the assaults of 8,000 troops, commanded by Santa Anna himself. Upon the line extending from Tampico to Mexico, I therefore estimate that 500 troops will be quite a sufficient protection for Tampico; 1,000 for Vera Cruz, with the addition of the marine stationed off that city; for Jalapa, 500; as many more for Perote; the same number for Puebla, and 2,000 for the city of Mexico; in all 5,000 men. In this estimate I take into view, that wherever our army makes its entry, it disperses the army of the enemy, captures their artillery, and other munitions of war, and disarms the population, leaving them no resource for further resistance. I also take into view that in whatever town or city detachments of our army are stationed, large numbers of our citizens finds their way there, who, upon any sudden emergency, will be ready to perform military duty. I cannot suppose that there are at this moment in the city of Mexico alone, less than a thousand of such auxiliaries; and if we include the teamsters and others, attached to the staff of the army, a much larger number.

Then, sir, we have it admitted that General Scott's force is now not less than 32,000 men, of all arms, upon his whole line from Tampico to the city of Mexico. Of those, let us suppose that some 5000 will be at all times on the sick list, or otherwise disabled, still there will remain an effective force of some 27,000. But let it be taken for granted that the whole effective force at any one time, will not exceed 25,000 rank and file, you will have a force, after deducting the 5,000 I have estimated as sufficient to hold your present conquests in that quarter, of 20,000. which can be moved in columns upon whatever other strongholds and populous districts you may think it expedient to seize and occupy; and which you announce as your present plan for coercing an early peace.

Well, sir, is not a disposable force of 20,000 men sufficient for that purpose? When all your past conquests by General Scott have been achieved by a force not exceeding 15,000 at all points; and now that the armies of the enemy have been dispersed, their munitions of war captured or destroyed, their financial resources exhausted, shall it be said that a force of 32,000 men is not adequate for the further prosecution of the war in the interior of Mexico?

The honorable Senator to enforce the argument in favor of the immediate adoption of the measure under debate, and in pursuance of the policy of raising a revenue in Mexico for the support of our army, informed the Senate that it was very desirable to take and occupy the rich mining states of Zacatecas and San Luis Potosi. Well, sir, this argument of the honorable Senator had scarcely escaped from his lips, when, unluckily, news reached Washington that two columns or divisions of the army were now being organized and were expected soon to march upon these important positions; and before this news grew cold and following close upon its heels, we are put in receipt of a general order of the commanding-general to the army to hold itself in readiness to overrun all Mexico. Confident in his resources and the sufficiency of the force already in the field, he makes no reference to reinforcements as expected or desired. To pursue this part of the argument a little further: let us suppose Zacatecas and San Luis Potosi are now in our possession, and that Queretaro will soon follow—if you estimate the force necessary to hold each of these states, as high as 2,000, making 6,000 in all, you will still have a force of 14,000 at your disposal, with which you can take and occupy other strongholds of the enemy, keep your communications open, and reinforce the divisions of the army at any point which may require to be strengthened.

But, sir, the main object of those extended operations of the army is declared to be, to cause the pressure of the war to be felt by the whole body of the population, to levy contributions, to seize the public revenues into our hands for the support of our army, and thus to dispose the minds of the Mexicans to a speedy termination of the war by a treaty. Well, sir, even while the argument is pressed by the honorable Senator upon this point, by another arrival of despatches from Mexico we are advised that General Scott has already, under instructions from the government at Washington, issued an order for carrying this branch of its policy in the further prosecution of the war, into effect. But what do we see upon looking into the order of Gen. Scott? By a single stroke of his pen he abolishes the entire amount of transit duties and of the taxes exacted at the gates on all supplies to her city population; a branch of revenue which has heretofore yielded four-and-a-half millions to the government, and the one of all others felt to be the most burthensome and oppressive upon the people of Mexico! I am aware, sir, that it may be said that the revenue thus abolished may be supplied by the increased productiveness of the country, stimulated, as it will be, by this salutary exemption; that the revenues from all other sources will be augmented. I am aware, too, that by another order of General Scott, the amount of revenue assessed upon the different states is greatly increased beyond the amount exacted under the Mexican government. But, I do not forget at the same time, that General Scott in pursuance of the policy of the government at Washington, and looking to a continued occupation of the country, has abolished other large sources of revenue. For example, lotteries are abolished and the tobacco monopoly is to cease after this year! The proposition is that the people of Mexico, in the further prosecution of this war, are to be made to feel its burthens, and, by the aggravated calamities brought upon them by subjecting their resources to the support of our army, to reconcile them to a treaty. But instead of increasing their burthens, you relieve the industrial and enterprising classes of the inhabitants of a burden which, under their own government, they held to be most oppressive. While you declare that your policy is to increase the burdens and calamities of the war, you lighten existing burdens. Instead of aggravation, your policy is one of conciliation. Instead of causing your military occupation to be felt as a grievance, you pursue a course calculated to display the beneficence of your sway. The industrial classes embrace a part of all the varieties of race of which the population is compounded; some of pure Indian blood, others of the casts or mixed races, and a considerable proportion of whites, and these compose the strength of what is called the Puros party in Mexico. This is the party which your plan of raising a revenue for the support of your army tends to conciliate. Yet this is the party which, at every step of your progress, from the commencement of the war, has resolutely opposed a treatv. They declare that your military occupation—your military government—is preferable to the domination of their own factions. The withdrawal of your army is what, it is said, they most dread. They want your protection; the benefits of your free institutions, and the support of your power and resources. This, too, is the party in Mexico by the aid of which you expect to establish such a government as can give you a treaty with the security for the future, which you demand. It has been proclaimed by the semi-official organs of your own government, that this party desire annexation to the United States. You have then already taken the first step in the policy indicated in the message, and in the debate upon this question, of encouraging the formation of a new government to be founded on truly republican principles. You are already in alliance with them; and inasmuch as you say, that it is your policy, in the vigorous prosecution of the war to enforce a speedy peace, and this Puros party is known to be opposed to a treaty, you may be said to be the allies of the public enemy. Such are the inconsistencies of your avowed policy at home and your proceedings in Mexico; inconsistencies necessarily the result of the complex and double policy which had been adopted by the administration.

Now, sir, am I mistaken in the position, that the administration has abandoned the expectation of a treaty with any existing government in Mexico; and that this war is to be prolonged until such a government is established under your protection, as shall be able to give you security for the future? I shall lose the point of my argument if this is not so; and I will thankfully listen to any explanation from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for I intend to build upon it.

The usual hour of adjournment having arrived, it was suggested that the Senator should defer the remainder of his remarks till to-morrow.

Mr. BELL signified that he should be glad to be so indulged.

Mr. CASS.—For myself, as an individual member of the Senate, I can say it will give me great pleasure to extend to the Senator the indulgence which he desires, in the state of his health, to adjourn this debate till to-morrow, in order to afford him an opportunity to finish his remarks. The honorable Senator has made two or three allusions in the course of his speech, which I cannot but regard as personal to myself, and it is in reference to them I now desire to say a few words. The Senator repeatedly challenged contradiction, pausing, as though he wished and expected a reply. Assuming certain facts as the basis of his argument, he intimated we knew they were true, but when I arose to put the matter right at the moment the error was committed, I found the honorable Senator wished to continue his argument, with his facts, as he assumed them, till he had terminated his part of the debate. With a good deal of emphasis the Senator repeatedly asked—"What do you want?" Addressing Senators on this side of the chamber, he asked—"What do you demand from Mexico?" And it really seemed as if he expected one would rise and say, that he wanted this, and another that he wanted that, and that the whole Senate, on both sides of it, I suppose, was to be called on to form new kind of canvass, and to give their opinion and vote respecting the specific terms we ought to demand from Mexico. We are engaged in a war with a foreign nation. Its course so far has been prosperous and glorious, but no human being can predict its consequences, or when or how it will terminate. In this state of things, it would be a most extraordinary instance of legislative imprudence, if each member of this body should announce his own plan and policy, and denounce the projects of his fellow one. But, sir, all that a prudent Senator ought to do, would be to lay down certain general principles—such, for example, as indemnity and security, amplifying his views of them as he pleased, without undertaking to specify precisely what ought or ought not to be accepted. And if the honorable gentleman had referred to some of my remarks previously made in the session, he would have discerned my views of this matter. I distinctly stated, that the incipient steps of the negotiation were given to the President by the constitution, and that though I could not expect the gentlemen on the other side, to have the same confidence in the Executive as myself, and my friends on this side have, for one I was satisfied to leave them there, and to content myself with investigating the matter, when it came before the Senate, and with voting aye or no upon the treaty. It was my view then, and I entertain the same sentiments now.

The Senator has made many allusions to the principle laid down by the President, and has emphatically repeated the terms, indemnity and security—security and indemnity, as though they announced some new discovery in diplomacy, and asks in a triumphant tone what they mean? The honorable Senator from Delaware (Mr. CLAYTON) had previously made the same inquiry, and he also seemed startled as though some new doctrine and practice were to mark our negotiations in Mexico. I will not take that honorable gentleman's witty definition, that indemnity means half and security the other half, but I will say that if indemnity means half, or whatever else it means more or less, security means certainty and safety for its protection.

Mr. President: In the modern diplomacy of Europe, for the last three centuries, the principle of indemnity and security is as well known, and enforced, as any other principle of national intercommunication. There are two objects for which security may be demanded, depending upon existing circumstances. One has reference to an unstable government, and the other to an intractable hostile people; which of these securities this government may think it necessary to demand, or whether both, and of what nature and extent, it is not for me to determine. These questions are with the Executive. There the constitution has placed them, and there I am willing to leave them. Does the gentlemen suppose that this government will make a treaty without some reasonable prospect of its observance, or without adopting the necessary precautions for fidelity and good faith on the part of Mexico? When the allies entered Paris, after the fall of Napoleon, the restored dynasty found the feelings of the French nation against them, and their political condition was uncertain and tottering. The great powers therefore kept military possession of Paris, and of some other portions of France, to secure till the new government could gain strength, and evince a power and disposition to comply with their engagements. I merely refer to the fact in illustration of the general principle, and not because I have the slightest knowledge of the nature of the security, which the Executive means to demand. Many other cases, sir, have happened, and many may be imagined, in which temporary possession of important positions in a country may have been, or may be, necessary, where a feeble government holds the power, in order to provide against its fall, if it should fall before its engagements are fulfilled.

Again, with regard to a hostile and intractable people, it may be necessary to obtain security against their unfriendly disposition. An open, indefensible country, or a river which may be crossed any where, almost from its source to its mouth, may not be regarded as affording proper security against border incursions. A range of mountains—a natural barrier, may be necessary. And in connection with this topic, I will remark, that the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Indiana (Mr. HANNEGAN,) have led me to investigate this subject more narrowly than I had done before, and I am perfectly satisfied he is right, and that the Sierra Madre would make the proper boundary between us and Mexico on that frontier; and, as one member of the Senate, I hope this boundary will be obtained. That ridge of mountains is an extraordinary one, commencing at the Gulf of Mexico and running five or six hundred miles to the Passo del Norte, and with not more than five or six passes through which man can penetrate it. The rest is an eternal, impenetrable, impassable barrier—a natural wall which laughs to scorn that of China; and beyond is the great desert destitute of water, and across which hostile expeditions can be pushed only with great difficulty. A very small force would hermetically close these passes through the ridge, and give us full security for our indemnity on that side.

The honorable Senator said he would astonish us with some of his remarks. He has fully redeemed his promise, and I confess myself very much astonished indeed. He seems to assert as a fact, and not to deduce as a conclusion, and calls upon us to contradict it, if it is not so, that the Administration does not desire a peace with the government of Mexico.

Mr. BELL.—I did not say that. I said that this Administration had no confidence in the security which any treaty with the existing government of Mexico could give for future peace, and, therefore, did not desire a peace with any existing government unless with security, which they did not believe the government could afford.

Mr. CASS.—The gentleman seems to assume as a given fact, beyond dispute, and bases upon it his argument, that the government does not desire a peace. And he stated expressly, that if the fact fails his argument fails with it. Now, sir, I never heard one word of this before. If such be the case, the gentleman has penetrated far deeper into the recesses of Executive secrets than I have done. I believe that the Administration is not only willing but desirous to make a treaty with any government in Mexico, whose authority is recognized there, and to run the risk of proper security for the maintenance of it.

Mr. BELL.—What security can any government which now exists in Mexico give?

Mr. CASS.—We have not yet got to that point. No government in Mexico has yet made a treaty; our difficulty is not in the observance of the stipulations of a treaty, but in its formation. They have utterly refused to enter into any negotiation with us. It is not that there is an unstable government, but that the government rejects our offers. That is the difficulty we have experienced from the commencement of the war.

Mr. BELL.—The very argument I assume is, that if they should make a treaty you would have no confidence in it, as every treaty contains a clause of amity and peace. Then, I want to know, whether the honorable gentleman would consider any treaty, by the existing government of Mexico, ceding the provinces of New Mexico and California, as bringing with it "the security for the future," which, according to his construction, the phrase implies? And would they rely upon such a treaty as affording the security?

Mr. CASS.—The gentleman asks me whether a stipulation for peace and amity would be regarded as security? Why, such a declaration alone would not be regarded as security from any unstable government. Something more would be necessary till its position was more secure. I take it for granted that this Administration, when it makes a peace with Mexico, should its government then appear to be unstable, would require some security for the observance of the stipulations of the peace. The general principles of security, whether against a government or a people, I have already stated. Their application is with the Executive. As to the continuation of the war, sir, I have merely to remark that we have but one duty, and that is to push our operations as all other nations have done and will do till an honorable peace is obtained. There is a point in all wars, where national obduracy must give way, and where submission becomes cheaper than resistance. It is when the results of the war have proclaimed the impossibility of continuing the contest. This may seem harsh, but it is founded in human nature. Our true policy is to carry on the war with all our might till its objects are accomplished. Those objects ought to be just, and we believe them to be so, and our exertions ought not to be relaxed by any crude notions of mistaken philanthropy. The Mexicans are like all other people. Their point of submission will be found as that of others has been found before them. They must eat, and sow, and reap, and wear clothing, and preserve the institutions of social life; and, I repeat, that their injustice will give way before our exertions, if these are continued.

I state again, sir, that I have two answers to the enquiry of the honorable Senator from Tennessee. One is that his case is a suppositious one, and that we have not arrived at the point when it is necessary to decide upon the security to be taken, as our offers have been utterly rejected. And the other is, that when the time comes for determining that question, the Executive will no doubt take such security if security be then necessary as circumstances may require.

One word more. The honorable Senator has said that in my opening speech, I said I knew no more of the policy of the Executive than was disclosed in the documents. I said nothing like it. The honorable Senator is under an entire misapprehension.

Mr. BELL.—It struck me with great force at the time.

Mr. CASS.—I will read what I did say: "I know nothing more of the proposed plan of campaign than is disclosed in that part of the report of the Secretary of War, which has just been read to the Senate." This is what I said, and why? First, because it was true; and secondly, because the plan of the Secretary of War was one of the most elaborate and detailed plans, ever submitted to the legislative department of a government. I do not see how he could have been more particular, unless he had said that on such a day we should enter Queretaro, on such a day San Luis, and so on, disclosing every step of the campaign till its objects should be thwarted or attained. It was, therefore, as the honorable Senator will perceive, not of the policy of the government that I spoke, but of the plan of the campaign.

The honorable Senator has spoken of the force which General Scott considers necessary to maintain our present command of the country.

If the honorable Senator will advert to a document sent into the Senate the other day, and I think published in the Intelligencer, he will find that the force estimated by General Scott as necessary for this purpose, adding to it, I believe, one or two expeditions, is thirty thousand men. Instead of two thousand, which the Senator deems sufficient to hold the city of Mexico, General Scott considers a garrison of seven thousand or seven thousand five hundred requisite for that object.

Mr. BELL.—I have heard the explanations of the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure. But they do not satisfy me that my argument has been at all impaired. However, I must now avail myself of the indulgence of the Senate in deferring further remarks until to-morrow.

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 27

Mr. BELL addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill, and, without concluding, gave way to a motion for adjournment.

The motion was withdrawn for the purpose of receiving a

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th January, 1848, calling for information on the subject of the negotiations between the United States and the Government of Mexico during the suspension of hostilities at Puebla, and [illegible] I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents which accompany it.

I deem it proper to add, especially in relation to the communication from the Government of the United States to cause the preparation of commissioners referred to in the despatch of Mr. Trist of the 6th of September, 1847, [illegible] communication was upon several accounts peculiarly disagreeable, and the Mexican authorities communicate to the United States with the least possible delay.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, 28 February, 1848.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That it be on the table and be printed.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FELCH presented a memorial of citizens of New Buffalo, in the State of Michigan, praying the establishment of a naval depot at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented a memorial of the citizens of New York, praying that [illegible] may be allowed to fleet manufactured ship [illegible] United States from Canada, [illegible], and exported without [illegible]; referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of the representatives of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, for New England, praying the adoption of measures for the speedy termination of the war; which was ordered to lie on the table.

RELINQUISHMENT OF TERRITORY FROM ACQUIRED TERRITORY.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

[illegible] ought not, consistent with the honor of the United States or the [illegible] to relinquish any portion of the territory which has been conquered by the arms of the United States from the Republic of Mexico, [illegible] by the treaty of peace between the United States and that Republic, except upon the fundamental principle of indemnity for the past and security for the future; but the justice and moderation which should characterize the councils of a great and powerful nation forbid the idea of a permanent conquest of any portion of the territory of a sister republic, which has been unprovoked by any act of hostility committed by her authorities.

Resolved, That the war with Mexico was not commenced by the authority of the President of the United States, but was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally begun by the President, in the manner set forth in the message of December 8th, 1846.

Resolved, That the doctrine of conquest, as applied to the territory of a sister republic, is inconsistent with the principles of our institutions, and ought to be repudiated.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC., REPORTED.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Anna J. Hassler, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for her relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Hugh W. Dobbin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to allow arrearages of pension to Hugh W. Dobbin, an officer in the late war.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Bouchaud of New York, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR POWERS IN CHINA AND TURKEY.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to the subject, reported a bill to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ASHLEY observed that it was the wish of the administration that before the Commissioner, who had been recently appointed to China, should leave this country, some action of the body should take place on the subject of the bill.

MISSOURI AND ARKANSAS BOUNDARY.

The bill from the House of Representatives to confirm the boundary between Missouri and Arkansas, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CADWALLADER WALLACE.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Cadwallador Wallace.

Mr. BERRIEN.—As that is a bill making a large appropriation, I should be glad to hear some statement of the grounds on which the Committee have recommended it.

Mr. CORWIN.—It is true, as has been stated by the Senator from Georgia, that it is a bill involving a pretty large appropriation. I reported it myself from the Committee on Public Lands, and I hope that the attention of the Senate will be directed to it, as I consider it one which deserves consideration; and, therefore, I shall be [illegible] to [illegible] for the present, so that when taken up, the Senate may be prepared to act upon it.

The bill was then passed over informally.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

A bill for the relief of Peter Lacy, administrator of Ann [illegible], deceased, and for the relief of Joseph Lacy, [illegible] the estate of John Lacy, late of Howard [illegible], deceased.

A bill for the relief of Charles L. Dell.

A bill for the relief of Richard S. Cove.

No amendment being made, the said bills were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That they pass, and that their respective titles be [illegible].

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States, [illegible] and read [illegible] further communication, [illegible] address of the citizens of the Free [illegible].

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BELL.—Mr. President: In the course of the remarks which I had the honor to present to the Senate yesterday, I endeavored to show that the administration could not consistently with their avowed policy make a treaty with any existing government in Mexico, and I undertook to show the facts and circumstances, on which my argument was based. I referred, in the first place, to the grounds on which this bill was pressed in this body; and, secondly, to the operations of our army itself, as affording evidence that there was no design, no desire to accept any treaty from the existing government; and I called upon honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber, if they pleased, in their discretion, to say whether that was not their view of the now settled policy of the administration. I put the question distinctly and directly whether a treaty by the existing government in Mexico ceding New Mexico and California to the United States would be regarded as satisfactory. I supposed that they would be obliged to answer in the negative upon the ground that although affording ample "indemnity for the past," it did not afford "security for the future," and that these terms were a substantive part of the settled policy of the Executive. I further made, what I observed might be regarded as a bold assertion, that the administration neither expected nor desired a treaty with any existing government in Mexico. I did not say that I would astonish Senators, by my remarks, as the honorable Senator represented me as having done. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs says it was true that he was astonished. But when he came to answer the interrogatory, "will you accept a treaty from the existing government ceding that territory which you have heretofore admitted to be ample indemnity?" he could not answer in the affirmative. He answered precisely as I supposed he was bound to answer. It was for the purpose of bringing out these answers that I submitted these inquiries, in a manner which he regarded as going beyond the due parliamentary license. My object indeed was to press gentlemen, and that gentleman in particular, because he stood at the head of that committee, and is supposed to know the policy of the administration on a question so important as the present. He answered then, in substance, as I supposed he was obliged to answer, that they could not take a treaty from any existing government, or any faction which might arise, if no security for future peace was conceded. And when the question was further pressed on the distinguished gentleman, "what do you mean by 'security?'" he replied, that his attention had been directed by the resolutions of the gentleman from Indiana to the Sierre Madre as a proper boundary; but he did not limit his "security" to that line. He went on to speak of the right of the conqueror, when the government of the conquered nation was unsettled—when anarchy took the place of order, and the people were turbulent, to hold possession of the conquered country as security for future peace; and he referred us to the case of the Allied Powers, who had kept military occupation of France for a twelvemonth as security for the maintenance of the peace which they had concluded with the new government.

Well, these answers of the honorable gentleman are perfectly natural, rational and consistent with the policy of the administration as I understand it. A military occupation of the interior of the country to some extent is now contemplated by the admission of the Senator. What portion of the country is to be occupied, and how long the occupation is to continue are, as the distinguished gentleman said, things which he could not now point out, as they were to be governed necessarily by contingencies. I shall hereafter show that this is a policy from which they can never extricate themselves, but by holding the country by right of conquest, unless they abandon all that they have done—patch up the best treaty they can with the present government, and under the wings of it flee the country. One word, though out of place, in answer to the statement of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that General Scott estimates seven thousand five hundred as a proper force to be stationed in the city of Mexico. I have never seen, sir, the letter of General Scott which is said to contain these estimates; but I cannot imagine that such a force at that point would be at all necessary, except as a corps de reserve—an army of observation to be employed in the support of other divisions of the army engaged in holding the neighboring States. My estimate of a sufficient garrison for the army of Mexico was founded upon the idea, that all the strongholds, and adjoining and populous States, would be first subdued and occupied by an adequate force. I cannot believe, that General Scott, under the circumstances I had supposed, would consider an army of seven thousand five hundred necessary to hold a city, large as it is, which he captured with a force reduced to six thousand, and when defended by a force three or four times as numerous—now that the enemy had neither army nor resources.

I now propose to resume my argument, at the point at which I had arrived, when the Senate did me the favor to adjourn—the policy of the government, exhibited in the orders of General Scott, in carrying out the plan of raising a revenue in Mexico.

In further support of the views I presented on yesterday, I might have alluded to some parts of the argument of the gallant and distinguished Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) who spoke several times on incidental points in this debate. I remember—I do not see him in his seat now, but I trust I do not misrepresent him—that he pressed, with some earnestness, and, as in all cases when he has addressed the Senate, addressing himself to the feelings as well as the judgment of Senators, the argument that the passage of this bill was necessary to relieve broken-down remnants of regiments that had fought through several successive sanguinary actions with the enemy; regiments which had been reduced from eight hundred or a thousand men, to two or three hundred. But what I particularly remarked was his argument in favor of regulars instead of volunteers. He said that, however valuable volunteers might be in action—when an army was in motion—that there was no comparison between their value, in a protracted military occupation like this, and regular soldiers. And, as I understood him, he considered that it would be chiefly garrison duty to which the army would hereafter be called in Mexico—the holding of the conquered towns and fortresses. I noticed this, and bring it to the attention of the Senate, for the purpose of showing that the tenor of the argument generally on the other side tends to support the views which I have advanced. Not only is it the policy of the administration not to make a treaty with the existing government, because they cannot obtain the "security" which they demand, but it is to continue the military occupation of the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—It is true, as stated by the Senator, that in the course of this debate, the remarks which I have offered, have been to isolated points, such as were supposed to be directly connected with the bill under discussion, and presented as briefly as the nature of the case would allow—so briefly that it appears my meaning has been misconstrued. My observations upon the subject of military posts, and the character of troops suited to the service of permanent garrisons, were made with no such purpose under no such idea, as the Senator seems to suppose.

I contended that "regulars" were to be preferred for the reasons then offered, in positions which were to be held by a stationary force, retained in possession for a long time; not to fix the limit of territorial acquisition, still less to interfere with the political institutions of Mexico. I distinctly declared my opinion, that our government by the fundamental principles upon which it rests, is forbidden from dictating the policy or interfering in the internal affairs of any other government. Posts and garrisons are necessary to preserve lines of communication. Extended military lines were spoken of as required to destroy cooperation between the different sections of the enemy, and to prevent the central government of Mexico, against which this war has been directed, from reestablishing its power, and again concentrating the scattered fragments of its army, to renew active hostilities against us. The occupation of those lines, recommended itself to me; not as a mode of permanent possession but as means to hasten the often declared object, the much desired consummation of this war, an honorable peace.

Convinced that regulars were better suited than volunteers to garrison posts—that our volunteers should not be required to remain in service for mere garrison duties, longer than necessity demands—and that we require new posts in remote regions, this bill is commended by every consideration which has been conclusively presented to my mind. As a reason for supporting the bill under consideration, I spoke on the occasion referred to by the Senator, of a military line which should extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I did not then define the line, but will now do so if the Senator wishes. That line, as contemplated by me, would begin at Tampico, ascend the valley of the Panuco to the mountains, then turn northward and follow the range of the Sierra Madre, keeping always the ridge which overlooks the waterless desert to the west and south, pass around the lakes of Parras, cross the valley of Chihuahua, follow the range of mountains which bound it on the west, at about the parallel of thirty degrees north latitude, bear west and pursue the highlands which limit the valley of the Gila, cross the Colorado river, and terminate on the Pacific, so as to include the harbor of San Diego. This was proposed as a military line. I believed that a vast country north and east of it would be rendered quiet by the occupation of the four practicable passes through the natural barrier along which it runs; that great results would be effected at the least expenditure of means and of men, and that regular troops were most appropriate to the service. My policy, I repeat, was not the permanent occupation of Mexico, but to force from her a peace by every proper means of pressure, and hasten the termination of our general occupation of that country. Again, I will state as my reason for wishing to increase our army so largely, the belief that its visible strength must be such as to destroy in the enemy all hope of resistance, before he will seriously incline to peace. Though very unwilling to occupy the time of the distinguished Senator, his points of reference required me to reply. I desire an early peace, and believe that a government exists in Mexico which has the ability to treat; that President Herrera, sustained by the new congress, and the new army of Mexico, is competent to suppress factious opposition to negotiation, and under an honorable peace to maintain his government against revolutionary assault. With such a government we ought to treat, and I devoutly pray we may treat, even before the honorable Senator shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. BELL.—I unite heartily in the prayer of the Senator that we may have peace. In regard to his remarks I have only to say, that there may have been, as I stated yesterday, a modified policy adopted; and one which would be consistent with the line of the Sierra Madre as the "security" which they want. But, I think this is at last a new construction assumed by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, as one satisfactory to him.

Mr. DAVIS.—Assumed last November a year ago.

Mr. BELL.—He is consistent. Can he answer for other honorable Senators—for the administration of this government? For the power which has greater influence than he or the Senate too, unless we choose, by the united voice of the two Houses, to control it? Can he answer that he has the confirmation of one-third of this body—I mean of those on his side on the Chamber? What security will such a line give for peace? The reason why they did not refer to a line twelve months ago was, that they had a treaty, no peace. They wanted to coerce a peace.

Mr. DOWNS.—I ask the Senator what line he would be willing to accept?

Mr. BELL.—I do not mean any discourtesy, but I beg to inform the Senator that before I close my remarks I will state my views upon that point. My argument is intended to demonstrate, that the administration is already carrying out their policy of holding the country by military occupation until a government may be formed—matured and strengthened into such a degree of consistency that it will be able to give the securities demanded. I may be wrong, however. Individual Senators on the other side of the Chamber, it is very obvious, are not united in sentiment upon this subject. Some distinguished Senators who have spoken, differ with the administration, if we look at what is said in the message, and among themselves. And I may say, looking at the immense magnitude of the question, honorable gentlemen may well differ. It is a fearful question in some of its aspects.

Assuming as I do, and I think upon the strongest ground, that the military occupation of Mexico is to be continued until such a government shall be established, as shall afford the desired security, I propose to enquire whether the undertaking be practicable. I ask the attention of the Senate to the statement of a few prominent facts, in relation to the character and condition of the Mexican population, collected from the best sources of information within my reach.

I know a distinguished Senator (Mr. BENTON,) who is far better informed than I am upon this subject, and whose judgment would be entitled to far greater weight. It was my fortune, many years ago, to listen to an argument of that Senator, in a different tribunal, in which his familiar and extensive knowledge of the Spanish character, their colonial policy, their laws and institutions, was manifest. He knows well the materials which now exist in Mexico for forming a government, and he knows the obstacles that lie in the way. I trust that we shall yet hear from that distinguished Senator, who now sets so much at his ease, on the other side of this chamber, upon this subject.

The best informed differ in their estimates of the population of Mexico. Some rate it at eight or ten millions, and others as low as seven millions. I assume eight millions as the medium. Of the eight millions there are probably not less than five millions of Indians of pure blood; two millions of what are denominated the casts or mixed race, consisting of Mestizos, Mulattos and Zombos, who rank in society in the order in which I have mentioned them; and one million of the Spanish or white race. Between these several races or casts there exists a reciprocal antipathy, assuming to contempt on the one side, and jealousy and hatred on the other. A white skin is still, as at the period of the conquest, a patent of nobility and just in proportion to the amount of the blood of the white man, which flows in the veins of the several castes, do they assert an superiority over all below them. The antipathies and jealousies founded on the distinction of races, appear, from all history to be deeply seated in natural causes and principles. In Mexico, these natural causes were strengthened and fostered by the jealous policy of the Spanish monarchy. The laws and institutions of the Vice Regal government of the colonies, cultivated and promoted the natural antipathy and hatred between the Indian and the white and mixed races, as a means of maintaining the dominion of the parent country against the influence and ambition of the Spanish Creole population, which were always a subject of serious alarm to the Spanish monarch. But the emancipation of Mexico from the dominion of Spain appears to have wrought but little change in the general condition or the disposition of the several castes or races towards each other. At the breaking out and during the revolution, the Spanish race, from motives of policy conciliated the castes or mixed races, by allowing them a higher grade in society; but, except the cultivated class among the mixed races, they still rank below the white race.

Of this compound mass of population, the white race now, as at all times, are the real lords of the country; asserting the natural superiority of their race, and controlling all others. They, together with the cultivated portion of the mixed race, are also the holders of nearly all the property of the country. The clergy, the military and high civil functionaries, are all taken from this class; and, in the practical operation of the Mexican government, the clergy and military constitute a privileged class. They are such by the legal exemptions which they enjoy. The castes or mixed race are next in degree of influence and importance, both in social and political relations; but with the exception of the cultivated few among them, they are a degraded class. But it is the vast Indian population which most demands our attention. The Indians have been for three centuries, a degraded, dependent, melancholy race, poverty stricken, ignorant; a living but inanimate mass of human beings; outcasts in their own land, taking no interest in public affairs, though recognized as freemen by the Mexican constitution; their religion a mummery, and even, it is said, in many districts, indulging their ancient superstitions; residing in separate villages, and cultivating a small allotment of land in common. Such is their general condition, especially in the populous States of the South. Until the period of the revolution, they were in a state of pupilage, and not allowed by law to contract debts beyond the small sum of three dollars. They were, for the reasons I have before stated, kept in a state of rigorous seclusion—no white man being by law permitted to settle in their villages. From this, I admit, very imperfect description of the condition of the different races which compose the population of Mexico, it will be readily granted that there is—there can be no sympathy—no common ties to unite them: there can be no unity, no individuality, no nationality, no equality of social condition; but, on the contrary, irreconcilable hatreds and jealousies. Yet such are the materials out of which it is proposed to construct a government upon the principles of republican equality; such a government as will hereafter stand against all the assaults of faction. But I have not stated all the obstacles to such a scheme. In no country of the world is there so great a degree of inequality in the distribution of property. Even among the white race this inequality stands out as a prominent feature in their relative condition. This of itself is a great obstacle, and you must resort to confiscation and banishment, to secure a settled government, founded upon equal rights and privileges.

Again, sir, when you shall attempt to regenerate and enlighten the Indian masses, you will have to encounter the inconvenience of twenty different languages now spoken in different States and districts of Mexico.

There is another circumstance in the condition of Mexico, which, to my mind, presents an insuperable barrier to the policy of founding and sustaining the sort of government which seems to be contemplated; the only sort of government which our own system will tolerate. Beside the want of all affinity and sympathy between the different castes, and the inequality in their social conditions, even the better, informed classes are centuries in arrear of the march of mind; of the intellectual development which characterizes most of the old States of Europe and of this country. The overweening influence of the hierarchy, of the higher clergy in matters of government concern, and the despotism which prevails in the religion of Mexico, are, at once, the evidence, and may be the cause of this intellectual inferiority. I say nothing of the Romish church, as to its orthodoxy or otherwise. It may be the truest and purest of the sects. It may be the true primitive or apostolic faith. With this I have nothing to do; but it is remarkable that from the days of Luther to the day wherever protestantism has most prevailed, there, conclaid planted deepest and strongest the seeds and the growth of civil liberty; and I affirm that where there is no freedom of religious inquiry, no religious toleration, there has been no such resurrection of mind as qualifies the inhabitants for the enjoyment of a free and equal government.

But it is said of this party of the Puros, which I have already noticed, embracing a large class—the industrious and enterprising of all the different castes—the ranchero, or small proprietor, the artizan and the merchant, including the muleteers, said to be respectable for their honesty, and the professions, all together combining a large share of intelligence, are friendly to the present policy of the administration, and that with the aid, and through the instrumentality of their chiefs or leaders, you can build up a government. It is with this party in Mexico, as I have already shewn, that you are in some sort in alliance. And I now assert that you cannot take another step in this policy, with safety and honor; that from the moment of your entrance upon the next stage of progress in the execution of this policy, you will be committed beyond retreat. No, sir, the moment you compromise this party, by calling their chiefs and representatives together for the purpose of forming a new government, you are irrevocably bound to the policy of a continued military occupation. You expose them to the never-dying hostility and resentment of every other interest and faction in Mexico; of the hierarchy, who fear the overthrow of their religion; of the large landed proprietors and the military, who fear the extinction of their long enjoyed power and influence; and if there be any remains of the ancient Castilian pride and spirit in the country, it will be roused to indignant and inextinguishable opposition to those of their own countrymen who may lend themselves to the project of forming a government under the protection of foreign bayonets. No, sir, when you shall have once committed yourselves fully to this policy, in conjunction with the Puros, you can never abandon them. It would be perfidious and disgraceful to do so. The civilized world would cry out against you, should you leave them to the vengeance of their powerful enemies.

But, if you allow no force to this argument, when you shall have constituted this new government under the protection of your armies, how long is the experiment of its stability to be continued? When will you know that you may safely withdraw your army? How long is it supposed your nurture will be required, before you can leave your bantling to stand alone? When all shall be quiet, when there shall be no hostile array in the country? Does any one doubt that, from the moment when your armies shall have overrun the whole country, and every strong-hold and large city shall be occupied by your garrisons; when the present hostile chiefs shall have found that further resistance will be fruitless against your overwhelming forces, that they will retire to their estates and submit to your authority? Then, all will be peace; but will they carry with them no slumbering spirit of resentment; no fierce determination of resistance and revenge, to be stirred into action the moment you shall fancy that all is safe, and you shall withdraw your forces? Do you consider the race with which you have to deal? They are the descendants, in part, of the Celtiberians, who are said, in ancient history, never to have signed in death—the terror of the armies of Rome, and who, in the defence of Numantia, their last remaining fortress, preferred perishing by famine, to submission to Roman aggression;—in part, of the Suevi and Visigoths, who finally crushed that colossal power. They are Spaniards, who walk the streets and highway, carrying the stiletto under their sleeve, the dagger under the folds of their cloaks, and bide their time. The race has deteriorated; but still, blood will shew itself, at the distance of centuries, when the cup of bitterness overflows, and when the oppressor least expects it.

I have inquired how long this experiment of establishing a stable government in Mexico, by military occupation is to continue, and if it will not be regarded as too great a descent from high considerations, I would now inquire what is to be the cost of this experiment? Does any one imagine that a less period than from three to five years, will be sufficient to overcome all the obstacles which now exist to a settled government in Mexico? I may be told that we can withdraw one or two years one or two years one army of occupation may be safely reduced one-half, or to a force of twenty-five thousand. But this must depend upon contingencies. I have already stated that an army of 40,000 men, cannot be supported in Mexico at a less annual cost than $40,000,000. I have also supposed that after you shall have subdued all the states to your authority, and with the assistance of your navy, you blockade her ports, you may derive a revenue of $30,000,000, from Mexico. This will leave an annual cost to this country of $30,000,000, for the army alone, until the force in Mexico can be safely reduced. But the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs, in giving his views of the importance of occupying the mining districts of Zacatecas and San Luis Potosi, informed us that he had received assurance from a distinguished officer in Mexico, that a revenue might be derived from these states so large, that he would decline stating the amount lest it should be deemed incredible. And this is the mode by which this country is to be reconciled to the military occupation of Mexico for a series of years. Why one would be led to suppose, that the army had nothing to do but to seize the mines, and that they would find the silver and gold already separated from the ore, and in marvellous quantities; or that the mines could continue to be wrought by the proprietors, and all the products be handed over to our collecting officers. But does not every Senator know that the mining of the precious metals is conducted with immense cost, and that all that the government or the army can exact, cannot exceed a rate which will leave a due profit to the proprietors. From the grasping character of the Mexican government, to say nothing of its necessities, it may well be supposed that the produce of the mines was taxed at the highest rate it could bear; and I have seen no estimate of the amount of revenue drawn from that source, including the tax on coinage, which exceeds two millions, including the transit duty. The gross annual product of the mines in all Mexico, does not exceed 20,000,000, and twenty per cent on 20,000,000, would be one fifth; the highest assessment levied by the government of Spain, in the days of the Vice-Regal government. In addition to the revenue derived from this source, if you should succeed in reviving the foreign trade of the country, continue the blockade of all the ports of Mexico, and keep the communication with the interior open, you may derive $6,000,000, from the customs. Besides these, you can collect $3,000,000, in direct taxes; after abolishing the tobacco monopoly, the internal duties, and lotteries, and surrendering the remaining sources of revenue to the states or local governments, which in pursuance of the policy of the administration you have already done, $11,000,000, will be the highest amount of revenue, you can expect to derive for the support of your army; and this only after you shall have overrun and occupied all the States. At this time, supposing that you have reduced Zacatecas, San Louis Potosi, and Queretaro, to your authority, you are in possession of ten states, and, if Chihuahua is to be included, eleven. General Scott by his financial regulations in Mexico, has imposed upon the several states of Mexico, $3,000,000, payable monthly by the states occupied by our army. At this rate, one million may be derived from the eleven states now in our power, within a year. You may be receiving $2,000,000, from the customs, and $500,000, from all other sources of revenue, not abandoned or surrendered to the states. Thus the whole amount of revenue, after all your brilliant successes, you are now in the receipt of, in pursuance of the policy of compelling Mexico to pay the expense of the military occupation of the country, does not exceed the rate of $3,500,000.

But, Mr. President, these are mere speculations, and, after all, of little importance to the country. This question involves higher consequences. By the time you shall have perfected your financial regulations in Mexico, and long before you shall have given such strength and power to the new government you propose to erect—long before you shall see the day when you can safely withdraw your army from Mexico, with the securities you desire, a new element of control will have intervened—a new and potent influences will have sprung up to set all your plans at naught. Sir, the moment it shall become your known and settled policy to continue the armed occupation of Mexico—that you propose to occupy all the large towns with a competent force to ensure tranquility—that you intend to extend your protection to the highways and all other channels of trade and intercourse, and that this military protection is to endure for a series of years, as it must endure, what must be the inevitable consequence? A current of immigration will set towards Mexico from this country, as irresistible as the torrent of Niagara. The youthful, ardent and enterprising classes of this country, attracted by the thousand rumors which go forth of the untold wealth of the Mexican mines—of the wide, and yet unoccupied field for successful enterprize in every branch of industry, will soon spread themselves over the whole country. They will soon become proprietors of the soil; under the guarantee of the new government of your formation, they will become agriculturists, establish factories, and become the most useful and productive class in the country. They will send for their families, or form family connections with the native white population. Yes, sir, before two years shall have passed in the execution of your present policy, hundreds of thousands of your own citizens will have become domiciliated in Mexico. Your citizen soldiers, too, will have become domiciled to a permanent residence in the land their arms have conquered. They, too, will have contracted ties and obligations which they will not be willing to abandon. Then, when you shall suppose that the time has come when you can safely withdraw your army, a cry of remonstrance will come up from Mexico, such as will find an echo, a lively sympathy at home, in the hearts of tens of thousands who now imagine that no necessity can ever arise strong enough to reconcile them to the subjugation of the whole of Mexico. These influences will be felt in all the departments of the government—they will be felt in this chamber. It will not be the Pures only, but it will be your own countrymen who will call upon you to save them, their families, and their property, from the resentment, oppression, and spoliation of the powerful factions which will be ready to spring up and overturn the new government. That "force of circumstances," so often and so significantly alluded to in this debate, will then acquire tenfold power over the sentiments and opinions of the people of this country, and over the public councils. It is heresy before strong enough to impel you to the policy of continuing this war, by carrying it to the very heart of Mexico, and then to engage you, in the plan of creating a new government, and it will at last impel you, with far greater reason, to hold the permanent sovereignty of the whole country by right of conquest.

This, sir, will be the last act in the great political drama we are now enacting. This is to be the consummation of the policy already shadowed forth in the message. This is not merely a nascent policy; it exists not in embryo only; I have attempted to show that it has germinated already. That it is not merely a vague, floating idea in the brain of the President, will fully appear from the message. I beg leave to read a few passages from it. After alluding to the probable "insecurity of the present government in Mexico," and suggesting that it may become proper to give "assurances of protection to the friends of peace in Mexico, in the establishment and maintenance of a new republican government of their own choice," and thus converting the "war which Mexico has forced upon us into an enduring blessing to herself," the President concludes what he had to say upon this part of the subject, in this significant language:

"If, after affording this encouragement and protection, and after all the persevering and sincere efforts we have made from the moment Mexico commenced the war, and prior to that time, to adjust our differences with her, we shall ultimately fail, then we shall have exhausted all honorable means in pursuit of peace, and must continue to occupy her country, and, with our troops, taking the full measure of indemnity into our own hands, and must inforce the terms which our honor demands."

What "the taking of the full measure of indemnity into our hands" points to, whoever now doubts cannot be influenced by any reasoning it is in my power to employ.

But it is not the President only who appears to have looked to the permanent acquisition of all Mexico, as the probable result of the war pursued in the prosecution of the war. I have in my hands a copy of a letter addressed by the Secretary of State, (Mr. Buchanan,) upon this subject, to a public meeting in Philadelphia, in which he sums up his views upon the war question in the following language:

"The capital of Mexico is now the headquarters of our conquering army, and yet such is the genius of our free institutions, that, for the first time, its peaceful and well disposed citizens enjoy security in their private rights, and the advantage of a just and firm government. From all that can be learned, they appreciate our protection at its proper value, and dread nothing so much as the withdrawal of our army. They know this would be the signal for renewed and fierce dissentions among their military leaders, in which the Mexican people would become the victims. In this wretched condition of affairs, justice to them and to ourselves may require that we should protect them in establishing upon a permanent basis, a republican government—able and willing to conclude and maintain an equitable treaty of peace with the United States. After every effort to obtain such a treaty, should we finally fail in accomplishing the object, and should the military factions in Mexico still persist in waging upon us a useless war, then we must fulfil the destiny which Providence may have in store for both countries.

"In any event, we owe it to the glories of the past, to the duties of the present, and the hopes of the future, never to falter in the vigorous prosecution of this war, until we shall have secured a just and honorable peace. The people of the United States will act upon this determination, as surely as that indomitable perseverance in a righteous cause is a characteristic of our race."

But other powerful and influential supporters of the administration have also furnished pregnant and alarming evidences that this idea of conquering and holding all Mexico has been largely entertained. Need I refer to the resolution introduced into this body by my friend, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] or to the resolution on the same subject, introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON?] They speak for themselves.

There are others who have spoken upon this subject, too prominent in the country to be passed over, without notice here. I allude to opinions expressed by officers of the army. I have understood that a letter has appeared in one of the public journals of the country, from a distinguished and gallant general recently returned from Mexico, (General Quitman,) in which he expressed himself favorably to this policy. I would be sorry to misrepresent this distinguished officer, for I have a high respect, both for his patriotism and his intelligence; and, if I am in error, and any honorable Senator has it in his power to set me right, I will thank him to do so. Another gallant and distinguished general, (Gen. Shields,) I observe has expressed the sentiment on a public convivial occasion, that the whigs are "warring against a high and indomitable necessity."

The distinguished and able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has told us, that although he does not anticipate the annexation of all Mexico, yet that he sees nothing so alarming in such a result. I could multiply the proofs, beyond the patience of the Senate to listen to, that this gigantic scheme of annexation has been gravely considered, and found favor with the administration, if it be not its settled policy. But, sir, whatever may be the real views of the President, and his cabinet upon the subject, I have, I think, conclusively shown that the inevitable tendency and results of the policy they advocate, and which is now in full progress in Mexico, is, and will be its subjugation. Considering this point established, it becomes a duty of the last importance to consider now—I say now, while we have it in our power to control the future issues of this war—what we shall do with all Mexico, when it is annexed to the Union. Yes, sir, I repeat this question—what will you do with it? Will you annex it in the form of States? Let us see what will be the consequences of such a procedure. The several States or provinces of Mexico, twenty-one in number, now enjoy a separate political organization, with sufficient population in each, to form a State under our system, except two. These may be well merged into one; which would still leave twenty new States to be admitted into the Union, besides the territories, by a single legislative fiat. By the constitution of the United States, you are bound to guarantee a republican form of government to any new State admitted into the Union. Well, sir, besides three millions of the white and mixed races, there will be in the twenty States of Mexico a population of five millions of Indians of the pure aboriginal stock.—They are freemen by the present laws and constitution of Mexico. What will the spirit of progressive democracy, which now exercises so large an influence in this country, permit us to them? Would it not claim for them the enjoyment of the right of suffrage? Is it not the genius of this new and enlarged system of political philosophy, to inculcate fraternal union upon the most perfect equality, with all mankind? But suppose this point waived, and that it shall be determined to suspend the political rights and privileges of the Indian for a time; still, upon the principles of our own established system, you must permit them to be represented in the national legislature. They are freemen, of a race superior to the African, and you cannot deny to the States of which they compose a majority of the population, this right. Then, assuming one hundred thousand as the ratio of representation, you will have eighty new members added to the House of Representatives; fifty of whom will represent an Indian population alone. But it is the Senate that I may congratulate upon the largest addition to its present dignity and importance. We shall have forty new Senators; and as the mixed races of Mexico are, by habit and by a jects to state to mental superiority, admitted to an equality of social and political privileges. It is to be hoped that we shall always have a portion of the new Senators of this estate who, by the severity of their complexion, will give new interest and attraction to this body. Why, sir, at this rate of advance in our schemes of national aggrandizement, we shall be subject to great changes of every description. The capital will be found to have been projected upon quite too limited and narrow a view of our destiny. We shall have to dispense with it, and rear one commensurate with the grandeur of our system; or, rather, it will soon become expedient to centralize the national metropolis.

But, sir, you hesitate. You recoil from this view of the subject: you turn aside from this picture, and say you will adopt a policy less revolting to the popular feelings and judgment, that for a time, at least, you will hold Mexico in the form of territories or provinces subject to your regulation and government; that in this mode you will govern Mexico until, by immigration, there shall be such an infusion of the white race, in all the provinces, as to secure to them the superiority of numbers and influence; and then you can adopt them into the Union, as States, upon an equal footing with the present States of the Union. But you will still have five millions of Indians on hand, to be an ever-eating canker on your system. What will you do with these? They must have space; you must leave them their villages and commons, you cannot drive them into the Pacific, on one side, or into the Gulf, on the other. You cannot exterminate them. You will not be more cruel than the Spaniards. You say that you will take them under your tutelage; that you will enlighten them, commencing with your military officers and soldiers, as their first teachers, and the bayonet for the rod of discipline; that you will stimulate this inanimate mass into life and energy by the influences of trade; by giving them the benefits of just and equal laws; that you will thus gradually induct them into the knowledge and duties of free institutions, and that after the lapse of a few generations you may hope they will be qualified to enjoy all the privileges of the white race. A happy termination to this beneficent scheme! But all history—all experience, is against it.

There is another consideration deserving attention, though of less importance, when you shall have resolved upon holding Mexico as an appendage or subject province or provinces. What will you do with the public debt of Mexico, which is said to be now $100,000,000—$60,000,000 of which is due to foreign creditors? Will you repudiate it? If you do, you may bring an old house down upon your heads. Will you seize and confiscate the property and revenues of the clergy? It is said the higher clergy have a great amount of debt against the large proprietors of mines and other estates, secured by mortgages. I have heard is estimated as high as $170,000,000. I have it also upon good authority, that the Puros party, in conjunction with which you propose to establish a new government, have long contemplated, as one of their objects in aspiring to power, the confiscation of those debts, to pay the public debt of the country, and to appropriate the remainder to the construction of roads and other works of general utility. Will you carry out this policy when you shall assume the absolute dominion of Mexico? If you do, what will you say, how will you excuse yourselves, to the new Pope of Rome and Bishop Hughes? These are troublesome questions, but I trust that Senators will see that they deserve consideration.

Permit me now, sir, to call the attention of the Senate to some of the further consequences which may attend this scheme of conquest and annexation. When it shall be known in Europe that you have solemnly decided upon the policy of extending your dominion over all Mexico, will there be no disposition among the large and powerful states of that continent to interpose and prevent the consummation of your magnificent scheme of national aggrandizement? Upon this point, I would respectfully inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if the disposition of foreign courts has been sounded upon this subject. I can hardly suppose that it has not been done. It may, and probably will be said that we will permit no interference of any foreign power; that they have no right to interfere, and the moment such a movement is made, the whole population will rise up to resist the audacious attempt. Still, sir, the great powers of Europe may choose to interfere. I do not think they will, for several reasons. Great Britain, with her large colonial possessions on our northern border, and her commercial interests and ascendency, will have most cause to watch our career of conquest; but still she, with the other monarchies of Europe, may look on in quiet complacency, shrewdly supposing that we may, in our extravagant attempts on all Mexico, do for ourselves the worst their united arms could do, and with far less cost to them; that the subjugation of Mexico will be a perpetual drain upon our resources, and reduce instead of adding to our present rank as a military power. Perhaps, too, they may indulge the expectation that in the mad career we are entering upon—that model of a free representative government: that mirror system established in America, which has so long reflected back upon Europe an image of freedom and prosperity and happiness, so seductive yet so dangerous to themselves, will be broken in pieces, never more to be reconstructed.

There are other reasons, however, which may control the councils of Europe. They have their troubles at home. England has her Ireland; France her Algeria, to tax their resources and hold them in check. France, in a period of no little agitation, and with a population which the consummate skill and statesmanship of Louis Philippe has failed to unite, is on the eve of entering upon the experiment of a regency under the reign of a minority prince. England and France are broken, as I said, other and both look with fearful apprehension to the designs of the Autocrat of the north, the great Northern Bear, who only waits the embodiment of those two powers with each other, or with America, to stretch forth one of his huge paws to draw to his strong embrace, the dominions of the Grand Turk, and with the other grasp India, with an internal capacity still remaining sufficient to ingulph all Europe, as one mouthful.

Still, sir, England and France, disregarding all other considerations, may conclude that their commercial and other interests require them to unite in a forcible interference with a policy which looks to the establishment of an unlimited dominion upon this continent, and it behooves us to estimate the consequences of such a determination on their part. The war in which we shall then be engaged will not be confined to the land. It will be an ocean warfare also. To meet their united naval armament of a thousand ships of war, we must enlarge our own naval establishment in a corresponding degree. When Mexico shall find such allies, when the disciplined legions of the combined enemy shall be brought to her assistance on land, instead of fifty, we shall be called on to send one hundred troops to Mexico, and have as many more to defend our sea-coast, then extending from the mouth of the Oregon to the Gulf of Tehuantepec on the Pacific, and from the Bay of Honduras to the Bay of Fundy on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic. Who shall estimate the cost of maintaining such armaments, both by sea and land, as it would then be incumbent upon you to supply? To say that a hundred millions per annum would cover the cost of such a [illegible] over the mark. And where will be the revenue from which this foreign commerce shall be annihilated? Sir, it may be wise and patriotic to speculate [illegible] but it is also the part of wisdom to consider that it is possible, if not probable, and to [illegible] I have, sir, Senators may exclaim—who dreams of such a result? Is a foreign nation to come to war with England and France? Who, sir, ought not to dream of such results when they understand the tendency of our present policy in regard to Mexico? And how often has it happened, that the greatest misfortunes have befallen a country because her statesmen have failed to dream in time of the dangers which impended over them.

I must say, sir, upon this subject of foreign intervention, that the course of this government is any thing but conciliatory towards the powers of Europe. At a moment when we have already seized upon New Mexico and California, and declared your intention never to surrender them; and when, at the same time, you are preparing to grasp all Mexico, you proclaim to the world your determination to allow no transatlantic power to acquire any further foothold in America. While by this declaration you announce what may pass as a sound policy, by your practice you take away all merit from it. You will suffer no other power to add to their dominion by taking advantage of the feeble and distracted conditions of the States of Spanish origin, while you claim the privilege to despoil them at discretion. You will have no partners in the wicked [illegible] You [illegible] monopolist of the spoil and plunder of America.

I now propose, Mr. President, to address myself to another branch of the subject. What will be the effect of subjugating all Mexico, and holding it in form of States or as dependent provinces upon our system of government, our free institutions.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina, shewed a great deal of hardihood, or rather that he is a Statesman of a by-gone age, when he broached the obsolete idea of executive patronage and the duty of keeping it in just and reasonable limits even with our present extent of territorial power and dominion. Who can now speak of the subject of patronage without being thought far in the rear of the times? Why, sir, does not the distinguished Senator know, that from the moment when the doctrine of proscription could be openly avowed, and the right of the ruling party to the exclusive enjoyment of the offices and honors of the country was rigorously practised by one great party; and the justice and propriety of the policy, sustained by a large portion of the other, a final extinguisher was applied to all hope of limiting the patronage of this government upon any old fashioned notion of economy? Yes, sir, I remember the time, since my entrance into public life, when the cry of proscription, of retrenchment and reform, was potent enough with the people of this country to overturn an administration distinguished alike for its economy, honesty, and ability in conducting the affairs of government.

But, sir, we should not despair of resisting, successfully, the avalanche of power and patronage, which now threatens to overwhelm us. Let us inquire for a moment, what will be the amount of patronage which will accrue to the Executive, when Mexico shall be added to our domain, and laid off into separate territories or provinces.

We shall have not less than twenty-five [illegible] territorial, or provincial governments, each of which must have a governor—twenty-four governors—and as many secretaries, to their executive offices; then the judicial corps in each province, two or three judges—an attorney-general, and a marshal. Then will follow collectors of customs, and at numerous ports on the Pacific, and on the Gulf of Mexico, the directors of mine [illegible] Then, for a period at least, we must have a military chief, of a grade not lower than a general, commanding the forces, in each province; and last, though not least, a governor-general for all Mexico. Why, sir, John Bull need not swell himself out, and vaunt himself so lustily any longer. We, too, shall have our Indies; our subject millions ; such much promised governments ; our large standing army ; and though we may not boast an empire on which the sun never sets, yet will it soon extend from the Lake to the frozen seas of the north. With such prospect of extended dominion, what visions of national grandeur and magnificence may we not indulge? Does each magnificent congress revive? don't behold in the seat of Montezuma, each successive president, surrounded with splendor and pomp, and all over the country, Generals and great representatives, and all over the country, Generals and great representatives, and all over the country, Generals and great representatives flowery vales studded with refreshing lakes. There, too, nature has bestowed the often fatal gifts of mountains teeming with the precious metals; and the earthquake not infrequent comes to awaken the guilty conscience of the oppressors. It is a country full of stirring recollections. The pen of Prescott has made it a classic land. It was the theatre of the deepest and darkest tragedy ever enacted. It is the land where once flourished a great and populous empire founded by a race of unknown origin, and of mysterious destiny. Such associations as these things are in themselves, distance gives to them additional charms, and increased enchantment. These are some of the attractions which captivate the imagination of the young, and pervert the judgment of mature age; and we shall see that in due time, they will be heralded forth, throughout this wide country, by a thousand tongues, in strains of vivid and impassioned eloquence. Sir, the gratification of national ambition, the national pride, the love of power and dominion which fill the heart of man, the idea that we belong to a great and powerful nation, how often in the history of the world, have they reconciled the sincerest patriot to despotic rule encircled with glory.

Sir, I confess my own weakness, and when I contemplate this picture of national greatness I often find myself wishing that this future could be realized without danger to the public liberty.—How I would exult if we could only preserve the free institutions of the country, its future prosperity and repose. If such are my own feelings, what must be the effect of the brilliant destinies of the republic presented to the youth of the country, full of ardent and ambitious hopes, and whose impulsive and inexperienced minds seldom pause to weigh the evils which may attend a career of such glittering prospects. Sir, who shall undertake to prophecy a favorable issue to this question when every temptation to ambition, individual and national; when every lure calculated to excite and win over to this scheme of conquest, alike the laudably curious and enterprizing among the youth of the country; and the vicious and corrupt slaves of cupidity—are offered in rich profusion.

We must not forget the army. It is already an element of great influence in the country. Honest and patriotic as our gallant officers and citizen soldiers may be, it is but natural that they will form attachments to the country which has been the scene of their glory, and desire its consolidation with their native land. We have already seen evidences of this feeling in the letters and speeches of gallant officers now in the country. They too, are but men like ourselves, with all our passions and separate interests. While Mexico continues to be the seat of war they may expect to win new laurels in the service of their country. The ambitious among them who have not yet reached marked distinction, will desire new occasions for the display of heroic valor. And when all Mexico shall be subdued to our dominion, and no new fields of martial distinction shall be presented, they may still expect to find employment congenial to their habits.

There is another greater and more formidable influence to be looked to, in the settlement of this question. There is a great and powerful party in this country, a party which, for the last twenty years, with the exception of a slight interval, has held the reins of power and enjoyed the honors and emoluments of the civil service. The result of the late elections have shaken their security, and they may be expected to put forth all their energies to maintain their ascendancy. If the President persists in his present policy a few months longer, the issue must come to be, "the conquest of all Mexico." I do not suppose that every member of the party will yield their settled convictions on this subject for party considerations—far otherwise. We have already heard the voice of opposition to this policy from the other side of this Chamber. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina has led the way; and I trust many others will follow. But party is a tyrant. De Tocqueville was right when he said, that in few countries of the world was political opinion less free than in this free country of ours. Who that has been in public life, has not felt the party lash? What so galling to the feelings of an ingenuous mind and a patriot, as to find himself compelled to relinquish his station, or to yield to the behest or dictation, often of inferior minds, who by superior chance, come to be considered party leaders; and the brightest genius sometimes makes a fatal blunder.

Sir, in calculating the advantages which the supporters of the policy of conquest possess, and the chances of averting such an issue in the coming political conflict, there is one of a peculiar character which deserves to be considered. It arises from the dilemma in which the President is placed, in part by himself and his friends, and in part by the whig opposition. The President very early in the progress of the war, declared his purpose of retaining New Mexico and California. But his friends in the north and east said to him, you shall not take those territories but upon the condition of the Wilmot proviso. The whigs of the south became alarmed, and united with the north in the no-territory policy. Thus was the President checkmated both by his friends and opponents. This was his dilemma; how to escape from it was the question. He had no way to escape but by frankly retracing his steps, acknowledging his error, and making a treaty without the cession of territory; but that few men in high station, and who aspire to the rank of statesmen, can afford to do. It requires a great man, a very great man, to do this. I do not mean to speak offensively of the President. I consider the embarrassment under which he was thus placed in reference to the conclusion of the war, great and serious. If he treated with Mexico without the territories, nothing but the military glory achieved in the war would remain, after all the sacrifices of the country in the prosecution of it. From this embarrassment nothing could relieve him, but the intervention of Congress by declaring the objects of the war. Hence was he tempted continually to a new line of policy; and the refusal of the government of Mexico to treat with Mr. Trist, with the brilliant conquests of Gen. Scott, gave the encouragement to the new and extended objects of the war, which now constitute his avowed policy. And the causes which produced this determination must still embarrass the President in any attempt to close this war unless Congress will relieve him. He is still impelled by a dire moral necessity, either to degrade himself from the rank of statesmen, by the voluntary confession of error, or to take the hazard of elevating himself to a still higher fame, or of losing all by involving his country in a fatal enterprise.

But, sir, the friends and supporters of the President and his administration, are embarrassed by the same causes; they are in a like dilemma with himself, and one in which they involved both him and themselves. Hence the temptation to them to adopt a new and bolder policy; to extend their views far beyond New Mexico and California. A whole party, powerful in resources of skill, talent and patronage, are thus placed in circumstances strongly urging them to an issue which, at one bound clears every barrier —relieves them from all past embarrassments; Wilmot proviso and all—and if they should fail, they will fall in the execution of a bold conception; but if, on the other hand, they should be successful, and carry out the daring project of uniting all Mexico to our Union, the leaders of the enterprise will leave a name in history, of no half way measure of renown or dishonor. The fame of the authors of the movement must rise with the increasing glory of a still free country; or their names will be execrated amid the broken and crumbling ruins of the republic.

Such, sir, are the dangers and temptations to which the country now stands exposed; and if the party in power shall determine to sustain the issue I have supposed, who can estimate its force in the decision which the country must declare.

And what, sir, are the resources of power and influence which the opponents of this scheme have at their command? where the high official stations? what patronage to uphold the public press —to stimulate the zeal of partisans? None, sir, none. They must rely alone upon the moral influence and considerations inherent in the question itself. Does any one inquire where is the whig opposition—the great whig party? Why, sir, as a party the whigs in standing out against this policy are shorn of half their strength by the very idea that their opposition springs from party motives; and further, by their position in seeming to withhold supplies for the prosecution of a war in which the country is engaged with a foreign foe; by the cry of treason and alliance with the public enemy. Instead of an advantage, the idea of a party opposition, from the necessity of the case, is a formidable drawback to the influence of those who look with alarm to the results of the further prosecution of the war.

But, sir, while we thus stand confronted with this question, involving the future liberties of the country; the greatest but one that can ever be debated in this chamber; (the question of union and national existence;) what do we behold? Where are the members of that glorious Whig fraternity? where their great leaders, including the most distinguished and experienced statesmen of the country, and to whom the country mainly looks, and has a right to look, to save it from the impending calamity? Where those to whom the country looks for wise counsel, prompt and energetic action at such a crisis? And what are they doing? Hesitating and faltering in their arrangements for the coming conflict; disputing about old usages; insisting on personal preferences; distracted by narrow sectional jealousies. When the ground on which they stand is volcanic, and they already feel the throbbing of the smothered elements, instead of flying quickly to the only safe refuge that offers, they stop to gather up a budget of old hobbies, precious old wares, some new, personal and mixed, altogether load enough to sink a navy; they pause to consider whether some other mode of escape may not present itself; to see if the threatened shock may not pass off without injury. When the real question is, whether all Mexico shall be annexed, they moot the point whether it would be proper to take a slip of it, more or less, when the north and the south are threatened by one equal fatality, it is debated whether the slave power should not be hedged in by a proviso! Yes, sir, I regret to say that the vomito prieto is not confined to the tierra caliente of Mexico. A politico vomito prieto prevails to an alarming extent at the north and east, which I much fear will prove more destruc tive to our dearest interests, than it has done to our brave soldiers in Mexico. And this, sir, at a period, perhaps the most momentous that has occurred in our history, and when all jealousies, sectional and personal, and the jostling of individual ambition should be resolutely disregarded, those of every section, who are anxious to stand by the republic, and rescue her institutions from the dangers that gather round them, are shorn of their strength, distracted and paralyzed by their own divisions.

Sir, does any of my whig friends consider that I exaggerate the probability that the issue will be such as I have assumed. From the evidences before them do they consider it questionable? Why, sir, if there was nothing else to warn them of the nature of the coming struggle, the speech of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it seems to me, ought to suffice. Have you not seen that able Senator, up to a recent period of his life distinguished for the philosophic vein which runs through all his writings and speeches, fling aside his philosophy and proclaim the superiority of instinct over the conclusions of reason, in estimating military glory as an element of national strength; giving himself up to the encouragement and support of all the extravaganzas of progressive democracy in declaring that he can see no great cause of alarm in the idea of extending our dominion over the whole continent. I mean no offence to that distinguished Senator: I have a high regard both for his talents and his private virtues; but I must say that I am utterly amazed by his remarks upon this subject; I must say of his new course, that though it may be fortunate for him, it must be deeply afflictive to his country. But, upon the introduction of the resolutions offered upon this subject by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] (and may this Senate ever boast one or more such Senators, who may possess the moral courage to rise above party on a question like this and give himself to his country alone,) what more did we hear from the honorable Senator from Michigan? Sir, it was, that the questions presented in the resolutions were mere abstract propositions, which, if adopted, could have no practical operation or influence in preventing the catastrophe against which the resolution was pointed. "Why, sir," exclaimed the Senator, "if the people will the annexation of Mexico, nothing in our power to do, can prevent it; you may as well plant yourself upon the brink of the cataract of Niagara and bid the waters be still."

Well, sir, does the honorable Senator really believe that nothing the Senate can do, no resolution that can be adopted here, no declaration of opinion upon this great question, will have any effect with the country or among the people? And has the Senate sunk so low as to be shorn of all influence? And is it so that the Senate, which is presumed to be composed of gentlemen of large experience in public affairs; statesmen distinguished for their ability and patriotism in the States they represent; on a question involving the greatest consequences, and such as may decide forever the experiments of free republican institutions, can have no influence with the yeomen of the country—with the farmer at his plow, the merchant at his counter or his desk, the mechanic in his workshop—a class which always look only to the good of the country—which is never disturbed nor biased by dreams of personal ambition; and who value their constitution and the Union, as they are as the guarantees of their domestic happiness, the security of their lives and property, and the preservation of their privileges, civil and religious. Sir, I can subscribe to no such conclusion. Sir, does the honorable Senator really suppose that the declaration of his individual opinions and sentiments on this great question, or any other, on this floor, can have no weight with the people of this country? If he does, I can assure the honorable Senator that he greatly undervalues the estimation in which he is held in this country, both for his talents and his patriotism. Sir, whenever that day shall come that the opinions of the American Senate can have no influence in correcting the impulses of popular feeling, the hastily formed and ill-considered opinions of the people upon a question involving their liberties, I shall not calculate how long those liberties may endure, or how soon they may perish.

Mr. President, I have reflected much upon the question in all its grave aspects, and I feel compelled to express the conviction, that as a people enjoying the fruits of a free system of government, we stand on the very brink of our fate. If we do not stop this war now, or before another new year—one step further in our present course, and we shall be borne by an irresistible current beyond retreat or rescue, into irretrievable misfortune and ruin. If we are saved it will be by the providence of God, not of man.

There is something, Mr. President, in our present relations with Mexico—something so unusual, not to say wonderful, in all the incidents of this war, that, were I superstitious, I should say that a higher power than ours holds and controls the issues of it, and for purposes we may not comprehend. The instances of individual self-sacrifice, of reckless, yet successful, adventure, of such frequent occurrence in this war, carry us back in search of parallel examples, to the heroic ages of antiquity, and seem fitter subjects for fabulous and romantic narrative, than the sober pages of truthful history. There is no record in the history of modern warfare, nor ancient either, of a more brilliant and uninterrupted series of well fought battles and wondrous results, against such odds, as that which now forms part of the imperishable annals of the republic; and when we contemplate the intrepidity and skill of our officers —the impetuous valor which has distinguished every corps of one army, whether of regular soldiers or of volunteers—a valor which neither natural obstructions, nor military defences, nor a force often five times more numerous, could arrest in their rapid and victorious career, we are involuntarily reminded of the similar and thrilling exploits of Cortez in the same fields of military fame—in the land which, by this double act of conquest, seems devoted. It is now about three hundred years, since that extraordinary man, with a band of adventurers, less than seven hundred in number, urged on by two of the strongest passions of our nature, cupidity and religious fanaticism landed upon an unknown shore, burnt his ships, attacked—and after enacting scenes, so mixed of craft cruelty and blood, yet so gilded over, with feats of high chivalry and dauntless courage, that the muse of history pauses in her task, and hesitates to praise or blame—overthrew a populous and powerful empire. These victorious adventurers were the ancestors and countrymen, of that race which ever since, has held sway over the conquered country, whatever form the government has assumed, whether Vice Regal or free. It was an Indian race, that peopled the empire which Cortez overturned; and they were the ancestors and countrymen of the same race, which now inhabit the land of their fathers. They were made serfs—the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, to their new masters three centuries ago; with some amelioration, they continue to be so to this day—though free in name, they still wear the badges of a subject people—still remain the victims of conquest and of their primeval caste and complexion. Whatever faction rules for the hour, they are still the sufferers. What religion fails to exact from them, their proud and insolent conquerors, extort, under the pretext of government support, or to maintain an army which oppresses them in peace, and gives them no protection in war. Wonderful retribution! That at the distance of centuries, the descendents of the original spoilers should be made to suffer the penalty of the wrongs committed by their forefathers; that they in turn should be trodden under the iron heel of war; be made to pass under the yoke of the conqueror.

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to moralize upon the extraordinary and mysterious vicissitudes and coincidences in the fortunes of nations, I would ask, what are our motives, what our purposes in the further prosecution of this war? Are we sure, sir, that among those who direct this war—who put all this chivalry in motion in a foreign land, are not tainted with the lust of conquest? Are we sure that whatever cause of war may have existed at its origin, other motives and other objects have not supervened less defensible in their character, than the rights and honor of the country, the only legitimate causes of the war? Are the invaders of this ill-fated country, of the 19th century, so pure and upright in all their objects, and so far elevated above the passions of those of the 16th, that they may hope to escape the retribution which awaited them, and which has ever awaited the conqueror and oppressor.

It is said of Scipio—not he that overcame Hannibal, but Scipio, the destroyer of Carthage—that when surveying the scene of carnage and desolation around him, and when he saw the wife of Horshubal, arrayed in her richest apparel, slowly ascending to the summit of the temple which rose above the conflagration, and thence, after stabbing her children, precipitating herself into the burning elements below, he wept; but it was not over Carthage.—Rome rose up to his view, with all her crimes and oppressions, and he saw inscribed on the rolls of her future history, the sentence of eternal justice, that she, too, must fall.

Sir, if any should now desire to know my poor opinion upon the proper mode of terminating this war, I say to them, make the best treaty with any existing government you can. If you must have the territories of New Mexico and California, get a cession of them; if you cannot do that, come back to the Rio Grande—to the boundary you claim title to, and thus save your honor.

My advice is, stop the war! Flee the country as you would a city doomed to destruction by fire from Heaven!

Mr. SEVIER took the floor, and

On motion

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1848.

THE PEA PATCH CASE.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE laid before the Senate a report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a copy of the minutes and other papers in the case of the Pea Patch Island

On motion by Mr. DAYTON, it was Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CASS presented the memorial of Orville B. Dibble and George C. Bates, praying a grant of the right of way and a portion of the public land for the construction of a canal around the falls of the St. Mary's river in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Adams county, Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for the speedy termination of the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ASHLEY presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Arkansas, praying the removal of the raft of the Red river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

MAP OF MEXICO, ETC.

Mr. RUSK submitted the following resolution for consideration:

[illegible]

Mr. BENTON.—I wish all these resolutions to take the regular course. The one now offered will come in due time, after it has been referred to the appropriate committee.

The resolution lies over.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following, which he designs to offer as an amendment to the bill authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made, under Indian treaties, to alienate the same in fee; which was ordered to be printed:

[illegible]

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following, which he designs to offer as an amendment to the bill to repeal part of the act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights, approved September 4, 1841; which was ordered to be printed:

[illegible]

An act, to amend the act entitled, "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4, 1841.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, gave notice that on Monday next, or some early day thereafter, he would ask leave of the Senate, to introduce a bill to authorize the relinquishment of the 16th section, in certain cases, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James F. Sothoron, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS ADOPTED.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of David Whelply, and, on concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the petition of David Whelply, be referred and not be granted by actual Congress.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions, on the petition of John Searing, one of the heirs of Mary Allen; and, on concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner be not granted.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making an appropriation for removing obstructions in the Savannah river; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish a permanent general pre-emption system, in favor of actual settlers on the public lands.

The bill having been partially read—

Mr. PHELPS suggested the propriety of suspending the reading of the bill. It was evident, from what had been read, that it proposed to introduce an entirely new system in the policy of the government relative to the public lands, and it would, unquestionably excite discussion. It was hardly expedient to enter into its consideration now. He moved that it be passed over informally.

Mr. ASHLEY did not object to the suggestion, if the bill could be taken up at an early period. It was true that it proposed changes in the public land policy, and these changes were called for in justice to the settlers in the new States. He was willing it should be deferred, if taken up at an early period. It was substantially the same bill which was before the Senate at last session, and was then partially discussed. He would not press it now, if the gentleman would name an early day for its consideration.

Mr. BREESE suggested Monday week.

Mr. ASHLEY then moved that the bill be made the special order for Monday week.

Mr. BADGER remarked that another bill already had been set down as the special order for that day.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That said bill be postponed to, and made the special order for, Monday the 21st February instant.

PRIVATE BILL PASSED.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Hoggatt; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

HALF PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill amending the act entitled "An act entitled an Act granting half pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in cases of deceased officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers', passed July 4, 1836;" and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time —

The bill was then laid over until to-morrow.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. SEVIER.—Mr. President: If the discussion with which we have been honored for the last two or three weeks, had been confined to the merits of the bill which proposes to add ten regiments to our military establishment in Mexico, it is very certain that I should have taken no part in this debate. My inexperience, practically and in theory in military affairs, would have been my apology for my silence. It is not my purpose now to dwell at any length upon the merits of this bill. I shall vote for it, because such a measure has been asked of us by the proper constitutional authorities of our country, to whom belongs the management of all our wars, and because it has been favorably recommended by the experienced and intelligent gentlemen of the Military Committee, to whom the investigation of such a subject properly belongs. I shall vote for it, because I regard it as an essential measure to obtain, what we all profess so much to desire, a speedy and permanent peace with Mexico: and until that peace shall be had, as a wise financial arrangement, by which our Treasury will be relieved, to a sensible extent, from the burthens which this war have thrown upon it. For these general reasons, avoiding all details, I shall vote for the bill with great pleasure.

My chief object in addressing you to-day, sir, is to defend the President, for whom I feel a high personal regard, and the party of which he is at present the representative, and to which I belong, from the unmerited censures which have been cast upon both in reference to the origin of this war, its mode of prosecution, and its ultimate objects. Upon each of these three points, upon which we have had such eloquent and elaborate discourses, I purpose, my health and strength will sustain me, to make some observations.

The causes which led to this war have been properly described as being immediate, and more or less, remote. The immediate cause of the war, if the message of the President, if the report of General Taylor, and our own journals are to be credited, is to be found in the attack, made by the Mexican army, upon the commands of Captains Thornton and Hardee, on the 24th of April, 1846, on the west side of the Rio Grande, nine miles above Fort Brown; in which sixteen soldiers of the army of the United States were killed or wounded, and the residue of the detachment, consisting in all of sixty-three men and officers, were captured by the army of Mexico, and carried off by their captors in triumph to the city of Matamoras. Upon the report of General Taylor of this affair, under date of the 26th of April, the President predicated his war message of the 11th of May; and upon this message accompanied by this report, we passed the act of the 13th of May recognizing the war with Mexico.

The remote causes of the war have been traced to the acquisition of Louisiana in 1803—to the cession of Texas to Spain in 1819—to the violation of the treaty of 1839, on the part of Mexico, which provided for the adjustment and payment of the claims of our citizens by Mexico—and to the colonization of Texas, its revolution, independence, and finally its admission into this Union. In any of these causes, whatever may have been their influence, singly or collectively, in producing this war, the President had not the slightest agency. When Louisiana was acquired, he was a minor; when Texas was ceded to Spain, he was a very young man and not in our councils; when the treaty of 1839 was violated by Mexico, he was acting as the Governor of a distant State: and the resolutions for the annexation of Texas were passed in the time of President Tyler, and before he came into power.

Yet I am free to confess that the party to which he belongs have had, in their day and generation, a good deal to do with all of those questions. The party to which I refer, acquired Louisiana; purchased the Floridas; obtained the treaty for the settlement of the claims of our citizens by Mexico; and finally, for good or for evil, the same party have brought Texas back into this Union, where it, at all hazards and at any sacrifices, they intend to keep her, and every part and parcel of her. And while upon this subject I may add, that if any territory is acquired of Mexico as the penalty of this war, that the country will be indebted for such acquisition to the same party; as it is already indebted for every territorial addition which has been made to the country since the war of Independence, and that these acquisitions have been made in the face of opposition as violent as the opposition which is now encountered, and against objections very similar to those which are now made.

Sir, before passing sentence of condemnation upon the policy of the President, and particularly upon those grave questions, upon which we have have had such merciless reviews, I think, truth and justice alike require, that we should look at the condition of the country, at home and abroad, in reference to these great questions, at the time that the President came into power on the 4th of March, 1845. On that day it was his fortune to inherit from his predecessors, the settlement of two grave questions, in which other countries than our own claimed an interest. One of these was the Texas question—and the other, the Oregon controversy. One affecting the pride and interest of Mexico, and the other the pride and interest of England; and both, the pride and interest of the United States.

After all that has occurred, I hope I shall be pardoned for glancing at the rise, progress and maturity of these twin sisters, and of their influences in England and in Mexico, and of both against the United States, until the one was amicably settled by the treaty of June, 1846, and until the other involved us in the war in which we are now engaged.

Sir, we all know that after the successful revolt of Mexico from Spain, that Texas was colonized by citizens from the United States, at the instance in the first place, of Iturbide, her Emperor; and afterwards, at the instance of the republic of Mexico. This policy of colonization was a wise one, and in imitation of the policy of Spain and France, when those powers held possessions on this continent. We all know, that in the course of events in that country of which I need not speak, that Texas revolted from Mexico, and that her revolution was successful, that her Independence followed, and that that Independence was afterwards acknowledged by England, France, Belgium, and the United States. We all know, that after she had achieved her Independence, that Texas twice applied, first under the administration of President Jackson, and afterwards under that of President Van Buren, for admission into this Union; and that each of those applications, out of deference to Mexico, and out of deference to the opinions of the world, were refused. In 1843, for reasons which I need not fully go into, Texas was invited, by the government of the United States, to come into this Union. Security to Southern institutions was one of the inducements on the part of the United States. Trade, commerce, navigation, the extension of our territorial domain in a desirable direction, security to the Union in its most vulnerable point, and the monopoly of Southern products, upon which the chief powers of Europe depended and which dependence was a guaranty for a more efficient, and cheap, and safe for the preservation of our peace, than standing armies, were the other inducements to that measure.

Texas came upon our invitation, and, in 1844, entered into a treaty with the government of the United States, by which she agreed to give up her sovereignty and independence and to become one of the states of this confederacy. That treaty was submitted to the Senate for its ratification, and met with very determined and zealous opposition in this chamber—the entire voice of one party, then in the majority, and a respectable portion of the other, were against it. The conflic of opinion between the advocates and opponents of the treaty created a good deal of excitement. In the midst of our discussion upon it, a copy of that treaty with the documents accompanying it, without the sanction of the Senate, found its way into the columns of the public press of the country. The publicity of that treaty, with the documents which belonged to it, carried into the country the excitement which had been created in the Senate in regard to it. The time of these occurrences was in the spring of 1844, and but a few weeks before the assemblage of the two conventions of Baltimore, of the two great parties of this country, for the selection of their candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States. Cotemporaneously with these occurrences, the two distinguished and acknowledged leaders of these great parties simultaneously came out against the treaty and the immediate annexation of Texas to this Union. These letters added to the excitement then prevailing in the country. The conventions met. The whig convention nominated, as it ought to have done, their distinguished leader, eminently qualified as fully embodying in himself the principles of that party, including their hostility to the treaty and to the immediate annexation of Texas. The other convention, on account of the supposed heresy of their chief, in reference to the Texas question, superceded him, and nominated another favorable to the Texas issues. The treaty was rejected, but the issue was made up and presented to the country, for its decision at the ballot-box. That issue was decided in November, 1844, and in favor of the Texas candidate. Mr. Tyler had yet one session of Congress left, under which to administer the affairs of this country. In this short fragment of his term, a joint resolution for the annexation of Texas was introduced in the House of Representatives by a prominent whig of the state of Tennessee. That resolution renewed the excitement upon this Texas question. It passed ultimately by nearly a party vote; all the whig party, I believe, but three or four from the state of Tennessee voted against it. That resolution came to the Senate, and brought with it the excitement from the House. It was referred to our Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee reported adversely upon it. The friends of the House resolution, to save the measure, were forced into a compromise with their friends. This compromise was made by adding to the House resolutions, as an alternative proposition, the resolution which had been offered by the Senator from Missouri. (Mr. BENTON.) At the proper stage of the proceedings this amendment was offered, for which every democrat voted, and against which every whig but three, Johnson, of Louisiana, Merrick, of Maryland, and Henderson, of Mississippi, cast their votes. The amendment having been adopted the final vote came on. And who that was here at that time can ever forget it? It was at night. The House had adjourned, and, I believe, every member of it was here, witnessing our proceedings. Our galleries were crowded until they could be crowded no more—every door, and window, and avenue to our chamber, was filled with eager and anxious spectators. Every resident representative of any foreign power or state was also here, and among the rest the minister from Mexico. Any material change in the resolutions were known to be fatal to the whole measure, and several were proposed. Democracy was then in a minority in this body. Every Senator was in his place, and justly felt his responsibility. Every thing, in short, depended upon the firmness and courage with which Johnson, of Louisiana, Merrick, of Maryland, and Henderson, of Mississippi, could and would resist the importunities of some and withstand the denunciations of others of their political friends. In this moment of hope and fear, involving such interests to the United States, and the future fate of the republic of Texas, the vote was taken, and the resolution, as amended, was carried by a vote of 27 to 25. The resolutions were sent to the House, and the amendment concurred in, and on the 1st of March approved by President Tyler, and on the 3d of that month was sent a messenger to Texas with the resolutions and the first of the two offered to Texas for her acceptance, and on the night succeeding that day the term of President Tyler and of the session of the Congress that passed these resolutions, expired together.

On the 4th of March President Polk came into power, and two days thereafter, on the 6th, the minister from Mexico filed his protest, demanded and obtained his passport, and left the United States for Mexico, and our minister, in a few weeks thereafter, followed the example and returned to his own country. Such, sir, was the condition of this Texas question when President Polk came into power on the 4th of March, 1845. He found the public faith of the country pledged to the annexation of Texas, and regarded it as his duty to see that that faith was preserved inviolate. He found that the resolutions for the admission of Texas, though obligatory upon the United States, for a given time in any event, had yet to be approved of by Texas before they could be obligatory on her, and finally upon both governments. To obtain this approval by Texas, however anxious to give it, under her form of government, required time. Her congress had first to be assembled to authorize a convention of her people, and that convention had to be organized and had to discuss, and consider, and decide on the terms which had been offered by the United States. He found that to prevent her acceptance of the terms which had been offered by the United States, that Mexico was threatening to invade her, and that the congress and convention had each asked the interposition of the United States to prevent it. He found our diplomatic intercourse with Mexico angrily and abruptly broken off. And how, sir, has the President managed the many difficulties connected with this question? Has he managed them with wisdom, prudence, and forbearance?—in a manner worthy of himself and the great country of which he is the chief magistrate?—with an eye single to the public good, and with the commendable view and temper to soothe the pride and restore the friendly relations with Mexico, and, at the same time, to protect the interest and honor of the United States?—and above all, has he anxiously sought to suppress resentments, and to avoid a war between the two countries? These, sir, in my judgment, are the proper inquiries for us to make, and upon those inquiries I beg leave to make a few remarks.

Anticipating the favorable reception by Texas of the resolution of Congress, providing for her admission into this Union, apprehending, from intelligence which he had received from that quarter, an invasion of Texas by Mexico, earnestly urged by the congress and convention of Texas to prevent that invasion, the President, on the 15th of June, 1845, ordered our fleet to the Gulf of Mexico, and General Taylor, then at Fort Jesup, on the western frontier of Louisiana, to move with his forces to the mouth of the Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico; or in his discretion, to some other point in the gulf, or its navigable waters, which in his judgment, at the proper time, would be most convenient for the embarkation of his troops for the western frontier of Texas. In this order, General Taylor was further informed that his ultimate destination was the Rio Grande; and in the same order, he was also informed not to enter Texas until he should learn that Texas had assented to the terms of annexation which had been offered her by the United States, or until required to do so by our minister at Texas. This is the substance of the first order to General Taylor. There were orders of the 8th and 30th of July, and of the 23d August, 1845. The substance of all of these orders, apart from mere military detail was, that he was to regard the Rio Grande as the point of his ultimate destination—that he was to protect Texas from invasion up to that river, and in no event permit armed troops from Mexico to cross it, as such an act would be regarded by the United States as an act of hostility. In executing these orders, he was directed to be careful not to do any thing to irritate Mexico, or to provoke hostilities; and that if Mexico had any military establishment on the east side of the Rio Grande, (which by the bye she had,) not to disturb it; and should he find on the east side of that river any private citizens or settlers claiming to belong to Mexico, not to molest them. Such, sir, is the purport and substance of these several orders, in the wisdom and policy of all of which, that distinguished general most fully concurred, as his correspondence abundantly proves.—And where, let me ask, in what public document, in what history of any age, or of any country, in what wild romance even, have we proofs of more prudence, caution, and forbearance, than are to be found in the several orders of which I have given the substance? Where do we find the development of greater solicitude, while firmly resolved to protect the rights of his own country, to avoid giving offence, real or fancied, to an adversary, than we find in the conduct of the President as exhibited in the documents to which I have referred?

General Taylor obeyed the order of the 15th of June, and moved immediately with his command, not to the gulf or its navigable waters, but to the barracks in the vicinity of New Orleans, and there he remained, until he received in the month of July, the intelligence from our minister at Texas, that Texas had assented to the terms of annexation, and had voluntarily thereby become an integral part of this Union. Learning this, that General then, in further compliance with his instructions, embarked his troops for the frontier of the State of Texas. After some delays and difficulties, connected with his stores and transportation, and some hesitation as to the proper point, of which the selection had been left to his discretion, we find him on the 15th of August, at Corpus Christi, on the south side of the mouth of the Neuces river. Here he remained, usefully employed in making preparations for any service that might be required of him by either the folly or madness of Mexico, or the orders of his own government. On the 16th of October General Taylor is informed that information had been received by the department, rendering it probable that no serious attempt would be made to invade Texas, although Mexico still continued to threaten incursions. Here, sir, with your permission, I will leave for awhile, our gallant old General, and our distinguished Secretary of War, with their happy prospects of peace before them, and invite your attention to this Texas question in another quarter, and to its management by other agents.

The President informs us, that in September, 1845, he received information from Mexico, which induced him to believe that the government of that republic was, at that time, favorably disposed to settle by negotiation all the difficulties existing between the two countries. Relying upon this intelligence, Mr. Buchanan, our Secretary of State, on the 17th of September, 1845, addressed a letter to Mr. Black, our consul at the city of Mexico, directing him to ascertain if the intelligence which had been communicated by him and others was well founded; and if so, to assure the government of Mexico that the government of the United States would waive all etiquette, and send to that country immediately an envoy clothed with full powers to settle amicably, and on the most liberal terms, every cause of difficulty unhappily subsisting between the two countries. Mr. Black replied to this letter of our Secretary of State, under date of the 17th of October, informing our government that an envoy would be received from this country, for the purpose of settling by negotiation all of the difficulties; and Mr. Black enclosed, with this despatch, the correspondence which had taken place upon this subject between himself and the Secretary of State of the government of Mexico, of the dates of the 13th and 15th of October, 1845, shewing on the part of Mexico their agreement to receive from this country an envoy, to settle by negotiation every dispute or cause of complaint that existed between Mexico and the United States; and it was asked on the part of Mexico, as a preliminary, that our fleet then in the bay of Vera Cruz, should be withdrawn. In the month of November, this despatch of Mr. Black, of the 17th of October, with the enclosures referred to, was received at the Department of State, and our squadron was immediately withdrawn from Vera Cruz, and Mr. Shdell, our minister, invested with full powers to settle amicably every thing with Mexico, was sent to that country. This was the position of the Texas question, when congress met in this city in the month of December, 1845, which was the first Congress under Mr. Polk's administration. In the first annual message of the President, which was at the meeting of this Congress, the President made a full and detailed statement, with a minuteness which was almost tiresome, of every thing that had been done, in relation to this Texas question. He gave us every thing emanating from either the State or War Departments, having the slightest bearing upon it. He told us that Texas had agreed to our annexation on solutions, and by so doing, had become a member of this union. He communicated the substance of the orders to General Taylor, and particularly, that the point of his ultimate destination was the Rio Grande. He told us, what intelligence he had received from Mexico, respecting the reception of a minister, and that one had been sent to that country. He congratulated us all, upon the enlarged extent, bloodless and peaceful, of our territorial domain, reaching, as he informed us, from the bay of Fundy, along the Atlantic coast, passing the capes of Florida, and around the Gulf, to the Rio Grande. All these things he told us in his message of 1845, which message was read by our Secretary, printed by our printer, and read by us again in our chambers, and by the reading portion of our fellow-citizens. And in the same December, an act of Congress was passed, incorporating this whole Gulf coast into a collection district. Where were the eloquent defenders of our constitution, at the time of the passage of this act, and, at the time of these executive disclosures? Where were our champions of justice, when these startling and portentous disclosures were made? Were they sick, or absent, or dead, or deaf or blind? did it take the sound of the cannon at Palo Alto, and of Rosaca, to rouse them from their stupor, and to put their brains and tongues in motion? These are questions, which in my judgment, ought to be answered.

But to return to the history of our minister. Our minister arrived in the city of Mexico, early in December, and on the eve of a revolution in that country, based, as he informs us, upon the unpopularity of the consent of the President of Mexico, to receive a minister from the United States. Timidity and selfishness, more than inclination, on the part of Herrera, prevented his government from receiving our minister. His mission was refused upon the ostensible ground, that he came as an Envoy, and not as a Commissioner—with too much instead of too little power, and that he had been appointed by the President, in the recess, and that that appointment had not been confirmed by the Senate. These were the ostensible motives. The real objections were, that Parades, one of Herrera's generals, to whom had been entrusted the command of 8,000 men, for the invasion of Texas, pronounced against the government of Herrera, on the avowed ground that Herrera had consented to receive a minister from the United States, with the view of settling all the difficulties between the two Republics by negociation, and that this General was then on his route to the city of Mexico, for the purpose of overthrowing the government, and putting a stop to these contemplated negociations. These facts were communicated to our government, by our minister, under date of the 26th of December, and that communication was received in this city on the 12th of January, 1846, and on the next day, the order of the 13th of January, was given to General Taylor to advance his columns to the Rio Grande. This order was received by General Taylor in the month of February, and executed by him in the latter part of March.

This is the order, sir, about which we have heard so much. This is the fruit of that forbidden tree, from which has sprung, and is to spring, nothing but wo and disaster to this country. This is the order, which has violated the constitution of the United States, and usurped the constitutional powers of Congress, which stands so pre-eminent in our history, without law or example to justify it, and which led to the invasion and forcible appropriation of the territory of a neighboring power, and changed the friendly relations of the two countries, into that of a state of war.

Sir, I have already endeavored, I fear with tiresome particularity, to give you in detail, the circumstances, under which this order was given—and I will now, with your indulgence, make a few observations, upon the objections which have been urged against it. The objections to this order, however ramified or numerous, all point to and rest upon executive prerogative.

I shall not trouble you, sir, with reading extracts from our constitution, or laws made in pursuance thereof; or from the Federalist, or from Kent or Story, or from adjudicated cases. Such a parade of learning, in such a body as the Senate, would be worse than useless. I hold these positions to be true; that the President is the constitutional com mander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and as such, has the right, with or without good reason, to order the army of the United States to any point within the limits of the United States; subject, however, at all times, to personal punishment, by impeachment, for any corrupt abuse of his power. I hold that under the constitution and laws, he has the undoubted right, with or without the sanction of congress, to suppress an insurrection, or to repel an invasion or threatened invasion of the territory of any of the States, or of the territory of the United States. If I am right in these positions, and I think no intelligent lawyer or statesman will controvert them, it follows that the order to General Taylor, of the 13th of January, which was to prevent an invasion of the territory of one of the States of this Union, was a constitutional order, which the President had the right to give, and which it was the duty of General Taylor to obey. In my view of this case, as the order was to prevent the invasion of Texas, it is a matter of immateriality and perfect indifference, whether the territory into which the army was marched, belonged to Mexico or to Texas, unless it may be regarded as a circumstance of aggravation or mitigation of the offences of Mexico against this country.

But, sir, it so happens that the territory into which this army was marched, was the territory of one of the States of this Union, and was not the territory of Mexico. I am one of those who have ever contended, and do now contend, that the territory lying between the Nueces and Rio Grande, and below New Mexico, rightfully and properly belongs to Texas, by the title of conquest and possession. I never did contend that the country east of the Rio Grande, and included in New Mexico, did belong to Texas; for she neither conquered or held possession of it. Yet I remember to have heard an argument in this chamber, by our present Secretary of the Treasury, of great force and ingenuity, founded upon the laws of nations, and which I have never yet seen refuted, in defence of the claim of Texas to this territory also. I am one of those who never did believe, and do not now believe, that the Desert, or stupendous Desert, as on stupendous occasions it is sometimes stupendously called, (which, by the by, happens to be a large fertile prairie, resembling the famous blue grass pastures of Kentucky, more than anything else,) and which has been located between the Nueces and Rio Grande, ever was the proper boundary of Texas, however suitable a boundary it may be, to separate the Anglo-Saxon and Mauritanian races. And I will now proceed, sir, to give you the reasons for my faith.

After the battle of San Jacinto, in 1836, the Mexican army retreated to the west side of the Rio Grande, and from that day to this, that power has had no military establishment on the east side of that river. Nor, prior to the events with our army, in April and May, 1846, has Mexico ever had an army on the east side of that river, except on two stealthy predatory incursins, for roguery and plunder, from which her forces retreated again to the west side of that river, more rapidly than they advanced from it. From the battle of San Jacinto to this day, Mexico has exercised no civil jurisdiction on the east side of the Rio Grande. The settlement, if a settlement it can be called, at Brasos Santiago, and the military organization at Laredo, to which reference has been made for the purpose of establishing the exercise of civil authority, by Mexico, at the former place, and of military jurisdiction at the latter place, forms no just exception to the force of my statement.

The settlement at Brasos Santiago, which party arithmetic has magnified into a village with a custom house, happens to have consisted of a few miserable shanties, probably a half a dozen in number, which had been built up and were occasionally occupied by straggling fishermen, vagabonds and smugglers—never permanent—here to-day and gone to-morrow—and it is believed, when the nest was full, never, at any one time, exceeding fifty souls in number. It is true, that during the existence of the troubles between Texas and Mexico, that importers of goods and merchandize destined for the market of Matamoras, for the greater security from seizure by the authorities of Texas, did sometimes land their cargoes at Brasos Santiago, and that on such occasions, an agent from the custom house at Matamoras came to that point and received the duties on their goods, prior to their being crossed over to the west side of the Rio Grande, in order that they might by that route be safely introduced into Matamoras. And I believe it is also true, that those goods, while awaiting the arrival of the custom house agent, and while being prepared for a land transportation from that point up the west side of that river, were temporarily protected by one or more of those shantees. From this information which I have had in regard to the settlement at Brasos Santiago, and in which I place confidence, I infer that there was nothing in the nature of that settlement, if a settlement it can be called, that goes to prove the exercise, on the part of Mexico, of any civil authority at that point. This information I have had confirmed by a conversation I have recently had, with one of our gallant naval officers, who was with our fleet at Brasos, at the arrival of General Taylor at that place. The officer I allude to, is Captain Gregory, of the navy. So far from such a settlement establishing the exercise of any such authority, I infer the contrary. It establishes the acknowledged supremacy of Texas on the east side of the river, as well as upon it.

In regard to the military organization at Laredo, which is relied upon to prove the exercise of military authority on the part of Mexico, on the east side of the river, I have to say, that I see nothing in that organization calculated to prove the exercise of any such authority. Before the revolution of Texas, the citizens of that town in consequence of their exposure to Indian depredations, were exempt from the decree, or order, or law, or whatever it was, that deprived all the citizens of Mexico, not attached to the army, from owning and bearing arms. It was this decree or order and the attempt on the part of Mexico to enforce it, that produced the revolution of Texas. The citizens of Laredo, were exempt from a compliance with this decree, for the special reasons I have referred to. This organization existed before the revolution—during the revolution, and for aught I know to the contrary, exists to this day. It was an organization with which Texas, or her vessels to that town, never interfered, an organization which Texas had taken up arms to defend, and which was but a common right ever claimed and exercised by every freeman of that Republic.

This town, the largest and most important of all the settlements on the east side of the Rio Grande, was twice visited by the army of Texas, and that town, as often acknowledged the supremacy of Texas, and that acknowledgment, so far as my information extends, was never after controverted. Such are the explanations, based, as I believe upon truth, that I have thought proper to give upon the nature and description of those two settlements to which reference has been made.

In 1843, when Texas and Mexico were induced, through the medium of the representatives of France and England, to agree upon an armistice, nothing was said upon the subject of boundary between those two republics. But in the proclamation of General Woll, then at the head of the Mexican forces, that general, on proclaiming the armistice, notified every one not to approach, on the east side of the Rio Grande, within one league of that river, or they would be regarded as enemies, and treated accordingly. That general on that occasion said nothing about the Nueces or the stupendous desert.

These, sir, are the evidences I adduce against the claim of Mexico to any part of the territory lying between the Nueces and Rio Grande, and below New Mexico.

On the part of Texas, I urge the fact of her expulsion of the civil and military authority of Mexico from the east to the west side of the Rio Grande, and of her having kept it there. I urge the fact of her congressional declaration of December, 1836, of the Rio Grande as her boundary. I urge the fact of her military establishment at Corpus Christi, convenient to her settlements, and favorable for the reception of supplies—from which post the army of Texas, at pleasure, first under General Rusk, and afterwards under General Felix Houston, traversed over the whole of this country without molestation. I urge the fact that Texas had organized this country into counties, and appointed civil officers in it to administer her laws; that she sent her public surveyors into it, and surveyed it, and appropriated these lands to her own use. I urge the fact that Texas had established an election precinct at Corpus Christi, at which the citizens residing between the two rivers, if they chose to do so, could vote. What better claim than this, founded upon conquest and continuous possession can any country have for her territory. It is the highest, I may say, and not all, the majority of the civilized powers of the world hold their possessions.

It is true, sir, that within this territory, the settlements were detached and sparse, and from the nature of their situation, in such times as those, that law and justice may have been but feebly administered, and that the blessings of a freedom may have been but scantily enjoyed. The Senator from Maryland (Mr. PEARCE) has ridiculed the fact (but his ridicule will not alter the fact,) of a precinct having been established at Corpus Christi, for the accommodation of all the settlers residing between the two rivers. What, he asks, establish a precinct for these poor fellows to vote at, one hundred and fifty miles from the residences of some of them? Sir, that Senator was born in Maryland, in an old and thickly settled country, where are to be had, not only all the comforts which man can desire, but also all the political accommodations which the most inferior or indolent could hope for. In new countries, these things are otherwise. At one time, in the history of my own State, (western part of it,) it was among the largest in the Union, the territory which now forms that State, then a part of Missouri, belonged to the county of New Madrid, and the county seat of which was at the village of New Madrid, on the Mississippi river, some seventy or seventy five miles below the mouth of the Ohio; and to this county seat the settlers on the Red river had often to come, to attend to their suits and to serve as grand jurors. In the discharge of this duty, each person had to travel, if by water, to their county seat, eight hundred or one thousand miles; and if by land, four or five hundred miles, through a country nearly destitute of inhabitants, and much of the way through the woods, and over navigable streams and impassable creeks. As late as 1819, the county of Arkansas was bounded on the south by Louisiana, and on the north by the State of Missouri, and measured by the meanders of the Mississippi river, which was its eastern front, a distance of about six hundred miles. The county seat for this county was at the "Old Port of Arkansas," a village venerable at least for its age, it having been settled, according to the tradition of the country, cotemporaneously with St. Louis, Kaskaskia, Vincennes, and Philadelphia, which was, I believe, according to our chronicles, in 1682. This county seat—which has seen two-and-a-half centuries growing—was settled by degrees and more beautiful than "Rose"—was settled by degrees all county seats in all new counties are selected, in reference to population, and not territorial centres. It was on the edge of one side of the county, and the remoter settlers, in getting to it, had to travel two or three hundred miles. These inconveniences are but of common occurrence in all new countries, as Senators from the new States will testify. When the Senator from Maryland shall hereafter dwell upon this subject, I hope we shall treat his sensitiveness to our ridicule, and that he will content himself by thanking his stars that he was born in Maryland, and not in the wilderness. I hope he will cease to wonder that the poor fellows on the Rio Grande had to travel to San Patricio or Corpus Christi to vote or transact their business. Upon the whole, then, I urge this fact, also, as important, and not trivial, in behalf of the claim of Texas.

It is probably true that the greater number of the settlers on the Rio Grande, were of Spanish origin, and favorably inclined to the cause of Mexico. But no matter what their origin or feeling, they were too inconsiderable in numbers to be the object of special attention to either of the belligerents. They took no part, generally in the conflict between Texas and Mexico, and through the double motives of policy and humanity, neither of the parties disturbed them. They were left to the enjoyment of their neutrality, their flocks, and little patches of corn, and cotton, and pepper. The only instance to the contrary, was the order of General Rusk in 1836, to those settlers to retire to his rear, on the Gaudaloupe, or to the west side of the Rio Grande, which order all of them obeyed, and continued to obey until 1838, when they were again permitted to return, and did return, and there they have remained ever since.

These facts I urge in behalf of the claim of Texas to the territory between the Nueces and Rio Grande, and as adverse to the pretensions of Mexico. It is true that Mexico, during all this time, claimed not only the territory in controversy, but the whole of Texas, not to the Nueces, or desert, which she never mentioned, but to the Sabine; and that she blustered and bullied, and talked loudly of invasion, and blood, and thunder, and all that. Thus stood the claim of the respective parties, when the treaty of annexation was made in 1844. And this brings me to the action of the United States upon this question of title and boundary. The United States, as the successors of Texas, and to whom this settlement of her boundary had been committed, could not, consistently with her fidelity and honor to Texas, give up any part of it, without a friendly discussion, by which the United States should be satisfied that the claim of Texas was untenable. The United States regarded it as treacherous, and cowardly to have done so. This discussion, at that time and ever since, the United States were most anxious to have, and were also most anxious to settle it speedily, and upon the most liberal terms, of which there is in our archives the most abundant proof. This discussion the government of Mexico most peremptorily refused, and in consequence of that refusal, the United States were unwilling to give up any part of the boundary claimed by Texas. This policy of the United States was acceptable to the majority of the Senate in 1844. The main opposition to the treaty of that day rested upon the question of boundary—and that part of the boundary, mainly, which included the Santa Fe country, or New Mexico, with its forty villages, which had been settled by Spain one hundred years before La Salle had ever seen the Mississippi river, and which Texas had never invaded, much less conquered. To show that this country was included in the claim of Texas, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in April, 1844, introduced a resolution calling upon President Tyler for the boundary claimed by Texas. The response to this call was a map, in large red lines, describing that boundary from the mouth to the source of the Rio Grande. Accompanying this map was a memoir of valuable information which had not been called for by the Senator from Missouri, showing the quantity of land, among other things, which we were getting by our treaty, and the computation of those lands included all lying within the claim of Texas. This was all that the opponents of the treaty desired, and as it came to us, without any explanation in regard to that fact, giving us New Mexico, it was rather more than the friends of the treaty desired. The treaty was rejected. But, the policy of the United States, in regard to the manner of settling this boundary question, (that is to say by a friendly discussion) has not been changed. The United States, have still considered themselves bound to protect the boundary of Texas until satisfied it was untenable. The United States had no other course to pursue, under such circumstances, than to prevent Mexico from seizing Texas or any part of it, by force. She would have acted unworthy of herself, and contemptibly in the eyes of the world, if she had pursued any other policy than she has since, in question, under all the circumstances. She has not been derelict in her duty to Texas, nor unkind or unjust to Mexico. The President did precisely what the country expected him to do—he tried to settle this boundary, in a friendly manner and upon the most liberal terms. He could not effect it. Mexico was preparing to invade it and hold it, and the President anticipated Mexico, and prevented her. In doing this he did his duty, and for this, he, (for one,) honors him.

But our adversaries say, that in a movement so important, so likely to change the peaceful relations between the two countries, into that of a state of war, it was the duty of the President to have consulted Congress which was then in session. It is true that Congress was in session in January, 1846, when the order was given to General Taylor, and that Congress was not consulted about that order. And why let me ask should Congress have been consulted about it? Does not a satisfactory answer, for the omission for the President to consult Congress about this order, suggest itself to Senators? Have we so soon forgotten the events of that period? Have we forgotten our difficulty, then pending with England in regard to the Oregon Territory? The anxiety felt everywhere and by every one upon that subject? Have we forgotten the temper displayed by our fellow citizens; the manifest and eager desire of the majority of the population in every popular cry in this country, of a war with England? of the prompt demand for news upon the arrival of every steamer from England? Have we forgotten the debates in England, and France, (not alby upon the Oregon and Texas questions) and the debates in this chamber, upon the anticipated rupture at that time, with this formidable power? Of the necessity we all felt for the immediate adjustment of this question, finally and amicably, in order to preserve the peace of the world, and probably England or America and possibly both, from minor or unimpairable sacrifices? Have we forgotten the influences which this Oregon question had upon the policy of Mexico, and of the Texas question upon the policy of England, by which these two powers were brought together, and acted in unison against the United States? and in which the co-operation of France was relied upon, by the mad and visionary, by tempting consideration of giving, under the auspices of Paredes and the clergy, a ruler to Mexico, in the person of a prince of the house of Bourbon. In such a critical position of our affairs, in January, 1846, was the President prepared at that time to recommend Congress to declare war against Mexico, if he had even desired a war, which he never did, with that power? No, sir, he was not. He chose, and I think wisely, a different line of policy. He chose to settle our difficulties with Mexico, if possible, rather by negociation than the sword—and acting on this policy he directed our minister, (Mr. Slidell,) notwithstanding the refusal by Herrera to receive him, and notwithstanding the revolution and the avowal of the principles on which it was achieved; he directed that minister, notwithstanding these obstacles, to remain in Mexico, and to make overtures for his reception, to the usurper, with the view of settling every cause of dispute between the two countries. And that minister did remain, and did make these overtures until the 12th of March, when, on that day, his overtures were definitely and finally rejected. That chieftain having come into power by a revolution predicated upon the question of no negociation with the United States—but war, and expecting at that precise period of time, a rupture between the United States and England upon the Oregon question which had, at that time, assumed the appearance of probability; and relying, for the reasons before alluded to, upon the co-operation of France, and relying, also, a good deal upon our unhappy dissensions about the Texas question, of which I have reason to believe he was well informed; that chieftain, for these reasons, on the 12th of March, dismissed Mr. Slidell, and resolved in the midst of our difficulties at home and abroad, to invade Texas for the purpose of reconquering it. At that time, on the 12th of March, when this long talked of invasion of Texas had been determined upon, the movement of General Taylor from Corpus Christi, which was on the 11th of March, and only one day before the final refusal of the reception of our minister, was not and could not have been known by Paredes or in the city of Mexico. It was not, therefore, the march, which either caused the refusal of the reception of our minister by the government of Mexico, or that provoked that power into hostilities against the United States, from which this war dates its origin. Are other proofs to establish this fact desired? If so, we have them, in the proclamation of General Ampudia, at that time at the head of the invading army, under date of the 27th of March, at Saltillo, in which he enumerated the causes of complaint against the United States, and in that list the march of General Taylor from Corpus Christi is not enumerated, but the resolution for the annexation of Texas is enumerated. As General Taylor had only arrived at the Rio Grande on the 26th of March, on the day only preceding the date of that general's proclamation, the movement of General Taylor was probably unknown to him. Are further proofs wanted to shew that the admission of Texas into the Union, and not the march of General Taylor, was the cause of offence to Mexico, which produced the revolution and pushed that power into hostilities against us? We find this additional proof in the manifesto of Paredes, dated at the national palace on the 23d day of April, 1846, after he had heard of the arrival of General Taylor on the Rio Grande, which arrival he notices in that manifesto, and which he regarded as an aggravation of the offences of the United States against Mexico. That chieftain, in that document, informs us, that on assuming the responsibility, in the beginning of the year 1846, he had resolved upon changing the policy of Mexico, from that of weak and temporizing, which had been observed in regard to the United States, in consequence of the perfidy of the United States in incorporating one of the departments of Mexico into its confederacy, and of its treacherous violation of the terms of existing treaties, which guarded the limits of Mexico. That President of Mexico tells us in that document, after a good deal of bluster and bombast, that it was for this reason that Mexico sanctioned the movement which he began at San Luis Potosi, not for the purpose of placing him in power, but that Mexico might shine, by the triumphs of a cause, which is the cause of the conservative principle of human society. Are other proofs wanted to shew that it was not the march of Taylor's army to the Rio Grande that caused this war? We find them in the letter of Commodore Conner, under date of the 20th of March, 1846, nine days before General Taylor moved from Corpus Christi, in which the Commodore states that the papers of the capital states, that within the last ten days a large force of nearly eight thousand men had marched to the northern frontier. The commodore attached but little credit to the report at the time, but subsequent events have proved that these statements in the papers were well founded. Is further proof wanted to shew that it was not the march of General Taylor from Corpus Christi that brought on this war? If so, we find these proofs in the reports of General Taylor, informing us of the affair at the Little Colorado—of the rancheros which beset his march, and of his having found on his arrival on the Rio Grande, 1,500 or 2,000 men, at Matamoras, and of expected re-inforcements under General Ampudia, which could not have been organized and placed in position under the thirteen days which intervened between the breaking up of his camp at Corpus Christi and the arrival of General Taylor on the 23d of March at the Rio Grande. Proofs might be multiplied to shew the impossibility of the march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande, having been the cause of this war. Yet, sir, for some time after the arrival of General Taylor on the Rio Grande, no attack was made upon him, and it had been deferred so long that that General, and General Worth, were both of opinion that no attack would be made upon our army; and under this impression, General Worth, on the 13th of April, resigned his commission, and on the 16th of April left Point Isabel for the United States, and reached Washington on the day only before the news of Thornton's affair—which affair, as before observed, was the cause of the war. After all this proof it is still contended that the President is the cause of this war, because he did not supply General Taylor with more troops. Our unsettled difficulty which was then at its height, required a portion, at least, of our small army in other quarters. The public exigencies at this precise time required this portion of our troops on the Atlantic, and on the Canadian and Indian frontiers. General Taylor was supported with all the regulars that could be spared him. But, the President gave him full authority, if he needed more troops to repel the threatened invasion, to call for such force as he wanted, upon the Governors of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Texas—and their Governors were notified to honor General Taylor's call for such numbers of troops as he required. If General Taylor, in whom the President placed full confidence, did not draw for these troops, the fault was in his and not in the President. Volunteers were sent to him by General Gaines without his order, and it was a special ground of complaint on the part of General Taylor that those troops had been sent him; and General Taylor again and again implored the Department not to send him troops until the required time. And this confidence of the President in General Taylor is very gravely brought forward as a charge against the President. This is really too bad. Will the time never arrive when an adversary can do an adversary justice?

The remaining cause for this war which I will briefly consider, was the presentation to Texas, for her acceptance, the first instead of the second of the resolutions of annexation. The first resolution, as well as the second, and in this respect they are identical, authorizes Congress to adjust with Mexico the boundary line. In what do these resolutions differ? In the first, Texas was authorized to come into the Union without another contest upon a treaty; which required, what never could be had, two-thirds of the Senate to ratify it. In the second resolution she had to come in through this gate, through which she never could have passed, or else she had to come in on terms which Texas might or might not have been willing to accede to, and in no event without another election, and another Texas contest upon the terms of the contract, as well upon the measure itself; which, in the mind of the President, it was very desirable to avoid. Has the Senator, (Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland,) read the journal of our proceedings on these resolutions. Has he discovered that while as a compromise, every democrat voted for the second of these resolutions, that every whig, but the immortal three, Merrick, Henderson, and Johnson, of Louisiana, voted against this second resolution? If he has not read our proceedings which happened before his time, I advise him to do so. He has committed one murder upon his party already, by his manly and able vindication of the war; would it not be safe for him, if he desires to preserve his standing in his political church, not to commit another. His party, I can tell him, will not stand such a catalogue of heresies as those of defending the war, and of bringing Taylor's military judgment into question, or what is more important in their estimation, the propriety of their votes upon any Texas issue.

Sir, before passing from the inquiries into the causes of this war, which I shall do very shortly, I have yet a duty to perform, and that is, to say a few words upon the examples which have been so triumphantly paraded, and which have been so frequently referred to, of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, as exhibiting so striking a contrast to the acts of the President in reference to Taylor's march to the Rio Grande. The examples of 1803 and 1806, in the time of Mr. Jefferson, and in 1813, in the time of Mr. Madison, do present a contrast to the act of Mr. Polk in relation of the Texan boundary, and for the best of all reasons, that the cases referred to are entirely dissimilar. The act of 1803, of which Ross's resolution was the foundation, and the right to navigate the Mississippi river the leading motive, and the law of nations the justification of it, was an aggressive act, and not defensive, and an act to authorize an invasion, and not an act to prevent an invasion. Authorities, it is true, have been read to show that this act was passed to prevent the invasion of this country by France in 1803.—That contemplated invasion I have contradicted for three reasons. The first is, that it was to protect Louisiana against capture and conquest by Great Britain; the second, that the authorities on which it is relied to prove the invasion of the United States, bear date in 1802, and the resolution of Mr. Ross, on which the act was founded, was in 1803, and in those resolutions nothing is said about invasion; my third reason is, that if invasion had been apprehended, Mr. Jefferson, to whom all this correspondence, so greatly relied upon by Senators, was directed, would have noticed that threatened invasion of this country by France, in his annual message of a subsequent date, which he did not. For these reasons I contend that the act was aggressive—was for an invasion of Louisiana—and, therefore, very justly and very properly the action of Congress, as accomplices in the meditated invasion, was necessary—and Congress, in March of 1803, did consent to become the accomplices of the President in that act of aggression. I have stated the claim, the right of navigation of the Mississippi, which we could not get, either by negotiation or purchase; a claim which it was unnecessary to assert by force, so long as we had the right to a depot in New Orleans, by virtue of the treaty of 1796. That right expired by its own limitation, and we were unable to get that right to a depot extended, or our right to navigate the Mississippi river to the ocean acknowledged, and were prepared, in the event of a failure to purchase of France a depot for our western produce, or the sanction of that government to our claim to navigation, to assert it. We purchased Louisiana, and, therefore, no action was ever had under the act of 1803; and out of that purchase of Louisiana, grew the difficulties which gave birth to the acts of 1806 and 1813. I would ask if it is pretended, that in 1806, or in 1813, there were any apprehensions of an invasion of this country by Spain? I heard, and shall hear of no such allegation. This act, therefore, like that of 1803, were without aggression, and were not designed to prevent an invasion of the territory of the United States, but to authorize the United States to invade the possessions claimed and occupied by the subjects of the Spanish monarch. On such a subject it was necessary and proper that Congress should be consulted, and Congress was consulted and assented to the meditated invasion. Under the act of 1806 nothing was ever done. Under that of 1813 we took possession of the Mobile country, and subsequently incorporated it into Alabama, where it is to-day. These are the cases, all aggressive, all contemplating an invasion of a country occupied and claimed by other powers, with whom we were at peace. If gentlemen cannot see the difference between an aggressive, invasive act, and one of self-defence and preventative of invasion, I shall have to conclude that they are duller in intellect than I had supposed.

I will now, very briefly, consider the second count of this indictment against the administration; and that is, as to the manner in which this war has been conducted. When this war was declared, with but two dissenting voices in the Senate, and with but fourteen in the House, the President sent in his estimates for the necessary men, and money, and other means, to carry it on successfully.—

These estimates of men and money and means, were voted with great unanimity by the two Houses of Congress. The President then devised his plans for carrying on this war; and these plans have been faithfully and brilliantly executed. And what have been the results? In less than two years, without any previous preparations for such results, the President has overthrown and subdued nearly the whole of Mexico—a country nearly as large as our own, and containing a population of about seven millions of inhabitants. If such glorious results as these, which have marked and distinguished the prosecution of this war, are not conclusive as to the skill and energy with which it has been conducted by the administration, I shall be justified in saying that our opponents are very unreasonable, and very hard to please. Under what circumstances have those results been achieved? They have been achieved in spite of the opposition party in this country, who, from the beginning to this day, have endeavored to embarrass the Executive, by rendering this war odious and unpopular. At the very time that this war was declared—though voting for it, and every measure connected with it—we find it denounced by the opposition, as unnecessary and unconstitutional. They indicated (as the debates at that time will show) their purpose, at some future period, more suitable, in their judgment, for such a proceeding, than at that time, to bring the President to an account for his sins, in bringing this unnecessary and unconstitutional war upon the country.

The President has achieved these results in spite of these imputations, and in spite of these appeals to party, to fanaticism and bigotry and sectional jealousies. He has achieved them in spite of the terrors held up to our countrymen in the form of the fatal diseases of the Mexican climate—her deserts and her mountains and her invincible Spanish blood. The predictions of their prophets, (and what nation in time of war has ever been without them,) of ruin to our treasury, and bankruptcy to the whole country, even before having, after the first or second campaign, a foreign war upon our hands, without an army in the field or money in the treasury; these predictions have not been obstacles of sufficient magnitude to interrupt materially, or to prevent, our glorious successes. Such opposition, formidable only to weaker minds, has not deterred our Executive from the vigorous prosecution of this war. His triumphs have astounded the opposition, and surpassed the expectations of his own friends. Ever regretting the necessity of this war, and anxious at all times to close it on honorable terms, he asked for an appropriation of three millions of dollars, at the last session, to enable him to terminate it; and on that occasion, the opposition, though clamoring for peace, refused, in a body, to vote for it. The cry then was, "will you buy your peace of Mexico?" In short, the opposition denounced the war—they threw obstacles in the way of its prosecution by endeavoring to render it odious; and when money, and not bullets is asked, as a means necessary, that, in its turn, is denounced. What shall we do? What can be done that can and will satisfy our friends over the way?

Mr. President, the last and chief point, which I propose to notice, is the ulterior objects of this war. The ulterior objects of this war, are to obtain a speedy and permanent peace, upon just and honorable terms. These terms are the full payment of the claims of our citizens against Mexico, and a reasonable indemnity for the expenses and sacrifices which this war has cost us. This demand is expected in the shape of territory. At the last session of Congress, I was authorized to state, and did state, what territory was regarded as of sufficient value to satisfy our demands, and that that territory was New Mexico and Upper California. This statement, it will be recollected, was made before the battle of Buena Vista, and before the fall of Vera Cruz, and before the celebrated Castle. These terms, our agent, Mr. Trist, was authorized to propose, before our army marched from Vera Cruz. After that agent had received his instructions, our army fought its way to the very gates of the city of Mexico, and there, on the eve of the entrance of our victorious army into that city, an armistice was entered into, for the purpose of saving the further effusion of blood, by a treaty. Notwithstanding the favorable change in the posture of our affairs in that country, after the instructions had been given to Mr. Trist; notwithstanding the many successful, but bloody battles our army had fought, after Mr. Trist had received his instructions—the many cities, and castles, and fortifications, the arms and munitions of war, belonging to the enemy, which our army had taken, subsequent to those instructions—the rout, or capture, or slaughter of her armies, and her capital within our reach—notwithstanding all these favorable changes, which occurred after Mr. Trist had received his instructions, on our affairs in that country—changes that would have well justified the United States in exacting terms, more onerous upon Mexico; we find Mr. Trist, our agent, offering to receive of Mexico—Upper California, and New Mexico, of both of which were then in possession, and to which we had the unquestionable right to insist as disposed of. These provinces were not only satisfactory, but were regarded as more than satisfactory; for our agent proposed to give for them, in addition to our demand, important monied considerations, besides restoring to her, all the residue of our conquests in that country. These terms, too liberal in the estimation of many, were rejected by Mexico. The armistice was then terminated, the capital taken—and her army and government driven from it. These occurences having been communicated to our government, Mr. Trist, our agent, was recalled by a letter from the Department of State, on the 6th of October, 1847. And that recall was reiterated on the 25th of October, and the receipt of that first letter of recall, is acknowledged by Mr. Trist, in a letter of the date of the 27th of November, 1847. Since the recall of Mr. Trist, there has been no one in Mexico, authorized by the government of the United States, to make a treaty with Mexico. But it is well known in Mexico, that the President is willing, and is really anxious to make a treaty with her. If the terms offered by Mr. Trist, had been accepted by Mexico, that treaty would have had the sanction of the President. These terms, now, with probably a slight modification as to boundary, and the withdrawal, in whole or in part, of the monied considerations, would be approved by the President. The President never did desire, and does not now desire the whole of Mexico, or the extinction of her nationality, her incorporation of it, as states or provinces, into this union. No such policy ever found favor with him. His messages, and all his acts, connected with Mexican affairs, furnish abundant proof, that he never contemplated or desired any such results. The President, in my judgment, more than any other man America, desired to avoid this war; and that officer, more, probably, than any other man in America, has ever been most desirous of terminating it, speedily and honorably. With this conviction upon my mind, I was not prepared to hear the Senator, from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) assert that the President did not desire a peace with Mexico, and that the President desired to conquer and hold the whole of Mexico.

Sir, when that Senator, (Mr. BELL,) stated that the President did not desire a peace with Mexico, I really supposed he was indulging in a little harmonious irony—in a little pleasantry of wit, which he intended as a gentle rebuke of the President for the eagerness he had ever manifested to make a treaty with Mexico, (an eagerness which many thought rather too beseeching, and a little unbecoming,) and with this impression on my mind, contrasted with his grave demeanor, I was about to conclude that he was one of the most magnificent jokers of the age. But this illusion did not long continue. I soon found my friend preparing very eloquently and seriously to prove, not that I misconceived the President's message, that the President did not desire a peace with Mexico—and with such force and earnestness did he press this matter, that I really began to doubt the correctness of my own opinions upon the subject. I began to think I had not read the President's message understandingly, and that I had not correctly comprehended the purport of the many conversations I had had with him and the members of his cabinet upon this subject. These doubts, however, like my illusion at first, were but momentary. The President, the Senator says, is not anxious to make a peace with Mexico.

Mr. BELL explained that he had stated that the President was not anxious to make a treaty, unless he could so make it as to obtain security for the future.

Mr. CASS asked on what authority the Senator from Tennessee stated that it was a security against the interference of foreign nations.

Mr. BELL replied, that it was a deduction from the policy which had been pursued, and the arguments by which it was defended here. He protested against being represented as saying the President was not anxious to make a peace—he ought to be—but that he would not make a peace which did not offer security for the future.

Mr. SEVIER.—Sir, the President wants a peace with Mexico—a speedy and permanent peace. He would not make a treaty with a man of straw—irresponsible and not at the head of that government; but would sign the treaty to-morrow, or to-day, with Herrera, and the congress at Queretaro, if that treaty gave the satisfactory concessions. But, "indemnity for the past and security for the future!" What he means by security for the future, is a treaty with a government sufficiently stable and permanent to make a treaty, and to close it and sign it on parchment—a treaty that will be recognized as such in the eyes of the world. If the President can make a treaty with any government, as stable as that of Herrera, or Paredes, or Santa Anna, or the present government, whether they be governments de jure or de facto, he will make it, and hold that country responsible for its fulfilment. But "indemnity for the past and security for the future," is an expression in the message of the President that seems to be unpalatable to the Senator from Tennessee. If we all did not know that the President was incapable of it, we might suppose he had plagiarized the expression from Mr. Clay. When the opponents of the last war were pressing that gentleman for a declaration of the objects of Mr. Madison's war, that gentleman replied, the objects were "indemnity for the past and security for the future." The avowal was unsatisfactory at that day as it appears to be in this.

The President endeavored, in December, 1846, to make a treaty with Herrera, in the midst of a revolution in that country, and only a few days before Herrera was overthrown. He endeavored to make a treaty with Paredes, a military usurper, claiming only to exercise the functions of President ad interim; and when his downfall was threatened, and which, in a few months afterwards, was consummated—he endeavored, through his agent, Mr. Trist, to make a treaty with Santa Anna, the Dictator of that country, and but a few weeks only preceding his downfall. He has since, publicly avowed in his message, his willingness and hearty desire to make a treaty with Mexico, at any future time. Sir, the President wants a peace with that country—his objects are peace, and all of his measures are recommended to get peace. There have been many rumors, in this city and through the country, that this desired object of us all—that is, peace with Mexico—has been obtained by General Scott and Mr Trist. It seems to me that the Senator seems to speak knowingly upon the subject, and that he wants those on this side of the chamber to commit themselves, for or against it, before they see or know any thing about it.

Mr. BELL disclaimed any such object.

Mr SEVIER said he was glad to hear the disclaimer. But these rumors had been so prevalent, and as there seemed to have been some confidence attached to those rumors, I presume, intended to ask the Senator whether he had received information that Scott or Trist, without the sanction of the government, which neither of them had, had made a treaty, or were about to make a treaty, or not. I have been about in the city a good deal, among gentlemen of both parties, and have heard rumors of a treaty in every direction, and questions have been asked of me, if I did not know that the news of the treaty had arrived, by telegraph, from Petersburg, or New York, and again that the treaty was in the city, and that the messenger that brought it was here; and therefore it was, that when I heard the Senator so repeatedly asking us if we would accept a treaty, ceding us California and New Mexico, that I supposed he might have, what the government had not, a copy of the treaty in his pocket.

Mr. BELL.—Do you know anything about such a treaty?

Mr. SEVIER.—No, sir. I know nothing about a treaty; but it did appear, sir, as if the Senator had been informed of a treaty, and that he was trying to force us to commit ourselves—to go it blind—whether we were for it or against it.

Mr. BELL disavowed any such intention. What he wanted to know was, whether the administration regarded the existing government of Mexico as competent to give security for the future?

Mr. SEVIER.—That question, sir, I have answered already. That the government would, if it could, make a treaty with the present government in Mexico. And as we have had prophets on the other side, I will now beg to turn prophet myself. I prophecy that when a treaty is made, if it ever be made, that that treaty will be decidedly opposed by the gentlemen on the other side. They will oppose it, as being too liberal or too rigid to Mexico—it will have in it too little or too much for their approbation. I hope I may be mistaken in this prophecy—put down the prophecy in your memorandum books, and when the day shall come, when we shall have such a treaty to dispose of, it will be seen whether I have prophecied truly or not.

Sir, the President will be satisfied with a treaty providing for the payment of our claims, and for an indemnity for the expenses and sacrifices which the war has cost us. Upper California and New Mexico were regarded as sufficient for all of our demands against Mexico. Something more may or may not now be required. Tampico and the mountains of Sierra Madre, without other equivalents than our demands, with, probably, the security of some commercial privileges, may be required now. It is not to be expected that the precise terms of a contemplated treaty before it is made, can with propriety be made public.

Sir, the President never dreamed, at any time, that any one ever thought that his object, heretofore or now, was the extinction of the nationality of Mexico. I never heard, sir, from any respectable source, until the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) introduced his resolutions upon that subject, that the President ever had or could have any such scheme in view. The Senator from Tennessee assumes, in the face of the President's message, that such are the designs of the President, and upon that assumption he bases his opposition to the ten regiment bill. Sir, my honorable friend described to us with great force and much apparent feeling, the cruelty and tyranny of the lash of party, and in the same connection he told us, that he came here this winter, prepared to vote for any reasonable amount of men and money, to carry on this war successfully. When I put these statements together, the party lash, of which he so justly and bitterly complained, and the change, which he confessed had been made, in his original, generous intentions towards the administration, upon the subject of this war, and that of opposition to the bill before us, I could but think that the party lash, had been but too successfully applied to him. He found on his arrival here, that many of his party were not up to his original mark—that some of them were so far below it, as to be advocates of the policy to bring back our army, the quickest, and shortest, and cheapest way, without peace, or indemnity, or the payment of the claims of our citizens. I could but think, that the rigor of party discipline, against his better will and judgment, had forced him to abandon his original position, and to go over to the platform, prepared for him by the Senators from Ohio, (Mr. CORWIN,) and New Hampshire, (Mr. HALE.) Forced into this new position, I thought that he considered it necessary, to assign some reason for this change, and that reason he found, in the position he assumes, that it is the design of the President to seize and hold the whole of Mexico. Sir, that sin, of which the Senator spoke, in the poetic language of Pope, that at first was repulsive, then tolerated, and then embraced was a description I thought fully applicable to his transitions, in reference to his change of policy upon the subject of this war, and the substitution of an opposite policy.

Sir, the Senator from Tennessee, desires to drive us, it would appear, to the issue of calling the army back, the cheapest and shortest way, or to take the whole of Mexico. He has made this issue. We have not made it. We take the issue of a prosecution of this war until we force a peace, predicated upon the terms of paying the claims of our citizens and of indemnifying the country to some extent for the expenses of this war; or the withdrawal of our army, without peace, or indemnity, or the payment of those claims. This is the true issue. But, sir, the Senator from Tennessee is an able and an adroit man.

Mr. BELL.—I do not take that as a compliment.

Mr. SEVIER.—Well then, sir, I will take it back. But I will say, that from his great abilities, and talents, and influence in Tennessee, and from the issues he made up for the people of that State to decide, that he produced a revolution in public sentiment in that State, and took it from the democratic party. He came here with a high reputation for his powers of mind, which led us to expect, what we know now by experience. Now, sir, he would make an issue for us of the whole of Mexico, or the line of the Rio Grande or the Nueces. This is his own issue—not ours. Yet this is the issue he argues. He assumes that it is the policy of the administration to take the whole of Mexico; and so regarding it, he gives us his views at great length, most eloquently and powerfully against such a measure. To prove that that is the object of the administration, he refers to the abolition of the transit duties in Mexico, in which he sees an effort on the part of the United States to conciliate the people of Mexico. I suppose the Senator refers to the order from the Treasury Department to Gen. Scott. That order was given for no such purpose. It was found impossible to collect these transit duties with our machinery in a country like Mexico. They were, therefore, abolished; and in lieu of those duties, the different departments of Mexico were required by Gen. Scott to furnish him a gross amount, at stated periods, which has been done. If the revenues thus collected exceed, according to the statement of Gen. Scott, four-fold the amount that was received under the system that he abolished. Does the Senator call this electioneering, or an effort on the part of the United States to conciliate the people of Mexico? Thinking that this evidence proves the truth of his assumption, that the administration desires the subjugation of all Mexico, he then proceeds to enumerate with great force and skill the dangers which he sees in such a measure. Now, sir, if we shall be disposed to seek an issue by the embarrassments flung in the way of our government at home, and by the encouragement which such opposition gives to the people of Mexico; which issue is to retreat ingloriously from that country, leaving an exasperated and perpetual, and probably a pursuing enemy behind us, without peace or indemnity, or the payment of the claims of our citizens; or to take the whole of Mexico, whatever may be the consequences. I for one, am ready to say, march on. In such a chain of evils, I am ready to say that, sir, although, against the conquest of Mexico, and against any more than a reasonable cession of territory, if we are to take the issue proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, I will go for the whole of Mexico, with all the objections attending it, and there are many, which are great, but, in my judgment, not entirely insurmountable. What are they? The Senator enumerates them. The population of that country is one, and the extent of the country is the other.

The population of that country is about seven millions—of this number three-fourths are Indians, illiterate, docile, passive, inoffensive, never desiring and never exercising any of the privileges of citizens—never voting, or taking any part in elections in that country, or in its revolutions. These Indians are of different tribes, and each of them speaks, as the Senator informs us, a different language from the others. What shall we do with these Indians? Will we allow them to vote, or to be represented. I would do neither; I would treat them as we do our own Indians, give them agents and laws and kindness and education.—They are a degraded race in Mexico—they could be made less so under our administration. The Senator from Tennessee is aware of this. Some eighteen or twenty years ago, that Senator introduced and passed a bill to remove all the Indian tribes from out of the States in which they resided, and in which they never voted, nor were they ever represented, to a country set apart for them west of Missouri and Arkansas. There are those tribes, now, twenty odd of them, speaking as many languages, all improving and happy—so much so, that on two occasions a bill passed the Senate, with but few dissenting voices, to organize those tribes into a territory, preparatory to admitting them into this confederacy. We can get along with those Indians with as little trouble as we do with our own. They are less warlike, less enlightened or energetic. What shall we do with the other fourth of the population of Mexico, which consists of pure blood, and half breeds of Indian and European blood. To this class I would apply the principles of our naturalization laws, and the oath of allegiance. I would treat them with kindness, respect and protect them in the enjoyment of their property and religion, and ultimately make them, as we do all naturlized foreigners, upon an equality with native born citizens. But the Senator says this cannot be done. They have in their veins the blood of the Visegothis and Celtiberians, a race of people that was never heard to groan. In this poetic description I of course have no confidence. If they suffer, they will sigh, whatever party may say to the contrary. He says they will never become reconciled to us, and will assassinate upon every opportunity. I do not believe in irreconcilation for general, and not private griefs, and particularly for benefits conferred. If however, they will stab and assassinate, there is a remedy in this country for such abuses, and that remedy given to Kentucky and Missouri, which is vulgarly called "Bowie." And these people are Catholics—and so they are. Are Catholics opposed to our institutions, as the anti-rent party? Just the reverse—we have not found it so. We have had Catholics in our service, at the head of our armies, in our Cabinet, and on the Supreme Court bench. From Mexico, the Catholics—for they are all Catholics—have expelled Monarchy, and have copied our constitution for their form of government. I would extend to Mexico, as we have in this country, unreserved toleration in religious faith. That would be my remedy.

But the country is a large one, and if added to this, would destroy both. That is only an opinion. Every extension of territory thus far, has strengthened rather than weakened it. The whigs have ever opposed the extension of territory—it has been their destiny—and always upon the ground that it would endanger our liberties. The only instances of disturbances in the States have been confined to the old ones, and in those near the centre. We have had a convention of malcontents at Hartford, Connecticut—a whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania, under the auspices, I believe, of Albert Gallatin, and some dissatisfaction in South Carolina, growing out of our revenue laws. These, I believe, were all. Let us have something else than speculation upon this subject. But if this country is to be added, he tells us we are to have a standing army to keep the people quiet, and to protect it. A small, peace establishment and our navy would be sufficient for both these purposes. Will the people of Yucatan, or Honduras, or New Grenada ever trouble us? It is hardly probable. But the debts which Mexico owes abroad, and to the church, would you pay those debts? inquires the Senator. I answer, yes; and with the revenues of Mexico—which, under the operation of our finance laws, would easily and speedily be done. But the annexation of Mexico would greatly increase the patronage of the Executive, by the appointment of judges, marshals, and district attornies, and governors, &c.; and such patronage would cost us a great deal, and make the President dangerous from his increased power. Sir, the cost would be paid from the revenues of the country—and as for patronage, it is the oldest, the most popular, and has really the least in it, of all the fears which ever beset our people. Instead of strengthening, it weakens the President. He has generally many applicants for office—he can give it to but one. He that receives it is no more a friend to the President than he was before; and those who wanted the office and do not get it, are often made enemies of the President, on account of the disappointment. The man he appoints, though probably influential before, loses his influence, by the very fact that his motives are always suspected. No man who has ever had patronage desires it. I have felt this myself. I represent a people who generally care but little about office; yet it has happened that for a vacant office there were more than one application, and the most painful of all my duties here has ever been to choose between my friends. The Senator from Tennessee was once in the War Department, as the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. BADGER) was once in the Navy Department. They have had some experience upon this subject of patronage. Do they not well remember how much they were annoyed by it. How difficult it was for them to see gentlemen on business, on account of the hordes of office seekers that surrounded them. Would not those gentlemen have been highly gratified if they could have been relieved of all this trouble. Yes, sir, this cry of patronage, designed to create a jealousy of Executive power, was in full blast when I came here many years ago—and being then a very young man, I was green enough to believe there was something in it. This cry has been in full blast ever since, and will be in full blast when I am dead and gone. If you want to strengthen your Executive, deprive him of patronage altogether—if you would serve the country, afford as few occasions for its exercise as possible.

These, sir, are some of the prominent objections urged by the Senator, against the incorporation of all Mexico into this union. And to render this measure still more odious, he imputes to the President, and to the army, and to those who sustain both, the base and ignoble purposes of conveying on the way, for "gold and glory." Sir, I have endeavored to show that this war was inevitable on our part, and that it is prosecuted from the same inevitable necessity. The Senator compared this war upon Mexico, to that of Cortez, under Spanish authority, which he said was a war for gold and glory.

Mr. BELL disclaimed having made any such statement.

Mr. SEVIER said this gold and glory had been flung in, for some cause which he did not understand. If it was not intended to be alledged that this war was for some such cause, why was it introduced?

Mr. BELL hoped the Senator would excuse him for interrupting him, but he had said nothing as to the object of this war being for gold and glory. But had said that, between the commencement of the war and the present time, perhaps some motive may have crept in which we did not like to avow openly, and which might govern others in voting for a further prosecution of the war.

Mr. SEVIER—Well, sir, why did he say that gold and glory was the cause of the war of Cortez, unless he meant to charge upon the officers and men engaged in this war the same unholy ends and purposes which he says governed Cortez and his companions. If the Senator from Tennessee says the party here, or the administration, or its friends upon this floor, who vote for this bill, and for a further prosecution of this war, are governed by any such desire of gold and glory, he says that which he cannot sustain, and which is not true. The administration are guiltless of such motives; the act of Trist, the act of Slidell, the acts of our Generals in Mexico, plainly show that such are not the sentiments of this party and this administration. The Senator also urged as an additional reason which would render the acquisition of Mexico unpopular—the removal of the capitol from its present location; a necessary consequence, he affirmed, of the adoption of this measure. I hope it will not be done during my time. I have learned the way here, and desire to travel no new roads, to any new capitol of the United States. I am content to let it remain where it is. Yet, I can tell that Senator, that the time may come, although he and I may not live to see it, when this capitol may be moved, whether Mexico is annexed or not. This is a work which our successors may, or may not accomplish. These are the reasons, all based upon the assumed fact, that the subjugation and annexation of all Mexico is the object of the administration, upon that assumption the Senator justifies his opposition to the bill now before us. These are the facts which are to justify him in voting against supplies and reinforcements to our gallant army in Mexico. It seems to be a sort of whig destiny, in time of war to vote against supplies and reinforcements to the army of our country. I understand that the Senator, and the party with whom he acts, will not vote a dollar for supplies or reinforcements of any kind to our army in Mexico. Is he willing to let that army perish for want of supplies and reinforcements? Does he expect the country to sustain him and his friends in such a course as this? No sir, woe unto that man, in time of war, who shall refuse to vote supplies and reinforcements to the army of our country.

Mr. BELL.—Dont take the proper officers away and our army will not perish.

Mr. SEVIER.—We have got the proper officers there, and will keep them there. If the army is left to perish in Mexico, there will be a heavy responsibility upon those who refused it the necessary supplies and reinforcements. Would the Senator leave our army in Mexico without reinforcements until the day of danger arrives.

Mr. BELL.—If the army were really in danger I would vote any number of men we should require; I thought there was a sufficient force there already, and that the army was in no danger.

Mr. SEVIER.—The Senator used the word "rescue"—that he would be willing to rescue the army from danger.

Mr. BELL.—I disclaim the idea. I said I would not vote supplies until I saw the army in danger; and took the position that 25,000 men, or 30,000 men under Scott, with able and experienced men to command them, were not likely to be in danger. All the documents on this subject go to show that the force now there is amply adequate for necessary purposes. I am sure the Senator does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. SEVIER.—Very far from it. But I called his attention expressly to this phrase which struck my ear for the purpose of an explanation. I used the word "rescue," particularly desiring some explanation from the Senator if I had misconceived him, but he was silent. And then I went on with my comments. Then, again, in regard to voting supplies, I thought that he meant to say, he would not vote supplies until he saw the army in danger.

Mr. BELL.—I said that I thought the force at present in Mexico was sufficient.

Mr. SEVIER.—But the head of the army, General Scott, advised an addition to his forces; and it was in accordance with that recommendation, and for the purpose of enabling the force to collect the revenue, to support not only the men we propose to send there by this bill, but those already there, that this bill was proposed.

Mr. BELL.—If the gentleman will allow me, General Scott had estimated how many men would be necessary to carry out the plans of occupying all the states of Mexico. But I presume, if it be intended to get a peace with the existing government, an additional force would not be required. I thought that with regard to the occupation of all the posts, the thirty thousand men at present, under Scott, in the present circumstances of the country, would be adequate, with the six or seven thousand men co-operating on the line of the Rio Grande. The honorable Senator observed that the state of the army depends upon the discretion of the general commanding under the instructions of the Executive here, and it is only by extending operations in such a manner as in Mexico, that the administration will ever be able to extricate themselves from the necessity of holding it entirely, and that an additional force would be necessary.

Mr. SEVIER was very happy to hear the explanations of the Senator. He had intended to call the Senator's attention to other parts of his speech; but, as he was weary of this colloquy, he would pass over them. He would now conclude by summing up what he had endeavored to present to the Senate. He had endeavored to show, first, that the war was inevitable on the part of the United States; secondly, that it had been wisely managed and successfully carried on, in spite of the opposition party of the country; and, thirdly, that the United States had ever been ready and willing, and are still ready and willing, to make peace with any stable government of Mexico, on honorable and liberal terms. That it never was the design of the administration to subjugate and annex the whole of Mexico; and that all the territory the administration ever desired, or now desires, is but a reasonable portion, sufficiently valuable to the United States to defray the claims of our citizens against Mexico, and to indemnify the country for the expenses of this war. This, sir, is the platform on which the administration stands.

Mr. HUNTER obtained the floor.

Mr. FOOTE then rose and said: I wish to propound two questions to the Senator from Tennessee, which I have reduced to writing.

A SENATOR.—"order."

Mr. FOOTE.—It will not occupy more than a few moments. I was not in my seat yesterday, being confined to my room by indisposition, and had not then an opportunity of putting these interrogatories to the Senator The Senator from Tennessee on the day before yesterday, quite unexpectedly, propounded certain questions, which, he said he confidently expected would be answered by me, as he regarded me as a bold and independent man who would not shrink from the responsibility of answering questions of that nature. His questions were answered; and knowing him to be a man of at least equal boldness, I can have no hesitation in saying that I anticipate equal promptitude on his part in replying to the questions I am now about to propound. I will further premise, that I put these inquiries in a spirit of courtesy, and with a strong desire of obtaining an expression of the Senator's views. I desire, then, to inquire of the Senator, first, whether when he addressed the Senate he had any knowledge, or information of a reliable character, that a treaty, or anything equivalent thereto, had been agreed on in Mexico: and, if so, whether by authorized agents of the government, or by unauthorized persons; and, if by unauthorized persons, is the Senator from Tennessee aware of any connection or correspondence between these agents, or unauthorized persons, and any person, or persons in the United States?

Mr. BELL.—I see that the Senator means it in a mild spirit, but certainly it is claiming a great right on his part to catechise me in this form.

Mr. FOOTE.—If he does not wish—

Mr. BELL.—I say that I only deny the right of any Senator to ask me such a question, implying a breach of confidence on the part of agents of the government, and which might by possibility involve myself.

Mr. FOOTE.—I did not intend that.

Mr. BELL.—Oh! I believe the Senator means nothing at all improper. I did hear the rumors that there was a projet of a treaty, presented by the commissioners to Mr. Trist, and afterwards to General Scott, and that it had been forwarded to Washington. Upon further inquiry I did not find any authority whatever for the rumor. I may add that I have had no communication with any agent of the government whether in America or in Mexico.

Mr. FOOTE.—The question does not implicate the Senator.

Mr. BELL.—I have had no such information, and am rather disposed to believe that there has been no foundation for the rumors to which allusion has been made. From some announcements, semi-official, it would seem that there had been something in them; but I see it denied in the recognized organ of the Administration, and must suppose that that statement is true. If both the Senators had attended closely to my remarks, they would have seen that the tenor of my argument was, that the Administration must seek something more than territory as affording "security for the future," and that it mattered not, so far as my argument was concerned, whether they claim the Californias and New Mexico, or a still farther extension of territory on the same border.

Mr. BENTON.—I wish, sir, to make a motion, necessary to the organization of the Senate. We have elected a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, and have not yet given notice of it to the President. He does not know how things are here. I ask the indulgence of the Senate, then, in order to submit a resolution directing the Secretary to notify the President of what we have done.

It was then

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and notify him, that the Senate, in the absence of the Vice President, have chosen the Hon. DAVID R. ATCHISON President of the Senate pro tempore; and that he make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FOOTE again rose to address the Chair.

Mr. MANGUM.—I rise, sir—

Mr. FOOTE.—I will not occupy the attention of the Senate long; give me a fair chance. I was sick yesterday.

Mr. MANGUM.—I rise to order.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator be unwilling to allow me—

Mr. MANGUM.—I am not at all unwilling to allow any Senator the full exercise of his privileges. But I now make a point of order. What I suggest is in the spirit of which I am sure the gentlemen will himself approve. This kind of catechising gentlemen in this body ———

Mr. FOOTE.—Who commenced it?

Mr. MANGUM———I regard not only as a departure from the order, but as calculated to impair the dignity of our course of procedure. Let me assure the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that I make this point of order in all respect and kindness to himself, and strictly in a desire to adhere to the uniform usages of the body as I understand them. It will be readily perceived that great disorder must ensue if such a practice were permitted. If Senators are to rise up in this way, on any occasion, out of the course of debate, and put interrogatories on isolated points, calling now on the Senator from Michigan, and now on the Senator from South Carolina, and so on; I submit to the Senator himself whether such a course of procedure would not be disorderly, and ought to be avoided on all hands?

Mr. BELL.—It seems to be alleged that I commenced this system of interrogation. I hope that the Senator from North Carolina will allow the Senator from Mississippi to proceed.

Mr. FOOTE.—In my own vindication I must say that really I am not very familiar with the rules of order; I am told, however, that the Senator from North Carolina is entirely mistaken. At any rate it is not for me to vindicate the Senator from Tennessee, whose magnanimity has just now induced him to acknowledge that he is himself responsible for all that has occurred. His questions were propounded to me in the confident expectation that I would answer, and I did answer; and, therefore, it would have been much more seasonable had the Senator from North Carolina presented his views of order on the day before yesterday. My next question is: Would the Senator from Tennessee agree to a treaty with Mexico, without full indemnity for past wrongs received at the hands of her government, and security from future aggressions—and also what amount of indemnity and what kind of security he would demand?

Mr. BELL.—I can assure the Senator that I would weigh well any treaty that might be presented to this body, and try to do so impartially. But I hold that greater calamities might befal this country than the acceptance of a treaty which did not give even full indemnity. I should regard the success of the policy which I have attempted to show in the course of my argument was now in progress, and which I still believed to be pursued, notwithstanding the denial of the gentleman who has addressed the Senate to-day, as a greater evil than that. I would endeavor to weigh the evils, when the issue comes up between taking the Rio Grande, to which we claim title, and the conquest of the whole of the country, and the holding of it either in the shape of states or as dependent provinces; with my present impressions of the evil of such a policy, I would prefer the former to the latter alternative.

Mr. FOOTE.—What boundary?

Mr. BELL.—If the Senator desires to learn all my individual opinions, I shall be very happy to communicate them. I should be quite willing to take the Rio Grande as the boundary; but the Senator is not, therefore, to say, that I preferred not to take any indemnity.

Mr. FOOTE.—I did not say so.

Mr. BELL.—I distinctly stated, that I was not opposed to exacting such indemnity from Mexico as would not be oppressive or ruinous to her. I did not go against all indemnity, and I trust I was so understood. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, was not here yesterday, and therefore, it is probable that he wishes to know my individual opinions on those points; they are not worth much it is true, but such as they are, I gave them, without disguise, and I had hoped, with sufficient explicitness to indicate what I should do in any particular exigency that might arise.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, under a communication with a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by a map of the examination of New Mexico made by Lieut. J. W. Abert; which was read.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of ministers and laymen of the Unitarian denomination of Christians, praying the adoption of measures for the re-establishment of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of Obed Hussey, praying an extension of his patent for a reaping machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. ASHLEY presented the petition of William W. Wynn, praying to be allowed the right of pre-emption to certain lands in the State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

POST ROUTE.

Mr. TURNEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Athens to Livingston, Tennessee.

MAIL PAPERS, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to inform the Senate the date of the reported recent failure of the mail contract from New Orleans and other legal points in Texas; to report the amount of mail matter accumulated upon the route, and detained by impassable streams; the expenses incurred in the delivery of the United States mail to the troops and citizens, and by whom disbursed.

MEXICAN NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in the possession of the Department of State, copies of the instructions, if any, of the Secretary of State to the confidential Mexican agent appointed to negotiate with Mr. Trist, copies of Mexico, or otherwise, which shall enable the Senate to judge whether the imperial or provisional government of Mexico consented to open a treaty of peace with the United States, prior to the 16th of September, 1847, and shortly commencing before Senate, and more preceding, all of which were laid in motion by the withdrawal of the army from the capital on that day.

RIGHT OF WAY TO ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to grant to the State of Illinois a right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT OF OREGON.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon, reported it without amendment.

INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a resolution for the relief of Bersey Mountain, which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

The Senate proceeded to consider said resolution as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the House of Representatives to inform the House that the Senate has passed the said resolution.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed bills of the following titles:

An act for the relief of William Culver;

An act for the relief of Daniel Robinson;

An act for the relief of Thirtieth Chapter of Ahasuerus, Society of the Sisters of Ohio;

An act for the relief of Harriet Barney;

An act for the relief of John Anderson;

An act for the relief of Joseph C. Doxey;

An act for the relief of S. Morris Wain;

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Amelia Bourton;

An act for the relief of the legal heirs of John Snyder, deceased;

An act for the relief of Barclay and Livingston, and Smith, Thurgar and Company;

An act for the relief of Amzy Judd;

An act for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Stewart;

An act for the relief of Joseph and Lindley Ward;

An act for the relief of Mrs. Anne W. Angus;

An act for the relief of Elizabeth Mays;

An act for the relief of James H. Conley;

An act for the relief of Jesse Young;

An act for the relief of Silas Waterman;

in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The said bills were read a first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred as follows:

The bills for the relief of William Culver; of Daniel Robinson; of John Anderson; of Joseph C. Doxey; of S. Morris Wain; of the legal representatives of Amelia Bourton; of the legal heirs of John Snyder, deceased; and of the heirs of Matthew Stewart; were referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bills for the relief of Elizabeth Clapper; of Harriet Barney; of Jesse Young; and of Silas Waterman; were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Anne W. Angurs; of Elizabeth Mays; and of James H. Conley; were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill for the relief of Barclay and Livingston and Smith, Thurgar and Company, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill for the relief of Amzy Judd, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill for the relief of Joseph and Lindley Ward, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PROMOTION OF CADETS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON on the 2d instant, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of how many, and which, of the following-named cadets graduated at the academy at West Point on the 1st day of July, 1846, and who have been retained on the Army Register of the United States, page 4, for the year 1847, have, to the present time, received no promotion, or other appointment in the army, in virtue of their brevets, will be successively promoted, by vacancies, if the present rule which has thus far happened in the promotion to which they may have been attached, according to the order of rank established at the military academy.

MAP OF MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. RUSK, on the 4th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary be required to procure ——— hundred copies of the map of Mexico, five thousand copies of each of the Valley of Mexico, and of the Seat of War, published by J. Disturnell, of New York, not to exceed in cost one dollar each for the map of Mexico, and ten cents for the others.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

A bill in addition to an act for the relief of Walter Lannan and Abel Gay, approved July 2, 1836;

A bill for the relief of Edward Bolon.

A bill continuing licence sales by the State of Illinois of the Ohio Saline reservations, and authorizing the sale of the residue of such reservations.

No amendment being made they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That they pass, and that their respective titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

HALF PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill amending the act entitled "An act granting half pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in cases of deceased officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers, passed July 4, 1836."

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. NILES offered the following amendment, which was agreed to:

Add to the end of the bill: "who were in the army of the United States on the first day of March, 1846, or at any subsequent period during the present war between the United States and Mexico."

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I ask the indulgence of the Senate, and of the Senator from Virginia, who is entitled to the floor, to enable me to make an explanation, in behalf of my friend and constituent Capt. Gregory, of the Navy, who conceives that the honorable Senator from Arkansas (Mr. SEVIER,) was under a misapprehension in regard to a material fact in the statement made by him, on the authority of Capt. Gregory, in the Senate, on Friday last.

The honorable Senator from Arkansas, if I correctly understood him, was endeavoring to convince the Senate, that Point Isabel and the harbor of Brazos Santiago were not in the possession of the Mexicans at the time of General Taylor's march upon the Rio Grande, and of his seizure and occupation of them as a depot for his army, on the 25th of March, 1846. In proof of that position he was understood to state to the Senate that he had been informed by Capt. Gregory that on landing there he saw only two or three huts slightly built with forked sticks, and no Mexicans except a few vagabonds and fishermen. The Senator from Arkansas was under the erroneous impression that Capt. Gregory, in the conversation to which he alluded, had reference to the condition of the place anterior to the time of its being taken possession of by General Taylor; whereas, in fact, Point Isabel and the port of Brazos Santiago had been in the military occupation of General Taylor more than a month before the landing of Capt. Gregory, which was on the 8th May—the day on which the battle of Palo Alto was fought. Capt. Gregory informs me that he then observed the remains of several dwellings that had been burnt. His conversation with the Senator from Arkansas was casual, and in general terms, as he was not aware at the time, that information was desired for the purpose of being communicated to the Senate. He is the more desirous of correcting the error into which the honorable Senator has inadvertently fallen, as it places him somewhat in conflict with the statements of General Taylor in his correspondence with the government. It will be recollected by the Senate, that General Taylor speaks of the harbor of Brazos Santiago as being the port used by the citizens of Matamoras in their commerce, and states that he had given assurances, when at Corpus Christi, to some citizens of Matamoras, and on his arrival at the river had renewed them in a communication to the commanding general at that place, that until the question of boundary should be definitively settled, the harbor of Brozos Santiago should be opened to the free use of the Mexicans as heretofore. He also speaks of "the Mexican custom-house officer at Brozos Santiago," and of the houses that were burnt on the 24th of March by the port captain, who had made his escape before the arrival of the troops; by whom, only two or three inoffensive Mexicans were found, the rest having left for Matamoras.

Mr. SEVIER.—If the Senator will indulge me for a moment, I will state that in the course of my remarks the other day, in referring to the nature of the settlement at Brazos Santiago, I did mention that I had conversed with Capt. Gregory on the subject, and that his statement confirmed the information which I had received previously from other quarters. Certainly the impression left upon my mind was that Capt. Gregory was there when General Taylor landed. If he had reference to a subsequent arrival there, I shall make the correction with great pleasure. I may add that my information was obtained from other sources, amongst others from one of the Senators from Texas, and I alluded to Capt. Gregory's statement as corroboratory of what I had heard from other gentlemen.

Mr. HUNTER.—If the bill before us appeared in no other light than as a mere measure of supplies which raised only the question of ten regiments, more or less, in our army I should not have troubled you with any reasons for the vote which I shall give. But during the discussion far higher subjects have been involved in its consideration. The great question as to the manner in which the future progress of the American people is to be conducted insensibly influences every mind in its determination as to the proper objects to be pursued in this war. This, sir, is the grand problem which the American mind is laboring to solve, and upon the soundness of its conclusions must depend our future destiny for weal or for woe. No matter what the question presented, if it be connected with this war, it seems immediately to suggest these other considerations with which the public mind is so anxiously engaged.—Of all the great political problems ever presented to the world, I believe there has been none upon whose correct solution so much of human happiness has been staked; for no people ever existed, in my opinion, who had the capacity to play so great a part in the affairs of mankind. The question is surrounded, I confess, by difficulties and embarrassments. It is given to no man to see much of the future; and our past career has been so rapid, so eventful, and so successful, that we can scarcely conceive it impossible to gratify any wish we may have as to the future course of our people. But, sir, the hour has arrived when it is indispensable, not only to further and higher successes but to our own happiness, to determine the true objects of our mission and the real nature of the functions which we have to perform in the social progress of mankind. It is not surprising then, that Senators should address themselves from this Hall to the public mind of the country to influence its deliberations upon the momentous issues before it. For of all the governments that ever existed, it is in this, perhaps, that a sound public opinion is most indispensable for our prosperity and safety. Our safety is not and never has been in the written provisions of this constitution, but in the public virtue and intelligence which directed our institutions. The great merit of our system is, that its movements are true to the popular opinion which directs it; and they will be good or ill as that opinion is true or false. The system did not make our habits of popular thought, but they made the system. The Mexicans had a constitution very similar to ours, but there was no sound and enlightened state of public opinion to execute it, and the instrument failed in their hands which has been so successful in ours. Should the public opinion of this country ever become debased and degraded, there is nothing in the provisions of this constitution which could save us. To place our government in such keeping, would be to consign the delicate and complicated machinery of a locomotive to unskilful hands, in which we should move with swifter pace to a common ruin. The democratic principle in government, like steam in the physical world, is the most powerful of agents, but like steam it requires the most careful and delicate management.

Mr President, it is the highest province of an American statesman to influence, and in some measure, guide public opinion; and he who knowingly deceives or misleads the people, is responsible for the greatest political offence which can be committed under any system of government. He poisons the spring from which the whole city is supplied and deals death in the water which is indispensable to life. I have great faith in the public mind of this country when it is truly informed and time is given for deliberation. But the march of events has been so rapid that we are suddenly called to act upon propositions which heretofore had scarcely formed the subjects of speculation. Schemes of ambition vast enough to have tasked even a Roman imagination to conceive, present themselves suddenly, as practical questions; and visions of splendor, which ten years ago we should have classed amidst the delusions of "mirage," are fast assuming form, substance, and reality. The disintegration of all the social elements in an empire covering more than 1,500,000 square miles of territory, and comprehending more than 9,000,000 of people, according to the estimate of Muhlenfordt. The annexation of that territory, and the union of those people, aliens in race and hostile in feelings to ourselves, with equal rights and privileges, or their subjugation as a dependant province, are amongst the practical questions forced upon our consideration. These questions are here, sir, here in our midst without even the premonition of those shadows which are said to give warning of coming events. So suddenly have these considerations pressed themselves upon us that the mere current of events is leading us to the establishment of precedents if not of principles, which affect the entire framework of our government. The most despotic of all powers—the power of the conqueror over these eight or nine millions of people is exercised by the executive branch of our government without the least participation of Congress—for which, I by no means censure him, as it was, perhaps, inevitable in the absence of all law in relation to the subject. Nor, are we perhaps, to be blamed for the want of action in this matter? Our system was not founded for conquests; our habits as a people have not been those of war, and there was no preparation for it at the present because it was not foreseen time to make it. But, Mr. President, difficult and embarrassing as are these questions we have to meet them. It is time that we were determining upon the true objects to be pursued in this war, and nothing would, perhaps, facilitate a correct conclusion upon this subject more than a determination as to the true ends of our national existence, and the proper mode of conducting our progress as a people. This, in my opinion, is the problem whose solution in the public mind is to precede its determination as to the objects of the war. Nay, sir, it presents the great considerations which will mainly determine the future course of our foreign relations. I waive all discussion as to the justice of the war or our capacity to subjugate the Mexican people entirely and completely. I shall treat the question as if there was no doubt of our power and right to manage the whole matter in reference to our own interests, in order to see if we may not attain results, from this point of view, which are consistent with our duties to humanity as well as to ourselves.

If we could choose our mode of progress, (and happily we may, as I believe, if we would select the best,) in what manner should we regulate it? Shall we accept it as our mission to plant and inhabit the wilderness, to reduce the waste to human uses, and fill up what is open to us with a homogenous and fraternal people? Are our triumphs to be sought in the peaceful arts, the noble achievements of civilization, the development of higher forms of social life, and the introduction of purer principles of political action? Is it to become and to become a self-educating, self-sustaining, and a self-governing people, so true to themselves and so just to others, as to be able to increase their physical without loss of moral power, to any extent never before witnessed in the general case of man? Or are we to pursue another course, and imitate Roman and British examples? Is the history of our successes to be written on the ruins of others; and are our achievements to consist in subjugating nations and conquering provinces? Is it to be our glory merely to extend our boundaries without adding to our own happiness, and without reference to the rights or sufferings of others? In other words, shall we grow as the oak which strikes the root deeper as it extends the branches, and increases in size without impairing the symmetry or destroying the just proportion of any of the elements of its strength and elegance? Or shall we climb like the vine which destroys what it clings to, and under an outward form of beauty and of life, covers and conceals decay and death within? Mr. President, we are now strong enough to feel that either career is open to us. Both roads lie before us, and it is for ourselves to determine which we shall pursue. But I trust that we shall not long hesitate as to the end before us. The more I consider the nature of our government, and the circumstances of our people, the more firmly I am convinced that a taste for peace is indispensable for the high development of our social advantages, and the complete fulfilment of a greater destiny than any nation has yet achieved.—The circumstances attending our early settlement on the continent, the nature of our institutions, the cotemporaneous expression of the opinions of the fathers of the republic, all seem to indicate that the hand of God and the voice of man alike invite us to the peaceful nature of the mission upon which we were sent.—The combination of a great amount of physical power, with a high degree of liberty, of all political ends, seems to have been the most difficult of attainment. I know of no instance in which the two may be fairly said to have been united. Indeed, I know of no people whose form of government and whose physical condition justly entitled them to hope for a union of both, except our own. Planted in the wilderness more than two hundred years ago, they have extended their occupation of it as they grew, under every circumstance which could favor freedom of thought and energy of action. Subjected to no pressure of moment from without, they enjoyed every advantage in their training for self-government. Growing up gradually as a homogenous people, they acquired political knowledge from experience, and the changes to which they were exposed being in the direction of their habits, they were prepared to meet them. On the one hand, the extent of unoccupied territory saved them from the dangers of a crowded population, which are said to be most trying to popular governments; whilst on the other, many favoring circumstances concurred in forming a public opinion sufficiently sound and enlightened to direct a government safely. Nor was this all; they were fortunately, no, sir, providentially, settled in separate communities, separated not in race or feeling, but according to physical differences, which in some degree gave a local tinge to public sentiment. They came together as separate communities, and upon conditions which enabled each State to develope its peculiar genius, and placed them under common bonds only for the common defence and the free interchange of trade and intercourse with each other. A voluntary association of free republics was thus formed, in which, by a skilful distribution of duties, and a wise classification of interests, the whole subject of government was placed within the reach of popular control. The sense of the people was taken by parts in matters effecting only the parts, and their action became common only where the interests were general. This form of the federal principle presented man for the first time in his history a rational hope of solving practically the great problem of accumulating social power in large masses, without prejudice to individual freedom. The capacity of despotic governments for extensive dominion has been many times attested; but their experience seemed to prove that individual liberty was the price to be paid for it. For the first time in the annals of man, a rational prospect for empire was opened to the democratic principle in its progress, through the voluntary association of our free republics, whose strongest cohesive bond consisted in the common sympathies and sentiments of a common race. As if nothing should be wanted for future development, unoccupied territory lay before them, boundless it would have seemed, "as wish could claim," to convert this wilderness to the uses of civilized man, to settle it with a homogenous and fraternal people, to cultivate a sound and enlightened public opinion, and institute a government which should depend upon and reflect it, were the great aims of our fathers. It is plain that they believed that the interests and tastes of our people would lead to peace; and upon this supposition founded the hope of accomplishing such a destiny. The government was organized with strength for defence; but there is not a feature in it which fits it for conquests and aggressive war. No extensive war of this character could be carried on for ten years, without destroying the balances of our government, and changing the distribution of power amongst its parts. We are strong enough to make it the interest of others to avoid a conflict with us; and we are so organized and circumstanced as to have ourselves the deepest interest in peace. If we can fill this vast country, over which we have title, from sea to sea with a fraternal people, virtuous and wise enough to administer their own government, and provide for all the wants of a highly refined civilization, we shall have done more than ever was effected before, and enough to satisfy the loftiest aspirations of ambition. But it must be confessed that the difficulty of the task increases with the extent of our territory and the numbers of our people, although of kindred races and with kindly feeling. That the diversities of sectional interest, and the relative power of the Executive increase with the extension of territory, is scarcely to be denied. But with the great improvements in the means of intercourse, and the steady march of popular intelligence, it is perhaps not extravagant to hope that our race may grow to this greatness with capacities improved by exercise, and powers gradually developed in the discharge of the new duties imposed upon them by their growth. What other people ever enjoyed the prospect of attaining such power without crime!

But to reach this consummation it is essential that certain conditions must be observed in the course of our progress. As our empire extends we must diminish the action of the central government on the parts to avoid the double danger of increasing the tendencies to sectional division and the undue growth of Executive power, which becomes relatively greater in our system as we multiply in numbers. This cannot well be done with the expenditures and the funding system required by frequent wars. It is necessary too, that the vast country which we are to occupy should be covered with a homogenous and fraternal people, a people growing in intelligence as they increase in power, to justify us in hoping for that harmony of sentiment, and sound and enlightened public opinion, which are indispensable to the successful administration of popular institutions. This cannot be expected if alien and hostile races are to be suddenly incorporated in our body politic. Indeed it is much, the less sanguine might say too much, to expect to accomplish the ends which I have supposed to be within the legitimate range of our hope. Still, sir, I believe it may be done, if we are true to ourselves and faithful to our mission. We have already accomplished so much, our past course has been so wonderful and successful, that it would seem to be not extravagant to entertain this hope for the future. Experience demonstrates that the progress of public intelligence and virtue diminishes the range of the necessary interference of government, and places under the control of public opinion and the guidance of individual interest many subjects which heretofore have been regulated by law. If the cohesive power of the bonds by which our society is held together is daily weakened by the extension of our population, it is also daily strengthened by improvements in the means of intercourse. The introduction of the principles of free trade removes many of the causes of sectional jealousies and diminishes the subjects of necessary legislation. If the extension of our people increases the difficulties of free government, the march of mind developes new resources for overcoming them. That there are limits to this capacity is not to be denied; but it is equal, I believe, to the accomplishment of the mission upon which we were sent. Can a more magnificent destiny be conceived than the realization of such hopes? To fill a continent of space with all the elements of light, life, and civilization, in their purest forms and highest combination—to wring from the reluctant grasp of earth the fruits which she yields only to human skill and industry, and to discover resources in the boundless stores of nature for every new or increasing want which a progressive civilization may develop—to acquire a moral influence more extensive and enduring than any power of the sword, and which enforces homage, not from the lips, but the heart of every human being who can feel the force of benificent example. Happy ourselves, and the cause of happiness in others, what higher destiny could we offer to Him who has endowed us with such unparalleled advantages, than the spectacle of such a power guided by the spirit of justice and moderation, and directed to virtuous ends? But, Mr. President, great, glorious, and exciting as is this picture of our future, we must reverse it all if we take the other course, and launch into a career of war and conquest. If we expect to increase from plundering the stores of others, if we wish to acquire glory from the skill with which we work that human machine called an army, and to emulate the march of those who carved their way with the sword, it may be well to look to the end of that road before we take it. Undoubtedly we have the power to become a scourge to others, but there is danger that we may leave our own life in the sting. There are daily symptoms of a growing disposition in the public mind for wars of conquest, which I have observed with the deepest regret. The conscious vigor of early manhood is generally ambitious of display. But, I believe, that there could be no impartial and intelligent observer of our position and the circumstances which surround us, who would not decide that it is ourselves more than others whom we need to conquer. We already hear of a public opinion forming for the absorption of the whole of Mexico or its annexation as an dependent province. No such propositions have been formally made in this body; but the tone of some of the public prints and much that has fallen from Senators in the course of this discussion are well calculated to inspire apprehension in relation to the growth of such desires. Sir, I was glad to hear the chairman of Foreign Relations declare that the President entertained no such idea. I had not supposed that he would have indulged it—but I felt most deeply the force of the declaration of the distinguished Senator that the course of events might force us in that direction. I was gratified to hear the Senator say that he had no such purpose at present, but the course of the argument in which he met the views of the able Senator from Tennessee struck me as ominous and alarming. The Senator from Tennessee presented a striking and glowing description of the evils likely to ensue from the execution of these schemes, and the Senator from Arkansas met him with arguments designed to show that no such dangers were to be apprehended from them; but on the contrary, if I understood him, that the consequences might be beneficial. Now, sir, why was this so, if the Senator did not to some extent favor the project under discussion? We all know that he is a practical man. He has no idle love for mere logomachy. He did not use such arguments merely to show that his ingenuity was equal to the task of making the worse appear the better side. No, sir, he presented these views because he felt their force and believed in their truth, and I, for one, regard these declarations as amongst the most ominous signs of the times. The distinguished Senator from Michigan, chairman of Military Affairs, has expressed the opinion that we might swallow all Mexico without its killing us. and my attention has lately been called to a letter from the second officer in this government to a public meeting in New York, in which he seemed to consider it as neither an improbable nor inglorious idea that we were to assume "the guardianship of a crowded and confederated continent." Where are we, Mr. President? What has become of those maxims of prudence and caution by which we used to regulate the course of our public affairs? What new lights have beamed upon us since, under what shadow is hidden the dim religious ray of that lamp of experience by which our fathers were wont to guide their feet? It seems to have been lost sight of in the intensity of our gaze upon the Aurora Borealis of 54° 40', or the more attractive lustre of the Southern Cross towards which our God Terminus seems to be advancing with all the speed of forced marches. Can it be gravely contemplated, Mr. President, to incorporate eight or nine millions of such a people, aliens in race and hostile in feeling with our own? Is there nothing in the free Anglo-Saxon spirit which revolts at the idea of an equal association with such a mixture of Spaniard, Indian and Negro? Would our people ever agree to admit such a population to equal rights and privileges with themselves; or would they submit to a government in which it was felt as a powerful political element? Where then would be found that sound and enlightened public opinion which is the moving power and living principle of our government? Where the cohesive bond of the fraternal spirit of a homogenous people which is so essential to just and harmonious action? The Mexicans have tried the experiment of administering a government like ours, and failed from the want of public virtue and intelligence. Would they become better by association with us, or should we become worse? Mr. President, should the experiment ever be attempted of incorporating such a population with ourselves it will be found that our people will not submit to it. The Union would be dissolved, or our form of government would be changed in effecting it. But the Senator from Arkansas has a summary mode of disposing of this difficulty. He says, if I understand him, that he would "enact proper naturalization laws which treated the white man as a white man, and the Indian as an Indian." Does the gentleman forget that the Indian and mixed races constitute six-sevenths of the entire Mexican population? Does he remember that these Indians are the descendants of those who more than two centuries ago had established a civilization whose monuments still strike the beholder with wonder and admiration? A civilization, perhaps, not very greatly inferior to that of his invader. Does he forget that these people, after the first Mexican revolution, were admitted to equal rights and privileges with the other races, and to some extent have enjoyed a share in the administration of justice and the direction of the government? When he reflects upon the nature and constitution of our own legislature does he expect to be allowed to place these people under the government of Indian agents? Is he quite sure that he would have to meet none of those questions to which a Southern man is most sensitive, in his attempts to regulate this Indian government according to his wishes?

But there is another form of the proposition which is more dangerous, because it is more plausible. I mean the annexation of Mexico as a dependent province—a scheme which, I fear, many entertain, and which, some of my friends assure me, is daily growing in popular favor. Where, sir, is the warrant for such a proposition either in the spirit or letter of the constitution? The letter certainly contains no such authority, and if the spirit of our past professions and institutions assert any one thing more emphatically than another, it is the right of a people to self-government. To hold a foreign province for military purposes during a war, is undoubtedly legitimate; but to hold peopled provinces as permanent dependencies, is utterly incompatible with our system of government. It requires the pencil of no extravagant fancy to depict many ruinous consequences of such a measure; but who can point us to its benefits? What are we to gain by it? We should have the care and trouble of governing them, and if they paid the expenses they would do more than is done by most provinces, or any of the civilized nations in modern times. The taxes to support their own government are as much, or more, than any civilized people have borne in later days. There is, I believe, no dependency of the British empire, whose government has not cost more than its people contributed. There is no government in Europe, heavily taxed as are its people, which has not incurred a debt in addition to the expenditure of all that could be raised by annual taxation. The expenses of their governments and of the wars necessarily incident to their separate national existence, have been greater than any civilized nation has paid—our own being no exception to the rule; for all are in debt, and in debt incurred for the support of their governments. How, then, can we expect to secure a pecuniary indemnity by retaining Mexico as a province? With all the inducements of national pride, they have never been able to support the government of their own choice, and is it to be expected that they would do more, or could be made to do more, for a government of foreigners which was odious to them? If not raised by taxation, where is the money for indemnity to be obtained? They have no national domain of much value of which we are aware. The mines are private property, and would probably yield us but little more than they have already produced in taxation to the Mexican government. No one would propose to confiscate private property, or that of the church. Sir, the result would be, that we ourselves should be forced to contribute largely for the expensive amusement of governing a people who detested us and our yoke. It would constitute an annual drain upon us of millions to sustain the public officers and the army necessary for their permanent subjection. I repeat the very pertinent inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee, what should we do with their church establishments? The Senator from Arkansas said, as I understood him, that other nations had overcome such difficulties, and why might not we do the same thing? The gentleman forgets that we have a special difficulty in the way, which they did not have to encounter. Ours is the only government, with which I am acquainted, whose constitution positively forbids a connection between church and state. In all other governments, with, perhaps, one exception, such a connection exists; but our constitution forbids it, and the religious and political feelings of this country would both require that there should be no church established by any government over which we had control.

[Here the Senator from Arkansas informed Mr. H. that he had misunderstood him, he had proposed religious toleration as a mode of escaping the difficulty.

I beg pardon, Mr. President; I did not mean to misrepresent the Senator from Arkansas, but his correction only brings me the more speedily to the conclusion to which I was arriving in another mode. Yes, sir, we should have to introduce religious toleration, and dissolve all connection between church and state, if we assume the government of that people—a step which would increase vastly the difficulty of holding that country as a dependent province. Whoever will examine the nature and constitutance of that population, and survey their past history, must be convinced that the church is the key-stone of the arch which has sustained the fabric of Mexican society. Four-sevenths of that entire population are Indians, two-sevenths of the mixed, and only one-seventh of the pure white race. A hierarchy seems to have been peculiarly suitable to the genius and tastes of the larger and more suffering portion of that people; I mean the Indian race. It is difficult to believe, that without this common bond of a church establishment, there would not have been frequent wars between the races, or that we should have seen even the little of unity and harmony of national movement, which their history has exhibited. Destroy this, as we should be constrained to do if we assumed their government, and we should not only destroy whatever social unity exists, but we should have to encounter their positive hostility inflamed by religious zeal, in addition to the opposition of the aristocracy and military character, formidable enough in itself. Suppose these difficulties in our way, the man is not yet born who would outlive the necessity of a large standing army in that country, to keep it in subjection. I venture to say that it would prove the most expensive dependency with which any nation has ever been cursed in modern times. But, Mr. President, this is not the most serious view of the question. What would be the political effects of such a measure upon ourselves? To whom would secure the vast power and patronage of such a government? I know, sir, that the Senator from Arkansas estimates lightly this matter of patronage, and for no other, or better, reason, than that its exercise gives trouble. But patronage is power, and when has power been an object of indifference to ambition? No power can be exercised without trouble, but we do not see men pursuing it the less eagerly on that account. It was not thus that the fathers of the republic reasoned, and I trust that the day is far distant when our people will consider the questions of patronage, and its effects upon the distribution of power in our system, as light and unimportant matters. Sir, this power and patronage would enure to the President of the United States, who would appoint all the officers, and direct the army that conducted the government.—There would be no department of that government elected by our people, but every man concerned in it would hold his office from the Executive. The whole benefit derived by any body from such an occupation of Mexico, would be derived by those officials, who would enjoy the profits of the job of governing the country, and these would hold their places at the Executive pleasure. How long could we expect him to be true to both his functions as President of the United States and Mexican Imperator? Is there no danger that he would use his Mexican royalty to acquire a more permanent tenure of office at home? For all moral and political purposes he would be the sovereign of both. It is idle to say that the elective feature of the office would restrain him. With such powers and patronage he would regulate the course of several elections as he pleased, or dispense with both if he deemed proper.—When we estimate the fatal influences of hundreds of millions of funded debt, which the wars necessary for the permanent occupancy of Mexico upon these terms would occasion, and add to all the effect of the enormous additions to the Executive patronage, is there any sanguine enough to hope that our republic could expect length of days under such a system of things? But the hope, idle as it is, seems to be entertained by some, that Mexico could be made to pay the whole of these expenses and maintain the army necessary for her subjugation. Suppose it were the case, we the representatives of a self-governing people, are far from being vigilant enough in supervising the expenses of our government, who would there be to watch with any thing like a guardian's care over expenditures in Mexico, when our own constituents contributed nothing to pay them? I can tell you who would investigate them closely and be alone—I mean, sir, the President of the United States, who would derive all the benefits—he would look closely to the revenue, from which he sustained a power exterior to, and in a great measure independent of, the people of the United States. It has been said by an acute writer on Roman affairs, that the first change in their polity which was fatal to liberty, occurred when Scipio Africanus, to relieve the Roman people from some of the burthens of war, was allowed to raise the supplies necessary for his African expedition, in the province which was assigned to him and the allied towns in which he was popular. To a great extent the supplies were thus raised, and the Roman people relieved from immediate pressure; but the first of a long line of precedents was established, which made the military independent of the civil authority, and ended in giving it the entire mastery of the government.

If we entertain Roman ideas of conquest, we must refer to Roman examples to see how far they are consistent with liberty.—But it may be supposed that the indirect advantages derived from a trade with Mexico, regulated with reference to our own interests, would compensate us for the expenses of subjugation and government. A little reflection, I think, will dispel that illusion. If we obtain the wild country along the northern frontier of Mexico, together with some of the ports on the Pacific, we shall stand in such a relation to her that the result of a high tariff imposed by her would give us nearly the whole trade, as it could not possibly be enforced against us on such a line. If, on the other hand, her tariff be low, we should enjoy nearly all the advantages of so unrestricted trade, without the expense and the crime of her permanent subjugation. Indeed, putting aside the question of expense, I believe that the direct pecuniary gains of a commerce under low duties, with a people improving and increasing under a government administered by themselves, would be far greater than even an exclusive trade with such a people as they must become under a foreign yoke. Few will doubt that our trade with Great Britain, with all the burthens imposed on it by tariffs, has been more advantageous to the mother country than it would have been if the former state of colonial dependence had remained. But, Mr. President, I have only touched upon a portion of the consequences that would inevitably result from such a step. If we once commence the career with the absorption of Mexico by conquest, and the experiment should result as favorably as those expect who incline to the measure, is it probable that we should or could stop at that point? Is there any instance of a nation that paused in such a career, until forced to do so by domestic misfortunes or superior force from without? The very class which war creates, and which it supplies, by conquest, with the means to obtain the mastery at home, will ever continue to push that career of conquest so long as the opportunities of plunder abroad afford the temptation to advance. The moment they are prevented from plundering abroad, they commence the same operation at home; and it unfortunately so happens that in empire gathered by conquest the only practicable limits ever found to their power has been in the exhaustion of the subjects of their exactions. Sir, this class is no mere creature of my imagination; it is one known to history, and has been so well described by one of the masters of human thought and of the English language, that I shall beg leave to borrow his words for the description: "The wars of civilized nations," says Dr. Johnson, "make very slow changes in the system of empire. The public perceives scarcely any alteration but an increase of debt; and the few individuals who are benefitted, are not supposed to have the clearest right to these advantages. If he that shared the danger enjoyed the profit, and after bleeding in the battle grew rich by the victory, he might show his gains without envy. But at the conclusion of a long civil war, how are we surprised for the death of multitudes but by contemplating the sudden glories of paymasters and agents, contractors and commissaries, whose equipages shine like meteors, and whose palaces are like exhalations?

"These are the men who, without labor or hazard, are growing rich as their country is impoverished; they rejoice when obstinacy or ambition adds another year to slaughter and devastation; and laugh from their desks at bravery and science, while they are adding figure to figure and cipher to cipher, hoping for a new contract from a new armament, and computing the profit of a siege or a tempest."

If this career of conquest should ever be favorably commenced by us, there is no power in this country to stay it, until it is stopped by the hand of God and the retributive dispensations of providence. Sir, I firmly believe that before any foreign opposition could be found in sufficient strength to stop it, we should fall to pieces by our own dissensions, or our government would take the organization most suitable to the ends of conquest, and assume a despotic form. The debts which these wars must occasion, would lead to heavy and unequal taxation, and to bitter sectional disputes, under which our people would divide, if they did not think it better to take refuge under one master, to escape the exactions and tyranny of many. Of all the governments with which I am acquainted, our federal government is most endangered by heavy taxation upon the people; and there is none so little capable of enduring a large national debt without an organic derangement of its machinery. A large class living upon the funded debt of this government, would be more dangerous, if not more terrible to it, than an army with banners. It has been well said that the most important revolution in the English government occurred when the funding system and the bank were established in the reign of William of Orange. From that period a fourth estate arose in the realm, which gradually attained the mastery of all. So rapid was its rise that its tendencies were foreseen and denounced by Lord Bolingbroke at that early period of its growth, and Lord Chatham, in a fit of impotent rage is said to have declared that—'when the lands are falling, we may be sure the country is rising'—but, as if possessed of some invisible power, it grew in spite of the fear and hate of the British people; and the "cannibals of Change Alley," as Chatham called them, soon became the arbiters of the fate of nations. They held a mortgage upon the future labor and productive power of the country, and taxed it to an extent which would have been deemed incredible had we not witnessed the reality. They worked the machinery of currency, and holding the very sinews of motion in government, their voice was alike potent in war or peace. The clay feet of the colossal image of French power crumbled in their grasp, and the British shuttle plied and the British hammer resounded at unusual hours of the night, uncommon as the first was, at the secret power as whose fiat they were moving, or of the invisible hand which was silently dividing the loaf in every palace, in every hovel, in all the habitations of the land. Colonies were added, empire was enlarged, the British name was emblazoned in glory's most dazzling dyes, but the stockholders mortgage was increased, and British sinews were to be still farther stretched to provide the interest. The two acts of the Bank suspension, under Mr. Pitt, and the resumption of specie payments, under Mr. Peel, in 1819, both of which were passed under this influence, are said, by a mere alteration in the standard of value, to have given the fund holders more than 100,000,000 pounds sterling, or about $2,000,000,000, more than they were entitled to; and their mortgage upon the entire industry and productive power of Great Britain amounts now to eight hundred millions of pounds sterling. This, sir, is the fourth estate which has arisen in the British empire only since the days of William of Orange, and now holds undisputed mastery over all the others. Can we raise such an interest and such a class in this country, and hope to retain our free form of government long afterwards? Our government is founded upon a theory quite different from the English. It is worked by public opinion; it is constituted to reflect the interests and the feelings of the people, whose sense is taken by parts in such a manner as to obtain every possible security in self interest for the expression of just and sound sentiments. What becomes of the palaces of our equites or monied aristocracy, or of the power of the people to work it, if we create a large public debt, and raise up a class who live upon taxation, and control not only the currency, but what is far more, the value of the entire credit of the country, for even to that last extremity must its power extend. There is now but one estate in this country, constituted of the entire people; shall we raise up another of fundholders, perhaps the more powerful of the two? This, sir, is no contingency; it is a certainty for which we must prepare, if we enter into a long career of wars of conquest, which necessarily occasion a public debt. I know of but two very successful instances of empire achieved by conquest, by a people pretending to be free, the Roman and the British, and the apparition of this monied interest preceded the decline of the one and possibly presages the fall of the other. The result of the Roman career was to raise up two powers in the country: the army and the equites or monied class, who lived upon the management and the plunder of the public fisc. If they were not so predominant as the English stockholders, it was because the funding system was then unknown.—The struggle of Cato against the one was as vain as Chatham's impotent outburst of passion against the other. They were the necessary fruit of a constant state of war. That they owe their origin in England to this cause is too notorious to require proof; nor will any one deny their predominant importance in the British system. They have not destroyed the form of government as yet, because it was framed upon different principles from ours; it was organized to enable the few to govern the many, and wonderfully constructed for such an end. The addition of the fund holders to the governing class increased their numbers and added to their strength, so long as there was a capacity in the mass to support them both. But when that limit is transcended, and that portion of the governing party who hold real property and pay taxes, find that they are called upon to contribute more than they receive from public contributions, then will commence the struggle in which the great body of the people may profit by their dissensions, and change, perhaps, the whole fabric of their government. But does any man believe that our institutions could exist under the weight of taxation to which the British people have been exposed. Sir, there is not power enough in this government to impose and collect such a tribute from the great body of our people.

Mr. President, I have drawn some of my illustrations from Roman and British experience, not only because they furnish the most apposite instances, but because their examples I fear are too familiar and seductive to the imaginations of our statesmen. And yet, sir, when fairly analyzed, they are not worthy of our imitation, nor did they produce results equal to the hopes which we may justly entertain from pursuing another career. They had, too, an excuse which we cannot offer, the career of conquest was in some degree forced upon them by their position which made it almost necessary for them either to conquer or be conquered. No vast and contiguous and unoccupied domain lay before them to people and plant—fierce, powerful, and hostile neighbors surrounded them—but we are more fortunately situated. Nor did they achieve their success without paying penalties for which no acquisition by conquest could be considered as compensation to us. The very extent of Roman dominion produced a necessity for organic changes in their government; to preserve the unity of the empire, it became necessary to extend the privileges of the conqueror to the conquered. The haughty Quirites were forced to admit the Spaniard and the Gaul to seats in that Senate, which it had been so long their exclusive privilege to fill—the influence of the provinces which their arms had subdued, conquered in the end the Roman spirit itself. In such an empire the equality of law and self-governing citizens became impossible, and they sought equality in what has been well characterised as the "dead level of an oriental despotism"—Rome, the Imperial city, lost all that commands respect in power and was restricted to the meretricious influences which a metropolis exercises over a court. This was in the nature of things—Unless there be a fusion of races between the conqueror and conquered, the body politic can never exhibit the united power of both, but its real strength is different as between the greater and the lesser of the hostile elements—If the conquered are admitted to equal privileges with the conquerors, they will subdue them by influence when their strength becomes the greater of the two, If not admitted to such a participation, they will subdue the conqueror by force when their political and military power becomes adequate to the task. It may be said that the British example presents more encouraging hopes. But would we take her conquests along with her debts if we could? or could we administer a government over such dependencies without a change in our own institutions? Considering their whole effects, political and moral, as well as commercial, on the great mass of the British people, an impartial observer would probably decide that they had little cause to rejoice over them. Her's is an isolated case in history. For the last two or three centuries as a community of armed traders she has propagated commerce by the sword. As she gradually loses her commercial and manufacture superiority amongst civilized nations she forces open new markets amidst the inferior races who cannot for centuries, if ever, hope to rival her in such pursuits. For the re-imbursement of the expenses of conquest, she looks to exclusive privileges in trade and this monopoly she preserves with the sword. How this account may stand as a matter of pecuniary profit and loss, I confess I am unable to determine. It is to be reckoned amongst the doubtful problems in political economy. The armed shepherd, the armed priest, and the armed trader, have each spent their day on the earth in their turns—the accounts of the two first with posterity have been settled long since, but the last still remains to be closed. How the balance sheet will stand I do not pretend to be able to determine. But of this I am certain, that it is no example for us to follow. For independently of the political consequences of such a career, I am convinced that we may attain all the commercial advantages of a superiority in the markets of the world by pursuing the course marked out for us by nature, and peacefully extending our limits without violating the rights of others, or deranging the machinery of our own government. Commercial superiority will belong to those who are superior in social organization, in civilization, in the useful arts, in the elements of productive power, and in the advantages of access to the markets most valuable to a commercial people. Such a people as ours peacefully developing under its institutions and filling the vast extent of wild country open to our occupation from the Atlantic to the Pacific shore must enjoy that superiority if they remain true to themselves and their mission. Our mission is not of arms, but of arts, and every hour of peace is rich in golden opportunities for its accomplishment. It is not to be supposed that we will not be exposed to occasional wars, and I am happy to believe that we have ample security in the spirit of our people against the aggressions of others. But that spirit needs no spur, the danger is that its generous impetuosity may spurn the wholesome restraints which should moderate its course.

Mr. President, I have examined the question of the true mode in which our future progress is to be conducted, because I firmly believe that it is a subject upon which the public mind is busy at this time. Their conclusions upon this matter, will probably determine them as to the objects for which the present war is to be waged and upon that subject I fear that there is a great and dangerous conformity of opinion. Those who believe that the highest point of our grandeur is to be reached by conquest, incline with more or less distinctness of view to the annexation of all Mexico, whilst those who think as I do that we can only become a great as well as a free people by preserving our homogeneous character and increasing by growth, desire to direct our march to the unoccupied country which we now possess, and ought to acquire from her when we close the war. To this extent I would go and no further—I do not want their people, I neither wish to govern them, nor have their aid in governing ourselves. But I have many reasons for desiring to acquire a portion of their territory contigious to us which is so nearly unoccupied that the influence of these people could not be sensibly felt, as a political element in our system. Where that line should go, I do not pretend now to determine, but the limit beyond which it ought not to go, is fixed in my mind—upon that point my opinion is made up.

In specifying the acquisition of a portion of the comparatively unoccupied territory of the Mexicans as one, and perhaps the leading object to be pursued in the war, I do not mean to say that there are no others important to be obtained, but these are to be determined by the circumstances of the case when the treaty is made. But the acquisition of this territory will be important in many accounts. It provides not only for whatever indemnity for the war can be obtained, but also the means of satisfying the private claims against the Mexican government. It is a species of indemnity which would benefit both of the belligerents, for it would avoid one of the inevitable temptations to future wars between the parties. That this country is destined to be filled by the advancing wave of our population none can doubt, and it is equally clear that the Mexican race can never occupy it. To provide for this inevitable event in such a manner as to avoid the chance of a war, and secure its peaceable accomplishment is an object to be desired by both people. This consideration alone, as it seems to me, might satisfy the most fastidious in relation to Mexican rights or wrongs as to the propriety of making this acquisition of territory. But there is another which is almost conclusive. This country is mainly in the occupation of Indians. The Mexican population has receded instead of advancing into it, and the Indians are actually extending their borders southward. Now, the right to extinguish Indian title, and to substitute a civilized for a savage race who do not fulfil the condition of improving the land, upon which the practice of nations, and perhaps the law of nature gives property, depends upon the capacity to occupy, and without that capacity no people can fairly claim territory. If there is neither an occupation nor a capacity to occupy, the right to appropriate Indian territory for the uses of civilization belongs to those who have the capacity to do it, and of those capable of doing it, the contiguous have the best title. It may be said, that time has not been given to test fairly their capacity to occupy this country. But it is a persuasive, if not a decisive fact, that they are receding before the Indian population. I acknowledge that this consideration would not justify us in seizing upon this territory if the two nations were at peace; but it may fairly be estimated as strengthening the rights acquired in war. I make this admission, because the right to seize Indian territory upon the ground that the civilized nation claiming it has no capacity to occupy it can only be fairly exercised when the fact upon which it depends is ascertained beyond a doubt. Even then it may be a question of prudence, whether the war which it might occasion would not produce so much mischief, that the exercise of the right would probably not afford benefits enough to compensate for it; but the right itself is as clear as the right of the civilized man to appropriate sparcely populated savage territory to his own higher uses. The same reasoning, and the same laws apply to both cases. But be that as it may, Mr. President, the question is determined by the fact, which I believe exists, that a lasting peace between the two countries will depend upon such an acquisition. There is yet another object important to be obtained whenever a treaty is concluded, and that is to ensure a commerce with the Mexican people upon as favorable terms as other nations may enjoy. I do not mean that this should be a sine qua non, because the circumstances attending our position along her frontier would secure this result in the end, although they might not produce it as speedily as by immediate treaty stipulation. Still this object, though not indispensable, is desirable. I believe, sir, that the war ought to be conducted so as to secure these ends with as small expense of money, and as little effusion of blood as possible. I will go further, sir. I think it ought to be so conducted as to prevent the entire disintegration of Mexican society, and to leave as far as possible a just proportion amongst the elements out of which their social fabric is to be reorganized. It is our interest that they should become as free, as happy, and as prosperous a people as may be compatible with the capacities of their race. If I should ever live to see the return of peace, I should rejoice in the belief, if circumstances permitted it, that it was the harbinger of better days, and higher hopes to the Mexican people themselves. But, sir, the most doubtful question of all is, as to the best mode of so conducting the war as to attain these objects. Upon this subject, too, I have my opinions, but I am so conscious of my want of military knowledge, that I should not present them to those who have so much better sources of information, if I did not feel it to be due to candor, to present my views upon subjects which all are considering and discussing. I shall premise, sir, by the admission, that the conduct of the war is eminently an Executive function. Universal experience has shown the necessity for unity of purpose in the chief command of the operations of war. It would be as absurd as impossible for the two houses of Congress to plan a campaign, or direct the details of extensive military operations. When a clause was introduced in the federal convention empowering Congress to make war, it was amended, and the word "declare" was substituted for "make" upon the express ground that the conduct of the war was an Executive function. I do not deny, sir, that in an extreme case Congress could refuse the supplies for the purpose of stopping a war. This [illegible] was not prejudiced by the transfer of the control. tution. They have the right, too, to declare the objects of the war, and [illegible] whether the possibility of [illegible] incompatible with the avowed purposes of hostilities. But, sir, [illegible] Executive function, and it must be an extreme case to justify the interference of Congress in relation to the plans of campaign. In declaring these my views as to the manner in which the war should be conducted it is [illegible] making any plan of campaign a condition of the supplies. No such extreme case has occured as would justify Congress, in my opinion, for such an interference. The responsibility of conducting the war is upon the President, and I am not disposed to take it upon myself by forcing on him a plan of campaign which his own judgment rejects. I shall vote for the supplies which he now asks, and has declared to be necessary as the means to enable him to meet his responsibilities, and I offer my views as to the conduct of the war for no other purpose than to contribute to a full comparison of opinions upon a subject which engages so much of public attention at present.

I would not change the present plan of operations until we ascertain that there is no chance for peace from the party coming into power under Herrera; but if no treaty should be obtained in the course of a few months, I think then we should adopt what has been denominated as the "line policy" first suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. I do not mean, sir, a mere territorial line, bounding the portion of country which we design to acquire, but a military line, comprehending more than we propose to take, and [illegible] suggested. I believe, sir, that this plan would have met with a much better reception, if it had not been misunderstood, and supposed to be a scheme of defensive war, when in reality it was offensive war, but in another form from that which is now pursued. I am in favor of occupying such a line, Mr. President, because it would secure to us all the legitimate objects of the war, as speedily, perhaps more so, than any other plan which has been suggested; because it would save much money and suffering in the future prosecution of the war; because it would diminish the vast patronage arising out of the present system of military operations; and last, but not least, "disentangle us," as the Senator from South Carolina has expressed it, from a dangerous connection with Mexican affairs. Several military lines have been suggested, all of them presenting advantages and having something to recommend them. I take one, for the purpose of comparison, which has been suggested to me by my friend, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) whose knowledge of the subject and military experience give great weight to whatever opinions he may express upon this matter. This line runs from Tampico up the Panuca river to the Sierra Madre, with this range and thence to Agua Nueva; thence to the range of mountain spurs skirting the desert, and forming a species of table land whose streams empty into the Gila, and with this range to a point below the junction of the Gila and the Colorado, and thence to San Diego. This line, he informs me, can be impregnably defended, so far as Mexican means of offence are concerned, by 20,000 efficient men. This is a larger estimate than I have seen made for any other of the proposed lines, but this includes more territory, and to make the comparison fairly, I take the largest. With a sea-coast battery at Tampico, covered by a larger force at the head of navigation on the Panuca, a comparatively healthy place, there, or perhaps four other posts are all that would be required to be of any magnitude. Along this line there are but three or four passes over which artillery could be carried on its wheels. The concentric range of the Sierra Madre through most of the populated portion of the country through which our military line would pass, would increase its self-supporting capacity, and facilitate a concentration of troops if any military exigency should require it. After passing Agua Nueva a little, the country is already held against Mexico by Indian tribes, probably no formidable post would be required until we reached San Diego. Sir, I have his high authority for saying that such a line could be so securely held by 20,000 efficient men, that the people on its northern side would resume their agricultural operations, which are now disturbed by Mexican forays. The troops would thus be enabled to draw their supplies from the country on far cheaper terms than they obtain them at present. Such a line would cover territory enough to give us indemnity for the past and security for the future; for it would cover vastly more territory than we ought to wish to acquire, or than the Exective has already proposed to accept. It would cover some of the most valuable mines of Mexico, and place in our possession the passes indispensable to the trade between the provinces north and those south of the Sierra Madre, amongst which would be that through which the trade between Tampico and San Luis Potosi is conducted. Both the domestic and foreign interests of that province would have a deep concern in the speedy restoration of this commercial outlet to the Mexican people. We should thus create a strong interest for peace with us in the Mexican councils, and possess the means of enforcing a treaty which would secure to us all the objects which can be fairly proposed in the war, the acquisition of territory and a fair commercial treaty. Nominal war we might have for a time, but we should escape most of its real evils. This line, fitted to become the base of future offensive operations should they become necessary, and impregnable for defence, would be secure against any Mexican attack worthy of serious notice, at least until they had settled their divisions and re-established their government; and the moment this last was effected, if it was strong enough to stand at home, it would have the deepest interest in making a treaty with us, and recovering the territory which we were willing to restore. Our trade, too, would continue to be conducted with the Mexican people, to as great an extent as their condition and capacities admitted—for no legal restrictions could prevent the introduction of our goods through such a line into their territory. We might have nominal war for awhile, sir, under this state of things, as I said before; but we should escape most of its real evils. Even this nominal war would probably cease as soon under the policy which I propose, as with the system now pursued. The Senator from Arkansas says that the parchment title is something, and that we have the means of holding by force whatever we acquire by treaty. This is so, sir; and any arrangement which brings peace, and which he may consider enough, will not be, probably, deemed too little by me. But, sir, such an arrangement would not give the security for the future which the other plan would attain, nor would it probably diminish the nominal duration of the war—for the probability is, that the shadow of a government with which we might treat, would be overthrown the moment our troops were withdrawn, and there is an equal chance that those who succeeded would renew the war in name, though probably not in reality, as we should be secured in any territorial line which we should occupy. But, Mr. President, there is yet another strong consideration in favor of occupying such a line. If peace should not speedily come, we should save a great amount of human suffering, and diminish largely our pecuniary expenses. The losses amongst our troops from disease along such a line would be comparatively small, for most of the posts would be in a healthy country; and I think I have little in saying that thus placed, their losses in battle would be almost nothing. In a pecuniary point of view, the advantages of this policy are equally striking. To pursue the present plan of campaign, according to the best estimates which I have been able to obtain, would require at least 50,000 effective men under Scott's command, and some 10,000 or probably 15,000 troops on Taylor's line, and north and west of it. Sixty thousand efficient men are the least that can be estimated as sufficient for the purpose, and I have heard from high authority that 70,000 would be nearer the mark. Now, sir, the Senator from Mississippi estimates 30,000 men as the proper number to be raised, to give 20,000 efficient men for the occupation of his line, and according to that proportion, we should have to raise 90,000 men, to furnish 60,000 effectives, for the other plan of campaign. But, in point of fact, a much smaller proportion of the army would be efficient, when dispersed throughout Mexico, and exposed to all the casualities of disease, and the sword, than amongst men, performing for the most part garrison duty, on a line running through comparatively a healthy country. The difference between the numbers to be raised for the two plans, instead of being 50,000, would probably be nearly 60,000. But let us take the smaller number, and suppose that we save the expense of preparing and maintaining 50,000 men, in that distant country, we shall find the difference striking enough. There is no fair estimate of the cost of war in that country, founded on our past experience, which can make it under $300 per man. I exclude the bounties and the pensions incident on the greater casualities of active operations, and still we have a saving of $25,000,000, in the army alone. In the navy, we should save some two or three millions more, making a difference of expense, of between twenty-five and thirty millions per annum, as you act upon the one or the other plan. I believe, sir, that this is a small estimate. But it may be said, that I overlook the item of revenue, which we should raise from the Mexicans, on the one plan, and to some extent lose on the other. I fear, that our hopes in this respect, are far too sanguine. When we come to substract the additional expenses incident to the mere military government of that country, from what we raise by contributions from them, I fear the surplus will be small, not much more than we could raise with better means of collection, and fewer sources of expenditure, from the country north of the proposed military line. But suppose this fear to be unfounded, and that we could raise some six or eight millions by forced contributions, the difference in the expense of the two plans, would still be $20,000,000, or more. Is not this a matter worthy of consideration—I will not say in the present, but in any state of our finances? Sir, the time was, when the reduction of Executive patronage, which this change of policy would produce, would have been considered as a great recommendation of it to our people. That time, I trust, has not yet passed away. I do not believe that it has. But there is yet another consideration which weighs with great force upon my mind, in favor of the occupation of this line. It would disentangle us from all connexion with Mexican politics, and afford that people an early opportunity to reconstruct their government and social organization, according to their own wishes and necessities. It would save us from all fear of these terrible questions which would arise, if our people should be seduced by temptation, and incline to the permanent subjugation and annexation of Mexico. I believe there is a large majority of them opposed to such a scheme at present, but who can say where the current of events may carry us, if we break up the entire social system in Mexico, and become involved in the dangerous attempt to sustain a government for them. A state of things may arise, which might give them strong claims upon our sympathies, in their demand for our protection against the evils of a horrible anarchy, and the effort to relieve them, may involve us in consequences of the deepest hazard to our own prosperity and institutions. In every point of view it seems to me desirable that we should withdraw to some such line as I have indicated, unless peace is speedily made. But objections have been urged to it, which I shall endeavor to meet. The Senator from New York says, that if we withdraw to such a line, there is danger of foreign interposition. He apprehends that the English and French governments mig'it interpose to reorganise Mexican institutions, according to their views and policy. Sir, I listen to every thing which falls from that distinguished Senator, with great respect. The mere weight of his authority upon military matters is much with me, but I am bound to say, that he did not make good his proposition, by reasons which were satisfactory to my mind. Sir, I regard the danger of foreign interference as much greater, if the present system of policy should be pursued, than if we take the course which I have suggested. A system of operations, which is calculated to destroy the entire fabric of Mexican society, and awaken the fear that we should make a permanent seizure, would be much more likely to provoke foreign interference, than a policy whose objects were proclaimed to be the abandonment of all, except a portion of the wild territory of Mexico, and the restoration of quiet, and the means of reconstructing their government by the Mexican people, as far as this could be done, without sacrificing our own legitimate claims. But if these governments entertain such views, what prevents them from interfering now? The Senator from New York would probably say, the knowledge that such interference would provoke instant war. And would not such interference have the same results, if we occupied such a military line as I have suggested. If their desire to interpose should be strong enough to induce them to hazard war, would not the temptation be far greater when our army was compromised in the heart of Mexico, than if it was posted on such a line as I have described, convenient to our resources, and strong for purposes of defence or offence. At which line would they be most tempted to strike, a base line from Vera Cruz to Mexico, depending for its support upon our naval superiority, or the one nearer to our resources, and so much more difficult for them to reach? I think there could scarcely be two opinions upon the subject. But in point of fact, I do not see much danger of the interference of those powers at present, and especially if we were posted as I have recommended. France is engaged just now, if I may use a word made classic by the distinguished Chairman of Military Affairs, in "swallowing" Algeria, and England is "swallowing" elsewhere, to an extent fully equal to her powers of digestion. But, Mr. President, the withdrawal of our troops has been deprecated, because it might lead to the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico. Sir, I trust no man entertains the idea of our maintaining an army in Mexico, to sustain and guarantee a government in that country, and if this is not proposed, the danger of the establishment of a monarchy by the Mexican themselves, is far greater under the present system of operations, than if we were at once to withdraw to a military line. The present system is fast destroying the old proportion between the elements of Mexican society, it disperses their army, weakens the property holders, who are not members of the priesthood, bears hardest upon the white and a portion of the mixed races, and is breaking down the republican element, which has heretofore scarcely been strong enough to resist the central and monarchial tendencies of the priests. The priesthood are but little weakened absolutely by the present policy, and relatively they are strengthened. We know enough of their past history and tendency, to perceive that it is an element in Mexican society eminently favorable to monarchy. They were of the party of centralistas, and their natural tendencies are to an absolute form of government. If the republican element is much further weakened they will have the most favorable opportunity for indulging their wishes. The relative power, not only of the priests but of the Indians, will be greatly increased. These last constitute four-sevenths of the population, and the mixed races two-sevenths more—the pure white is said not to exceed one-seventh of the mass. The natural tendency of the southern Indian races seems to be towards a despotic hierarchy. This tendency seems to be a national characteristic in the colored races. I know of no instance in which they have accumulated social power to any striking extent, except under despotic forms of government, and generally by a union of the powers of the priest and the monarch. The old Mexican and Peruvian nations were remarkable for the most highly refined despotisms of which we have any account. The moving principle in the civilization of the colored races seems to be social strength—with them society is every thing and the individual nothing. This was the strong point of contrast between the Indian system and the European civilization which developes more largely individual resources. Now sir, if philanthropy has an interest in grafting, successfully, the European principle upon the Indian stock, the chance, I fear, will be lost if the portion of the white race who belong to the laity, be much farther weakened before we withdraw. The temptation to establish a monarchy or hierarchy, I fear, will be irresistible if the priesthood finds itself and the Indians the predominant elements in society. But if we were to withdraw our armies now or in the course of a few months, perhaps the republican element might still be strong enough to control the form of government, and the white race still exercise a predominant influence in it. Mr. President, the Mexican social principle belongs to a distinct system of civilization, a graft of the European upon the Indian stock. Its capacities are perhaps not high, certainly inferior to our own; but still it seems to have a living principle which may serve some useful purpose in the general scheme of Providence. I should be unwilling to disturb it. I would not wantonly tread out the vital spark in any thing that lives. Their system has the growth of more than two centuries, and I would not unnecessarily destroy it.

But, sir, I come now to the last in the series of the objections which I have heard urged against what is called the line policy. It seems to be thought by some, that such a course would stain our military reputation. How could it possibly have that effect, or bear such a construction? We do not withdraw because we feel our inability to subjugate the whole of Mexico, but because it is inconsistent with our views of political or moral propriety to do so. We do not withdraw because we have suffered defeat, on the contrary, a long and unbroken series of victories has illustrated our arms. We do not withdraw because we fear future reverses, for we hold her places of strength and have but to close the hand to crumble the whole fabric of Mexican society in our grasp. We withdraw to accomplish our own legitimate purposes with as little suffering to ourselves and others as possible. In the shade of Cortes still wanders amid the ruined monuments of Aztec civilization, let it stand rebuked at the apparition of another of higher power and more elevated views, who forbears to destroy what he cannot improve and content with what may be necessary for his own uses, leaves the tree where God had planted it for those who require its shelter and take pleasure in its fruit. Sir, our army has done enough for military glory. Monumental marble and history's more enduring page will adorn and record their deeds. May the living long wear the laurels which they have nobly won, and may the fallen whose blood has watered the deadly bay and who snatched the flower, reckless whether it was to adorn the brow or consecrate the tomb, live in the affections of their countrymen—

> Their memories be together linked,
> Whom Greek or hell hereafter fate forges.

There are no further fields in Mexico in which we could add to our military reputation by exhibitions of skill and power. Moderation in success is as necessary as valor to complete the heroic character.

But, Mr. President, I cannot dwell further upon this subject. I have given my views because it was due to candor to do so, but as I said before, I shall not attempt to dictate plans of campaign to the President, whose duty it is to conduct the war and who is responsible for its efficient execution. If I were disposed to interfere I should see no practical result to flow from a refusal of the ten regiments, so far as the plan of campaign is concerned. The same plan would be pursued, but with forces proclaimed to be inadequate for the purpose, by those who are responsible for its execution. If extensive military operations are to be pushed from the heart to the extremities of Mexico, an adequate force should be provided for it. Considerations of peace as well as the interests of war require it.

Mr. President, I have discussed the questions before us in reference only to the proper objects of the war and the best means of attaining them. These are the practical considerations which press most forcibly upon us. I have not entered into any discussion of the origin or justice of the war. The first belongs not to our foreign, but our domestic relations, and the last it is too late consider. Our government and people are committed as to the justice of the war, and that question is no longer open here. If it were, what prevents those who believe the war unjust and that the territory in dispute belongs to the Mexicans, from acting upon the legitimate conclusions from such premises? What prevents them from advocating the abandonment of the country beyond the Nueces, and the offer of indemnity to Mexico for the wrongs which they believe her to have sustained? Such undoubtedly would be the consequences of those opinions, and yet there is not a man here, I presume, who would sustain such propositions. It must be because even those who entertain these extreme opinions believe that the question is no longer open. Why then agitate it and irritate the public mind by allusions which are offensive to it? The sense of national honor beats high in the American heart and its every pulse vibrates at the mere suspicion of a stain upon its reputation. But that same heart is warmed by generous impulses and noble emotions. If you would moderate its lust of empire and its spirit of acquisition, appeal to its magnanimity towards a feeble and prostrate foe—appeal to it in the name of the highest aspirations which can animate the human heart, the desire for moral excellence, the love of liberty, and the noble ambition, to take the post of honor among nations, and lead the advance of civilization. If our people are once awakened to a true conception of the real nature and grandeur of their destiny, the first and greatest step, in my opinion, is taken for its accomplishment. If my imagination were tasked to select the highest blessing for my countrymen, I should say, may they be true to themselves and faithful to their mission. I can conceive of nothing which it is possible for human effort to attain, greater than the destiny which we may reasonably hope to fulfil. If war has its dreams, dazzling in splendid pageantry, peace also has its visions of a more enduring form, of a higher and purer beauty. To solve by practical demonstration the grand problem of increasing social power consistently with personal freedom—to increase the efficiency of the human agent by enlarging individual liberty—to triumph over not only the physical, but more difficult still, the moral difficulties which lie in the path of man's progress, and to adorn that path with all that is rare and useful in art, and whatever is highest in civilization, are in my opinion, the noblest achievements of which a nation is capable. These are the ends to which our ambition should be directed. The sword may be the occasional, but it is not the familiar weapon of our god Terminus. The axe and the hoe are his more appropriate emblems. Let him turn aside from the habitations of civilized man, his path is towards the wilderness, through whose silent solitudes for more than two centuries he has been rapidly and triumphantly advancing. Let him plunge still deeper into the forest, as the natural gravitation of the tide of population impels him onward. His progress in that direction is one of unmixed beneficence to the human race. The earth smiles beneath his feet, and a new creation arises as if by enchantment at his touch. Household fires illuminate his line of march, and new-born lights, strange visitants to the night of primeval solitude, kindle on domestic altars erected to all the peaceful virtues and kindly affections which consecrate a hearth and endear a home. Victorious industry sacks the forest and mines, the quarry, for materials for its stately cities, or spans the streams and saps the mountain to open the way for the advance of civilization still deeper into the pathless forest and the neglected wild. The light of human thought pours in winged streams from sea to sea, and the lingering nomad may have but a moment's pause to behold the flying car which comes to invade the haunts so long secured to savage life. These are the aspirations worthy of our name and race, and it is for the American people to decide whether a taste for peace or habits of war are most consistent with such hopes. I trust that they may be guarded by wisdom in their choice.

Mr. MILLER obtained the floor, and indicated his intention of addressing the Senate upon the bill to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1848.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, in favor of passing a law to provide for the payment of the claims of the representatives of Francis Vigo, for advances to the troops under General George Rogers Clark in the Illinois campaign; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in favor of abolishing the postage on newspapers not sent over thirty miles from the place of publication, and such other modifications of the post office laws as will provide a uniform system of cheap postage on letters and newspapers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post roads.

PETITIONS.

Mr. YULEE, in presenting the memorial of Benedict Madeore, Vicar General of Florida, and pastor of the church of St. Augustine, and the memorial of the trustees and members of that church, praying the re-transfer, to its rightful owners, of the property belonging to the church, which was improperly conveyed to the United States at the session of Florida, as public property, by the Spanish authorities; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, remarked that he had given a cursory examination to the papers connected with this memorial, and that he thought they exhibited a sufficiently fair ground for the title set up by the memorialists to entitle the claim to the deliberate consideration of the committee. He recommended the memorial to their attention.

Mr. BRADBURY presented two petitions of citizens of the county of Hancock, Maine, praying the establishment of a mail route from Bucksport to George's Corner, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Alfred Marshall, Collector of the District of Belfast, in the State of Maine, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of citizens of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on newspapers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Samuel Blake, praying compensation for his services in taking the sixth census; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the memorial of Thomas L. L. Brent, praying to be allowed an outfit as Charge des Affairs of the United States at the court of Madrid; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of C. H. McCormick, praying an extension of his patent for a reaping machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Joseph Nock, praying an extension of his patent for padlocks, desk, chest and trunk locks; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of John W. Leuchs, praying the return of certain goods seized by the Collector of the port of New York, for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, and indemnity for loss sustained by him in consequence of such seizure; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of John Golder, praying remuneration for an alleged infringement by the Government of the United States of his patent for an improvement in the system of public finance; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the petition of John P. Baldwin, praying that a register may issue to him for the schooner Robert Henry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the heirs of James Bell have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

TEMPORARY ENGROSSING CLERK.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund, the person who performed the duties of one of the Engrossing Clerks of the Senate who was sick during the late recess, at the same rate of compensation as was paid to temporary clerks employed by the Senate, but that he be not again engaged.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. BAGBY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing a survey and examination to be made with a view to the establishment of a national foundry at Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama.

MEMORIAL OF FRIENDS.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends for the States of New York, Vermont, Michigan, and some parts adjacent, praying for the settlement of the difficulties with Mexico by negotiation, reported that the same be not printed; which was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked, and obtained, leave to bring in a bill to authorize the relinquishment of the 16th section in certain cases, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed joint resolutions of the following title:

Joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott and the troops under his command, for the [illegible] and gallantry exhibited by them in the campaign of 1847.

Joint resolution expressive of thanks to Major General Taylor.

To which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DOWNS gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he will ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled, "An act to provide for the punishment of offences committed in cutting, destroying, or removing live oak and other timber or trees reserved for naval purposes," approved 2d March, 1831; and for other purposes.

THANKS TO GEN. SCOTT.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott, and the troops under his command, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

Mr. YULEE.—I desire to suggest an amendment to the resolution, or at all events, I hope that the committee to which the resolution will be referred, will so modify the resolution as to make it embrace the officers of the Navy of the United States, who participated in the operations at Vera Cruz.

Mr. BADGER.—Introduce a separate resolution.

Mr. YULEE.—I hope these Naval Officers will be included.

Mr. MANGUM.—I trust that the honorable Senator will not insist upon a reference of this resolution. I think that the usual course has been to pass separate resolutions, and if the gentleman will propose a resolution of thanks to the officers of the Navy, it would meet with our cordial assent. I hope that this resolution will be put upon its passage.

Mr. NILES.—I think that this is a subject of some delicacy, and that the resolution ought to be referred. There is, I presume, no doubt that the body will unanimously agree to carry out the substantial purposes intended to be effected by the resolution. But the form of the resolution may be a matter of some importance; and it may be worthy of consideration, whether the scope of it is such as to do justice to all the officers, who have a right to expect even handed justice from us. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THANKS TO GEN. TAYLOR.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives expres-resources, made its way through the heart of the enemy's country, descended into the valley of Mexico, contended with an army three times its number, strongly fortified in chosen positions, and fighting in defence of their country, beneath the walls of its ancient capital. The least mistake, the smallest blunder on the part of our commanding general would have been destruction to our little army; but there was no blunder, no mistake there. Through narrow defiles, down rocky precipices, along fortified causeways, storming embattled castles, that heroic band fought its way into the walled city of Mexico, and our flag now waves in triumph over its ancient palaces. All this has been accomplished by an army of less than 10,000 men. Well might the Secretary of War state in his report—

"That the capture of the city of Mexico, and the dispersion of the army of the Republic, could not have been accomplished by a force of inferior numbers, or one less capable of sustaining the hardships, encountering the dangers, and fighting the battles which attended the campaign."

When we look to another line of our operations in Mexico, we see that General Taylor is left there to maintain a defensive position with a force of only 5,000 men, the principal part of which were raw troops. He watched them at a time, too, when it was known to the administration, and to the enemy, was on the field with a large force ready to strike at the weakest point of our line. Santa Anna with the knowledge of the reduced force under General Taylor, and of his exposed position, was not long in detecting what he supposed to be an opportunity afforded him to regain his sinking fortunes so as to enable him to fulfill his prior engagements with our Executive, to put an end to the war; but in this he was sadly disappointed. Our little army of five thousand received the shock of twenty thousand men, and threw them back in disastrous flight.

Now, Mr. President, while the world accords all praise and honor to our army in Mexico for unparalleled deeds of skill and valor, and to the gallant officers who disciplined and led those raw troops to victory, it is a matter of astonishment to me, that the success of the Executive should have been attributed to the superior efforts, not a spot of dishonor would have fallen upon either officers or men—yet the country will inquire, why it was that so small a force was employed in the execution of enterprises so disproportionate to its strength. Was it because the country required the sacrifice? Was it because Congress had refused to grant more men and money? No, sir, not at all. For before and at the very time when our armies were exposed to these unheard of hazards, the President had full power to increase our force in Mexico to forty thousand men. I will not say that the President is to blame in not sending this force into the field at a time when it was most required; difficulties attending the enlistment of troops for this war may have prevented it. But certainly neither Congress nor the whig party are to be condemned for leaving Gen. Taylor with five thousand men to contend with twenty thousand, nor are they to be held responsible for directing General Scott to execute the grand campaign of Mexico with only ten thousand men; when by every rule of war twenty-five thousand would have been a small force for an enterprise of such difficulty and hazard.

If twenty thousand men have accomplished all that I have stated in Mexico, will not our present authorized force, amounting to over fifty thousand men, be sufficient for the protection of our army and the maintenance of our positions there? Yet now after the campaign is passed, after all its hazards have been encountered, the victory won, and the enemy helpless and harmless at our feet, the administration wakes up to a sense of duty towards the army in Mexico, talks about its perilous position; and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs calls upon us without any delay to raise ten new regiments for the war. I can see no necessity, connected with the public service in Mexico, requiring this additional force.

I will now proceed to show that this additional force is not necessary to the attainment of any of the objects of the war hitherto avowed by the Executive or contemplated by the country.

There is, I confess, some difficulty in naming all the objects of this war. They are changed, multiplied, or diminished, from time to time at the will of the Executive. It must be manifest to all, that we are fighting to-day for objects not contemplated by any one on the 13th of May, 1846. But as far as we are able to gather these objects from the official communications of the President, they are as follows:

First. To repel invasion and avenge the blood of our citizens;

Second. To overthrow the government of Paredes and to restore Santa Anna;

Third. To obtain indemnity for the past and security for the future;

Fourth. To conquer a peace.

Now, Mr. President, I will endeavor to show from the solemn admissions of the Executive, made in his official communications to Congress, that all these objects have already been fully accomplished, save one—to conquer a peace, which I am inclined to think is the only one now flung the President desires to conquer.

As to the first named object, we all know that the invasion, if invasion it was, has long since been repelled, and repelled, too, in such a manner as forever to secure us against its repetition from that quarter; and as to the shedding of the blood of our citizens, the most sanguinary among us must admit that our vengeance has been glutted to a surfeit. But I will let the President express his own opinion upon this point. In his message of December, 1846, he says:

"Every consideration of honor and interest connected with our future welfare demanded that we should meet this last invasion by instant and energetic action. Under the circumstances which existed when the intelligence reached us, we could not have done less than we did, and have continued to act on the defensive. We must have destroyed the army which invaded our territory, and have conquered and occupied the country of the enemy, as far at least as the Del Norte. Having taken possession of the Mexican provinces on the Del Norte, and established our authority over them, we must have conquered a peace, and have compelled Mexico to indemnify us for the past and secure us against the future. Such would have been the course of other nations under the circumstances. Such was the course which we were compelled to adopt, in vindication of our rights and our honor."

How the second object of the war was attained, I will also let the President state in his own words:

"[illegible] the 13th of May, 1846, [illegible] Congress declaring war between the United States and the Mexican Republic, [illegible] the government of Paredes [illegible] refused to receive the envoy of the United States sent to that country for the purpose of adjusting all the causes of complaint between the two countries, and [illegible] the people of Mexico. [illegible] Paredes, their power was overthrown, and they were compelled to flee the country. A revolution having previously occurred in the capital on the 4th of August following, by which the power of Paredes was overthrown, and he has since been banished from the country, and a new [illegible] Santa Anna, has been recalled from exile, and is now at the head of the Mexican Government."

The third object of the war divides itself into two parts—indemnity and security. I will consider them in their order. First, as to indemnity. We might have been at a loss to know not only what we were to be indemnified for, but also the amount required and the manner of obtaining it, had not the President informed us upon all these points. He tells us that we are to be indemnified for the claims of our citizens upon the government of Mexico, and also for the expenses of the war. The amount is somewhat uncertain, being estimated in lands. The manner of obtaining indemnity is by seizing and appropriating to ourselves certain Mexican provinces or states. With this information before us, I think it can be clearly shown, from the President's late message, that he has this indemnity in amount, mode, manner, and kind, now in his hands, never to be given up. Further, that he has more than full indemnity—more than his sense of justice will permit him to hold without paying back to Mexico several millions of dollars, in order to adjust the account. I will now proceed to show this. Shortly after the adjournment of the last Congress, the President sent a Commissioner, Mr. Trist, to Mexico, with powers to negotiate a treaty of peace with that government. The President says that:

"The commissioner of the United States took with him the project of a treaty [illegible] which [illegible] was submitted [illegible] by the United States [illegible]."

The commissioner of the United States was authorized to agree to [illegible] establishment of the Rio Grande as the boundary, from its entrance into the Gulf to its intersection with the southern boundary of New Mexico, in order to adjust the two claims, and to obtain, in addition to the cession of New Mexico and the Californias, and the privilege of the right of way across the isthmus of Tehuantepec, [illegible] such additional territory as might be required for the safety of New Mexico and Lower California, [illegible] as might be necessary to consolidate the Mexican territory [illegible] and to make a natural and well defined boundary. [illegible] the commissioner was authorized to stipulate for the payment of such additional pecuniary consideration as was deemed reasonable."

Mexico having refused this ultimatum, the President says "we should adopt measures to indemnify ourselves by appropriating permanently a portion of her territory." And not satisfied with his own ultimatum, the President now adds Lower California to the indemnity, and then tells us that New Mexico and the Californias are in our undisputed occupation, and have been for many months; all resistance on the part of Mexico having ceased within their limits, and that he is satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico. But I will read from the message:

"[illegible] Mexico [illegible] resistance [illegible] and have been so for many months; all resistance on the part of Mexico having ceased within their limits, I am satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico. Should Congress concur with me in this opinion, and that they should be retained by the United States as indemnity [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] not how much territorial indemnity we shall conquer from Mexico, but whether we shall hold what we have already acquired. This is a domestic question, and it would be well, I think, for us to settle it among ourselves, before we waste more money and shed more blood in Mexico. It may turn out that while we are fighting Mexico for more territory, we shall reject that which we have already obtained by our arms.

Having shown that we have full, and more than full indemnity for the past, now in our possession, there is nothing left to fight for on this point, but security for the future. I confess that I am somewhat at a loss to know against what we are to be secured, and also what is to be the nature and the character of the security. Is the President afraid that Mexico will hereafter raise new armies to invade the United States, or that she may venture to re-cross the Rio Grande, to re-conquer the disputed territory in Texas? If the mortal blows which we have inflicted upon Mexico are not sufficient security against any future aggressions on her part, nothing short of utter annihilation can give that security, and that kind of security we disclaim. Can it be, that this nation of twenty millions of freemen—this republic of moral and physical power sufficient to defend itself against the world in arms, requires for its safety, a bond from Mexico that she will keep the peace! As well might a giant ask of a fretful pigmy, security against an assault upon his person. But we desire security, says the Senator from New York (Mr. DIX,) against foreign interference in Mexico. I agree to all that that honorable Senator said, and so eloquently said, against the unlawful and wicked policy of foreign interference; but I did not, learn, by the Senator's argument, how we were to resist the injustice of that policy, by interfering with, and overthrowing the government of a sister republic.

But how can you get this security, if you think proper to demand it? Will the word of Mexico, pledged in a treaty, suffice? This would bind Mexico, but it would not bind other nations who might desire to interfere. And who will be Mexico's security that she will keep her word? Will you accept of any foreign interference for that purpose? It is all idle to talk about prosecuting this war to obtain security for the future. The United States is strong enough to be her own security against any future aggression upon her national rights, be it made by Mexico alone, or in combination with any or all the nations of the world.

The fourth object of the war, "to conquer a peace," has not yet been realized.

Although, when Congress acknowledged the war and provided for its prosecution, peace, and speedy peace, was made its first and great object, the policy since pursued by the Executive has so prolonged and so complicated the accomplishment of this object, that it is now very doubtful whether we are to conquer peace until we shall have conquered every thing else in Mexico that can be conquered. Peace now seems to be not only the last, but the least thing worthy of our conquest. But there is a point, in the prosecution of every legitimate war, when peace forces itself upon the successful party. That point is when all the declared objects of the war have been obtained. To carry on a war after this, is to convert a war which may have been legal and just in its inception, into an illegal and an unjust one. It then becomes a war of aggression, having no object for its further prosecution, other than the spoliation or the destruction of the enemy. Such a war can never conquer, that is, restore peace between the contending nations. It is a war against peace. It is war for the sake of war. Thus it is—and such, I fear, is the character now about to be assumed by our war in Mexico—that war assumes its most terrific and ungovernable aspect. Flushed with victory, excited by blood, with the enemy prostrate and helpless at our feet, and every object for which we commenced hostilities attained or within our control, if we do not make peace now, this war will become an ex parte war. Then, with no enemy in the field to resist our arms, and with no government in council to accept our terms of peace, war will become our master, and standing, with the weapons of death and destruction in his hand, upon the ruins of Mexico, will turn his grim visage upon us, and defy our control. It is in vain for us to seek to conquer a peace from Mexico. She is reduced to that postion by our arms, in which she can neither maintain war nor make peace.

But the Executive says we must continue to prosecute the war for the purpose of compelling Mexico to make a treaty with us. Let us enquire how or by what process the President expects to arrive at this result. He informs us in his message, that heretofore the war has been conducted in a spirit of liberality and forbearance towards Mexico. That "The Mexicans having thus shown themselves to be wholly incapable of appreciating our forbearance and liberality, it was deemed necessary to change the manner of conducting the war, by making them feel its pressure according to the usages observed under similar circumstances by all other civilized nations."

To make the Mexicans feel this additional pressure of the war, the President's scheme is this, (part of which has already been executed,) by drawing supplies from the people of Mexico without paying for them—by seizing upon all the external and internal revenues—and in addition to the several States now in our military occupation, to take possession of all the others. To spread our army over all Mexico, and then to prosecute the war with increased energy and power in the vital parts of the enemy's country. In thus prosecuting the war, the President does not fail to see, as all must see, the very result—the overthrow of the Mexican government, which he solemnly disclaims to be his object, and seeing this, he anticipates the emergency, and proposes that if we should, by this increased energy and power, strike so hard as to annihilate the government of Mexico, to restore it to life again and give to the people of Mexico, under the "encouragement of our commanding generals in the field, a free republican government of their own choice, able and willing to conclude a peace which would be just to them, and secure to us the indemnity we demand. This may become the only mode of obtaining such a peace."

But, sir, suppose our commanding generals in the field should fail, by means of forced contributions, by confiscation, by taxes, by stamp duties, by striking first at the heart and then at the vitals, by fire and sword, to encourage the people of Mexico in the establishment of a free republican government of "their own choice," able and willing to conclude a peace which would secure to us the "indemnity we demand." What then? The President has also guarded this point. He is prepared even for this ultimatum. Let him answer for himself.

"If, after affording them encouragement and protection, and after all the persevering and unremitting efforts we have made, from the moment Mexico summoned the war, and prior to that time, to obtain a speedy and honorable peace, we shall, unsuccessful, then we shall have exhausted all honorable means in pursuit of peace, and must continue to occupy her country, or wage ruinous warfare for the full measure of indemnity into our own hands, and must enforce the terms which our honor demands."

Then, indeed, we shall have exhausted all means of peace, for we shall then stand upon the tomb of a sister republic, amidst the ruins of her former glory, and with the arrogance of the conqueror, take full measure of indemnity into our own hands and enforce such terms as our honor demands. There will be none to stay our hand or to resist our power. The President here drops his demand of "security for the future." It is well; for there will then be no future left to Mexico. Who so blind as not to see the result to which the policy of the Executive leads? Who does not see that his conquest of peace means the conquest of Mexico?

I will now proceed to consider my fourth proposition. That the additional military force now asked for, is to be used for the purpose of conquering Mexico and annexing her people and territory to our Union. This, I have said, is a new object of the war, never before openly avowed by the Executive, nor sanctioned by Congress, nor contemplated by the country.

It is something more than a new object of an existing war. It is in fact a new war now about to be authorized or rejected by Congress. In comparison to this war for the annihilation of Mexico, that called the existing war, will soon be only known by the name of the late war. The causes which brought it on, and the objects for which it was waged, will be overlooked and forgotten, or only recited as a prologue to that deep and fatal tragedy we are now about to perform on Mexico.

One of the greatest obstacles to the adjustment of our difficulties with Mexico, arises out of the fact, that there never was a legal declaration of war by either nation. Congress has not to this day declared the causes which led to the war, nor specified the objects for which it is to be prosecuted, other than the general ones I have before stated, a speedy and successful peace. Instead of a solemn declaration of causes and objects, we have had nothing but catch-words and cant phrases—such as revenging blood, conquering peace, indemnity and security, manifest destiny, and the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race. Now, sir, before we enter upon this war, for the annihilation of a sister republic, let us at least declare to the world the causes which impel us to the act. When in the course of human events it became necessary for our fathers to dissolve the political bands which connected them to the mother country, and to assume among the powers of the earth a separate and equal station, they deemed it due to the opinions of mankind, that they should declare the causes which impelled them to the separation. With what religious solemnity and scrupulous particularity they recount the causes which led them to resort to arms in defence of their rights!

If in the case of a revolutionary war—a war in defence of social and political liberty—a decent respect to the opinions of mankind required a declaration of the causes which led our people to dissolve the political bands which had connected them with another, how much more does a respect for those opinions demand of us to declare the causes which impel us to destroy the political existence of a sister republic, for the purpose of annexing its people and territory to our dominion?

If it be the will of this nation to prosecute a war for this purpose, it is due to ourselves, it is due to Mexico, it is due to the world, that we should, by all the forms known to the constitution, and to the laws of nations, declare the causes and the objects of such a war. At present there is no authority expressed or implied for its prosecution; there is no statute, nor the preamble to a statute, acknowledging its existence. The bill now upon our table, if it should pass, will be the first act by the war-making power, giving sanction to this new war. For this undeclared, unacknowledged, unlawful, executive war, I will not vote one dollar nor one man. Upon this point I take my stand, and make the issue upon the conquest of Mexico and its annexation to our Union. For the accomplishment of such an object, I cannot, I dare not, and I will not, give to the Executive either men or money.

But it is said that the Executive does not intend to prosecute the war to this fatal result. Whatever may be the intentions of the Executive, I know not; but, I think, I have already shown that the policy laid down in his late message, for the future prosecution of the war, must inevitably lead to the annihilation of Mexico. In addition to this, much evidence has been elicited during this debate to satisfy me, that if this result is not designed, it is certainly expected.

When the distinguished Senator from South Carolina introduced his resolutions against the annihilation of the sovereignty of Mexico, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. CASS) called it an abstraction, and that Senator was so much surprised by the monstrosity of the proposition, that he involuntarily exclaimed from his seat, "who thinks of it?" It was a thought too monstrous to be entertained for a moment. Yet, sir, but a few days pass, and that honorable Senator does think of it.

Mr. CASS said, no, he had never thought of any such thing, and hoped the Senator from New Jersey would not misrepresent him.

Mr. MILLER.—I certainly do not wish to misrepresent that honorable Senator, and, I think, if he will hear me a little further he will be satisfied that I have no such intention. I do not say that that Senator is in favor of the project, for I know he has disclaimed it several times in the course of this debate, and I am happy to hear him disclaim it now; but certainly that Senator must admit that he has since thought of the subject—thought of it, too, with complacency—thinks the thing can be done without harm—for he has said that if we should swallow all Mexico it would not kill us. He has also been thinking about public opinion relative to the subject, and has come to it: the people of the United States make up their minds to have all Mexico, it would be as vain in us to attempt to defeat that opinion, as to resist the cataract of Niagara. This is an apt simile for the subject; I have no doubt that the public opinion which shall compel us to swallow all Mexico, will be of the cataract order. For public opinion collected into such a riotous, tumultuous, ungovernable torrent as that, I may have some fear, but can have no respect. Yet, I think the honorable Senator is more than half inclined to push his bark into it, and with the current leap the cataract.

But we have something more than mere thoughts and opinions upon this subject. The abstraction of the Senator from South Carolina is rapidly getting to be a reality. One Senator tells us the thing may be done without harm; another tells us how it is to be done; a third points out the mode and manner in which we shall dispose of the people of Mexico after we have annihilated their government. And then comes the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. FOOTE) who, to satisfy the consciences of a Christian people that the conquest is lawful, gives us divine authority for the act. He refers us to the conquest of the land of Canaan by the Israelites. Without stopping to inquire whether there is any second Moses among us, who has seen the burning bush or heard the voice on the mountain, I would gently beg leave to remark, that the Senator's authority does not suit our case. The children of Israel were slaves in Egypt. They left the land of bondage and went into the land of promise—the land of their fathers, too—for the purpose of obtaining religious and political freedom; but in our Exodus we are to go from the land of liberty, from the land of our fathers, down into the land of bondage, into a strange land where our fathers have never been. The only similarity in the two cases will be found in the journey through the wilderness of fiery serpents and deadly plagues.

We next have the acts of the government in the general order lately issued by our commanding general in Mexico under the direction of the Executive. By this order the army is to spread itself over, and to occupy, the republic of Mexico. Then the order directs that,

"The occupation of the principal point or points of the enemy's country by the forces of the Federal Government of the Republic of [illegible] shall not [illegible] and hostilities [illegible] in the year 1848 [illegible] by the two contending governments, as all such taxes or duties will be an object of the proposed negotiations for the support of the army of occupation."

The natural result of the above proposition is [illegible] shall be the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible].

In addition to this, the Chairman on Military affairs, speaking by authority, informs us that the increase of the army is required to enable us to take possession of every state capital in Mexico; to go from town to town, in order to conquer what he calls the stubborness of the Mexican people. What kind of warfare is this, and in what must it result? Hitherto, we have been warring against the government of Mexico, we have been fighting for what we called national rights on our part, against national wrongs and aggressions on the part of Mexico. We have with our own men and money, hitherto carried on this war. We have met the national enemy in fair fight, defeated all his armies, and overthrown his government. What do we propose to do now? Why, sir, to make war upon the people of Mexico, in their private and social character. To go from town to town, not to contend with armed men, but to tax unresisting citizens; not to storm national forts, but to intrude into every man's castle, his dwelling house; not to capture national property, magazines, arsenals and fortified places, but to collect tobacco rents, playing card rents, and stamp paper rents. If this be the kind of service in which these ten regiments are to be employed, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) that they should be "composed of a lower material."

It is no fit service for the gallant citizen soldier. Police men, tax gatherers and constables, and old custom house officers, are the materials for this army. It is no place for the heroes of the last campaign, and I congratulate the Senator, as one of those honored heroes, upon his having retired from such a service as this. It is well that the gallant Quitman and the heroic Shields found have leave of absence. It is right that the old hero of Buena Vista, should be permitted to return to the comforts of his own fireside.

Yes, sir, if this be the kind of warfare you intend to carry on in Mexico, call home, (don't suspend,) call home under any pretence you may please to assign, the commanding general. That is no fit business for the Wellington of the new world, although the first of generals, he will make but a poor collector of taxes.

Mr. DAVIS. of Mississippi.—Will the honorable Senator allow me an opportunity to correct the misconception he has fallen into of the true meaning of my remarks, to which he has just made a special reference? The Senator has greatly misapprehended my meaning, greatly misunderstood my feeling, if he supposes that I said, or thought, that the regular soldiers of our army should be drawn from a class morally degraded. I described the duties of holding posts upon military lines; when active service was not anticipated, where the presence of danger did not act as a substitute for discipline, and where there can be but little to support that military enthusiasm which draws the militia man from his home, as more appropriately and beneficially to be performed by "regulars." I spoke of them as a class of men whose commercial and family connections were not such as to make it a great sacrifice to continue in war, whose condition reconciled them, for the pay of a soldier, to take up arms and follow it as the profession of their life. Upon such men standing in such relations to the government, it is admissible, it is just to impose duties which we should not require to be performed by the volunteer—a citizen whose professional, property, and family interests are suffering in his absence; a patriot whose ear became deaf to every other voice when he heard his country calling for men to sustain her standard in a foreign war. I surely never intended to degrade in his uses or his character, my old comrade, the regular soldier. In my estimation we have no class among our citizens suited for such purposes as the Senator indicates. These purposes are of his own creation. Our officers have never projected the working of mines by soldiers, nor have they created the duties of tax gatherers; they have done no more than the universal usage of civilized war justifies in such cases, they have fallen far short of the practice by invading armies of other countries. To a very small extent only has it ever been attempted to quarter our forces upon the enemy. The only question which could be justly entertained, is, whether our leniency has not exceeded the limit of policy. The Senator, as others have done before him, treats of the enemy as conquered, prostrate, at our mercy. He says Mexico must be galvanized into the seeming of hostility. Heretofore I have expressed the opinion, that this confidence in the helplessness of Mexico might produce such results as flowed from the ill founded security of former times. Lying before me are two papers just received—one contains a letter from the mouth of the Rio Grande, dated 25th of January, the other a statement from an officer recently returned from the army division commanded by Gen. Wool. Both speak of a probable attack upon that column—both refer to the organization of another movement from San Luis de Potosi. In the beginning of this discussion I urged the speedy passage of the bill before us, to meet exactly this contingency. It is one of the various reasons which now, as then, in my opinion calls for prompt action by the Senate. If the Senator will indulge me, I will notice a remark which he made in special reference to my colleague, who was not in his seat. It was in reference to the general charge against the democracy of the present day, as imprudently grasping after territory, as unmindful of the lessons of our fathers, and unmindful of the limitations of the constitution. The men of our revolution, when forming the compact of our Union, looked to the north and contemplated the annexation of the British possessions in Canada. The hardy pioneers who crossed the Alleghanies, whilst they yet stood in the midst of a vast wilderness, were ready to secure their commercial interests by fighting for the mouth of the Mississippi. By revolutionary movement a part of West Florida was seized by our people, for security. President Madison extended United States jurisdiction over it. Alexander Hamilton, who will probably be recognized as the highest authority by the honorable Senator, entertained opinions compared to which, any I have heard expressed here are very circumscribed. In a letter addressed to Major McHenry, in 1797, Mr. Hamilton says, in connection with the subject of military preparation:

"Beside, as intimated, against invasion, we ought to look certainly to the possession of Louisiana and Louisiana one would not give a straw for South America."

Forbearing from either comment or argument, I refer to these evidences in our past history, to show that the conduct of the present administration has not exceeded the policy of past times; that we are not merely running into excesses, but, as a comparison of conduct will show, the men of to-day are more conservative than those of an earlier period. They strode forward with the free, vigorous step of youth; we move with the cautious, measured tread of maturer years; and when we are called "progressives," and charged with rashness in our policy of territorial extension—let history answer.

Mr. MILLER.—I would be the last to misrepresent the Senator. The kind of service I refer to is that indicated in the General Order issued by the commanding general under the direction of our Executive. It is this kind of service which I consider would be degrading to the gallant spirit who fought the last campaign, and in that view, I think the Senator and myself entirely agree. For, sir, did not the Senator on the occasion to which allusion has been made, draw a very strong line of distinction between the volunteers and regulars with especial reference to the morale of the two descriptions of military force? Did he not speak of the one as the "chivalry of the country"—"the high-bred gentlemen," fitted for the battle; whilst he represented the other as "men of a low grade in society," adapted to the "mere routine duties of the police of a garrison?" Certainly, it my recollection serves me, the honorable gentleman made that distinction the very basis of his argument in favor of the employment of regulars instead of volunteers, and told us expressly that the service which now remained to be discharged by our troops in Mexico was of a character which the "chivalry" would spurn!

I have referred to this new mode of prosecuting the war for the purpose of showing, that by it the Executive intends not peace, not indemnity for the past, nor security for the future, but the entire conquest of Mexico and the annihilation of her nationality. He has already more than half accomplished his purpose. The military decree which I have read snows that all power in Mexico, political, municipal and social, is now exercised by our commanding General. Having overthrown by our arms every organic form of government in Mexico, we are now at work upon the elements of society, and in every town and village? in every man's house, and upon every man's property, the hand of our power is seen and felt. This is conquest, thorough and entire, it is conquest in that terrific form, mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) ruin, national ruin, the annihilation of all organised power to resist the conqueror. For what purpose then do you want this new army? For no purpose that I can conceive of but to reduce a subjugated country to your possession.

The Senator from South Carolina used a bold and startling figure when he said Mexico was now a corpse, but it is no less true than bold. The government of Mexico is dead; it can neither raise a hand to resist our power, nor a voice to ask our mercy. Mexico lies before us a mere subject for dissection. The mortal blows inflicted by our army have brought her to this. There is no more work for the sword to do. Now let the President approach and operate upon the subject. This is his business! Cut off an arm or a leg, sever the head, strike at the heart, pierce the vitals, dont be afraid! It is a poor dumb thing, it can neither speak nor strike.

But do not, I pray you employ our gallant army in this mere surgical operation. The Secretary of State with a galvanic battery, if made of gold, can give motion enough to the hand to blur a mark to a treaty of peace, and a little more pressure upon the body will force out sounds resembling indemnity and security.

But to drop this ghostly figure, what I mean to say is, that Mexico is now reduced to that helpless condition, that peace and the terms of peace are within our power, and under our sole control and dictation. To this point I now desire to call the attention of the Senate.

All parties here have expressed a desire for speedy and honorable peace. The Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] says that there is no man in the nation more opposed to this war than the President himself. If all be sincere in this desire, I believe we can have peace now, and save any further waste of blood or money. All admit that we are the conquering power, and as such we have the right to dictate the terms of peace. This places upon us the high responsibility of saying to a prostrate foe, what shall be honorable peace? I ask, then, what do you mean by honorable peace, ourselves being judges? Do you mean national honor vindicated, national rights sustained, and national security acquired? or do you desire to continue the war for revenge, for conquest, and for spoliation? If the former be our object, we have obtained them all. National honor has been fully vindicated by our gallant army. Indemnity, we have now in our possession more than our justice will permit us to hold. If security for the future, we have it in our national character, and in the terrific strength of our military power. Military glory! we are covered all over with it, sufficient for reputation abroad, and for home consumption for fifty years to come.

In dictating terms of peace to Mexico, we must take care not to ask of her more than she can give. Our justice as well as our humanity forbids such an exaction. The President acknowledges this principle when he says we cannot ask money in payment of our claims, because Mexico has not got it to give. We should, therefore, not ask Mexico to sell and transfer her people to us. The people are her children, and she has not the power, morally, or politically, to transfer them, nor we the right to demand them at her hands. Upon this government now rests the responsibility of restoring peace or of prolonging the war. Mexico can have but little to say or do in the matter. If nothing but acquisition of territory will satisfy our demands, why not take it; and be done with this war. Why fight Mexico in order to compel her to grant that which we have already acquired, and declared to be permanently ours, and which she has no power to rescue from our enjoyment? I consider the terms of peace with Mexico no longer a question between her and the United States. It has become purely a domestic question? Whether we shall take the whole, part, or none of Mexico; whether we shall dismember her, and devour in parts, or swallow her whole, are questions to be settled between ourselves.

These are the very questions which are now entertained by the Executive, are discussed by honorable Senators here, and which agitate the public mind. Can we agree upon these questions? Some are for no territory, some for part, a few for the whole. The north for free, the south for slave territory, some for regenerating Mexico, others for annihilation, some for holding her as a province, others for annexation to the Union. But of all these who thinks of consulting Mexico as to which mode she would prefer. It is not Mexico who prevents peace upon the terms demanded by our Executive. It is the people of the United States—it is the safety of the Union—it is the constitution, which now stand in the way to reject that, which Mexico has already yielded to our arms.

Peace, I repeat, is now under our sole control and dictation. Why not then, I ask, meet the high responsibilities of the occasion, and in the spirit of justice and humanity make peace for ourselves. Mexico is at your mercy. You may kill her, or let her live. You may take part or all her territory as your interest or your honor may dictate. The enemy has felt your power, now let him feel your clemency, and if the latter shall be as great as the former, the glory of our arms will be only surpassed by the more enduring glory of our justice and mercy. Make peace upon any terms you choose, you need not fear a loss of national honor. For he who has power to dictate peace to a vanquished foe cannot be disgraced by the liberality of its terms. Let us then bring this war to a close. The country demands it at our hands. Our vengeance fully gratified submits to it. Our honor vindicated in ten glorious victories without a single defeat, calls for it. A prostrate foe supplicates it. The business of the people from every field of labor cries for it. The safety of our free institutions commands it. And what, I ask, forbids it. Nothing! but the false shame of party inconsistency. The cowardice of politicians. The lust of dominion, and that Turk-ery, manifest destiny.

Mr. President: In consulting the history of nations, it will be found that there is an epoch in the existence of each, when a temptation presents itself, which resisted or yielded to, marks the future character of the nation for good or for evil. That temptation is now presented to this republic—it is Mexico. It is a broad and a rich land—a land of silver and of gold—a land without a government to protect it, and without a people capable of defending it, and it lies before us an easy tempting prey. There is none to stay our hand or to resist the gratification of our ambition. The mystery of her origin, the story of her former conquest, play upon our fancy and excite our heroic passions. Already has the tempter carried us to the pinnacle of the temple and pointed out the rich treasures of the city beneath. We now stand upon the high mountain—at our feet lie twenty states, with their cities and towns—their temples of religion, and their palaces of state. The tempter whispers in our ear all these shall be yours if you will fall down and worship the god conquest. History stands ready with her pen of steel to record our determination. Shall we bow down to the evil spirit, and fall as other nations have fallen, or shall we maintain our virtue and rise to god-like courage, and say "get thee behind me Satan." The temptation is mighty—the power to resist only divine. I know of no nation, in ancient or in modern times that would resist so easy, yet so rich an acquisition to its dominion. To say nothing of the heathen world, not one of the powers of modern Europe, would withstand the temptation. England would not, as she has shewn by her conquest in the east. France would not, as she is now proving by her attempts upon Algeria. As to Russia, Prussia, and Austria, let the partition of Poland answer. There, too, is old Spain, once the proudest and the mightiest of them all, she also has had her temptation. It was this same Mexico which now fascinates us. Allured by its mines of silver and gold, which now entice us—excited by the spirit of propagandism, which now inspires us, she too yielded to the tempter, and for a while went on from conquering to conquer, until in her turn, she was made to lick the dust beneath the chariot wheels of that false deity she had worshipped, when that chariot rolled in triumph over the fair fields of Aragon and Castile. No. sir, I can find no example of this high standard of national virtue and forbearance. If we resist this temptation, we shall set an example to the world. Ours the wisdom, ours the virtue, ours the glory, of forbearing to seize upon the territory of a weak and defenceless neighbor, when we had opportunity and the excuse of doing so. We have already in our short history, set one great example to the nations of the earth. We have laid the foundation of a mighty empire, deep and strong, upon a principle new and startling to the old world. We have established self-government, and bound in strong and happy union, twenty millions of freemen, who acknowledge no government, but that of their own choice. Let us now establish another principle of national action, equally new and startling. Let us declare that while we admit the oppressed of every land, to a free participation of the blessings of our self-government' no cause of war, no excuse, no temptation will induce us to conquer a nation by war, for the purpose of subjugating its territory and people to our dominion.

If in respect to such a high principle as this, our victorious army should return from the field of its glory in Mexico, without bringing with it one ounce of gold, or one foot of territory, for indemnity and security, would it not, I ask, be a glorious termination of this war on our part?

We have put upon our national record, that "war exists by the act of Mexico," Whether this record be true or false, whether this act of blood and war was perpetrated by Mexico, or by our own executive, I will not stop to inquire. Let us now, in the flush of victory, and in the might of our power, record upon our national history another act. An act, the glory of which will obliterate for ever, the obnoxious preamble. Let us declare to the world, that if Mexico was weak enough, and wicked enough to cause war to exist, peace now exists by the sovereign act of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor, and signified his intention to address the Senate upon the bill to-morrow, but subsequently yielded it to Mr. NILES, with an informal understanding that he should be allowed to follow the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CASS intimated his intention of proposing to-morrow, and, he hoped it would be agreed to, that the Senate hold evening sessions, until the termination of the debate upon the Ten Regiment Bill.

Mr. BERRIEN, said he hoped the suggestion of the honorable Senator, would not be received with favor by the Senate. They were engaged in the discussion of a question of deep interest, as they believed to the community. The honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber, had been heard patiently; they had discussed the subject at their leisure. Senators on this side desired a like privilege, and they had a right to expect that no urgency on the part of honorable Senators on the other side, would be allowed to deprive them of that privilege. He was content to sit day after day, and listen to the remarks of Senators, and to limit his own to a single day, but he prayed not to be forced into into evening sittings, at this period of the Session.

Mr. CASS said he did not intend to press the question to-day. In regard to what was said by the honorable Senator from Georgia, he would say that it was as disagreeable to him as it could be to any Senator, to press a proposition of this kind; but there was, in this case, an absolute necessity for speedy action upon the bill. He was desirous of submitting some remarks himself, and he was unwilling to inflict any restraint upon other Senators, which he would not submit to himself.

MEXICAN NEGOTIATIONS.

On motion by Mr. BALDWIN, the vote by which the resolution submitted by him on yesterday, was this day agreed to, was reconsidered.

The question recurring upon agreeing to the resolution,

Mr. SEVIER moved to amend by inserting, between the word "submitted" and the word "so," the following:

"And that no correspondence between any person or persons on the part of the United States and any other person or persons, with reference to the subject of the recent and present negotiation between the United States and Mexico, other than the notes of Mr. Trist in Mexico, subsequently to and including the date of the general note to Mr. Trist by the commissioners of Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1848.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the Chair to-day.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, respecting lands granted for military bounties, in the State of Illinois, which was ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTION OF THE NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

Mr. DIX presented a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, instructing the Senators, and requesting the representatives of that State in Congress, to use their efforts to effect the exclusion of slavery from any provincial or territorial government which the United States may hereafter establish; which were read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of John P. Andrews, proposing a plan for preventing the evils of war among nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BREESE presented the memorial of the heirs and legal representatives of Nicholas Jarrot, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to certain lands in the State of Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of the heirs at law of Timothy P. Anderson, deceased, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the economy of water power by means of a graduated spout; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of Alexander Vattemare, a citizen of France, praying the establishment of a permanent agency by the United States, for exchanging the books and public documents printed and published under their sanction, for similar works published under the authority of Foreign Governments; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRUANCE presented the memorial of masters of vessels engaged in the coasting trade, praying the construction of an Ice harbor at Delaware city, in the Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Justus Powers, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the memorial of George Wilkes, praying the adoption of measures for the construction of a national railroad from the Michigan river to the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition of the administrator of John Anderson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That the petition of Aaron Weeks, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the guardian of Artemas Conant have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

COMPENSATION TO MESSENGERS.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That there be paid to each of the Messengers of the Senate, and [illegible] to the Secretary of the Senate, who have not already received it, the same additional compensation that was paid to R. P. Anderson and J. L. Cobb for the second session of the twenty-ninth Congress.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of making further provisions by law, respecting imprisonment for debt on process issued from the courts of the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked that he had received a communication, for the accuracy of which he could not vouch, as its source was unknown to him, setting forth a case of very considerable hardship and apparent cruelty, growing out of imprisonment under a process issuing out of the courts of the United States. He thought it proper to lose no time in bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate; and if the Senate saw fit to adopt the resolution, he would place the communication in the hands of the Judiciary Committee, whose early action upon the subject he solicited.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Alborne Allen, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Barclay and Livingston and Smith, Thurgar and Company, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRIVATE BILLS REPORTED.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of William Grayson, deceased, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Colonel William Grayson.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Welcome Parmenter, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

Mr. J. from the same Committee, to whom was referred the petition of David Currier, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The said bills were severally read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the several reports be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment:

An act for the relief of Mrs. Harriet Eames.

GRANTING A REGISTER.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of John P. Baldwin, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of a register or enrolment to the schooner Robert Henry; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives, in said bill.

MAP OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the examination of New Mexico, made by Lieut. J. W. Abert, of the Topographical Corps, reported that it be printed, and that 2,000 additional copies of with the map accompanying the report, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN MISSOURI AND ARKANSAS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judicary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, confirming the boundary between Missouri and Arkansas, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

CONCERNING TESTIMONY.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill concerning testimony, reported it with amendments.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT IN ARKANSAS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts.

In submitting an amendment to this bill,

Mr. SEVIER said that it would be perceived that this bill proposed to establish a court without a judge, or at least that the duties were to be performed by the present judge. The object of the amendment was to create a judge for this court, and he thought that he could assign satisfactory reasons for that proceeding. The State of Arkansas, as the Senate was aware, was one of great territorial extent, and had attached to it the jurisdiction of all the Indian tribes on the border, which extended from that line indefinitely westward.

Mr. DAYTON suggested that as the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) at whose request the bill had been postponed was not now in his seat, the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. SEVIER had no disposition to press the bill in the absence of the Senator. He would send his amendment now to the desk and if printed by to-morrow he would submit it.

Mr. ASHLEY hoped that the bill would not lose its priority as it had been made the special order for to-day.

Mr. SEVIER remarked that it could be called up to-morrow of course.

Mr. ATCHISON was opposed to the bill; but as it had already been passed over on several occasions, and a good deal of time had thus been wasted, he moved that it be made the special order for Monday two weeks.

Mr. DAYTON hoped that the motion would be assented to by the Senator from Arkansas. He knew that the Senator from Kentucky was anxious that a particular day should be fixed for the consideration of the bill, so that it might be disposed of in some way.

Mr. ASHLEY objected. The bill had already been deferred again and again. It had been made the special order for to-day, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Kentucky. He had no desire, however, to take it up in the absence of any gentleman who felt any interest in the subject; although he must confess he was opposed to deferring the consideration of the bill for the period mentioned by his friend, the Senator from Missouri. He hoped that it would be continued on the docket till to-morrow, and retain its priority.

Mr. SEVIER had but one remark to make. The bill had been called up on the day before yesterday, and he then obtained the consent of his colleague to postpone it another day, in order to allow him an opportunity of preparing an amendment, giving a judge to the court. When he was prepared with his amendment, his colleague was absent; and he did not press it. He was willing that it should be postponed for a short time, till to-morrow or next day; but he hoped that it would not be postponed indefinitely, or to a remote period. He believed that he had been assailed at home, because he had not urged the measure. Certainly he had been ready at all times to support the bill, and did not wish to afford the slightest ground for the representation that he was at all unfriendly to it. But he had been assailed because he had not made speeches to get the bill taken up. He wished it to be taken up, and was prepared to make a speech upon it, showing its importance and expediency.

Mr. ATCHISON thought that the bill was indeed one of great importance, and that that consideration furnished an additional reason why a day should be fixed for the discussion of it. He thought that it proposed a new principle ——

Mr. SEVIER begged his friend from Missouri to allow him to make an explanation. It was true that one of the sections of the bill provided that the court within its jurisdiction thus created, extending into the Indian country, should have cognizance of civil and criminal cases also. It was the object of the amendment to restrict the jurisdiction of the court, within the limit of the Indian tribes, to such cases as were made cognizable by our courts by the intercourse law of 1832, and the modification of that act in 1834 and the cases specified in the Indian treaties.

Mr. ATCHISON was not yet satisfied with respect to the propriety of the object contemplated in the bill. He, therefore, insisted on his motion to make bill the special order for Monday two weeks.

Mr. WESTCOTT suggested that the bill should be recommitted with the amendment. He was opposed to this alteration of bills in the Senate. Let it be sent back to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SEVIER read the section of the bill which he proposed to amend, and made some additional explanation of the object of the amendment.

The bill was then postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Monday the 28th instant, and the amendment was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILL PASSED.

The bill for the relief of William Marvin, in confirming the title to a tract of land in Florida, granted by the Spanish government to Bernardo Segui on the 20th December, 1815, was read a third time.

Resolved, That the [illegible] be so informed.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. NILES.—Mr. President: The question on the passage of this bill seems to be overlooked, and the main question which is brought under consideration is our present relations with Mexico; and this is one of such magnitude and importance, that I shall make no apology for trespassing on the patience of the Senate sufficiently to express my opinions upon it, notwithstanding the time already consumed in this debate. This question, sir, involves the issue of peace or war; that is, of prolonging the existing war perhaps indefinitely, or of bringing it to a speedy termination. And as the prosecution of this war may, and probably will involve this country with Mexico in such a way that we cannot dissolve the connection; it involves a much graver question, that of the integrity of this confederacy and the safety of our free institutions. A more important question than this has probably never come under the consideration of the Senate. Does it not demand at our hands that deliberate, prudent, and wise consideration, due to the best and highest interests of our country? In this spirit it is my purpose to offer my sentiments upon it, with that freedom and independence which belong to a representative of a sovereign state of this Union.

Mr. President, I am one of the majority of this body, who has had an agency, so far as legislative action is concerned, in placing the country in its present critical and embarrassing relations with Mexico. I have voted for all the measures which have led to this result; for the annexation of Texas, the recognition of war, and for all the measures for sustaining and prosecuting the war. For all these measures, except the first, my vote was given cheerfully and with a full conviction that the circumstances of the country required it. In regard to the first, which occasioned all the rest, my support was given to it with some hesitation and reluctance—not that I doubted the right, so far as Mexico was concerned, to receive Texas into this Union; but my difficulties arose from the form of the proceedings, from constitutional scruples, from apprehensions of trouble with Mexico, and an unwillingness to deliver up the whole of that country to slavery. But waiving all these objections, I gave my support to the measure, and I am not now disposed to shrink from the just responsibility which attaches to it.

But these considerations, in my judgment, impose on me an obligation which I might not otherwise feel, to use my best efforts, however feeble, to extricate the country from its present situation. This war has been peculiar in some respects, and perhaps its dangers are none the less on that account. Hitherto its evils have scarcely been felt or realized by the country at large. Our internal peace has not been disturbed or threatened; our frontiers have not been invaded or disturbed; no fleets have hovered upon our coasts; and our commerce, so liable to be interrupted in all wars, has not not been molested; and the past year exhibits an expansion and prosperity never equalled in our whole history. And as this is the source of our revenue, that has remained unimpaired so far as the war is concerned. Hitherto, no war taxes have been imposed, and not the first dollar has been raised towards the expenses of this war. But for the accounts which we have received from time to time of the brilliant achievements of our arms in Mexico, we should scarcely have realized that the country was not in a state of profound peace. But we must not expect that this state of things can continue. The evils of the war are beginning to be felt; and the pressure of them will increase daily upon us. Our finances are already getting into a deranged state; a public debt is rapidly accumulating; and with no other resource but loans, you are diverting the capital of the country from its accustomed channels, and the diseased state of your finances may soon disturb the whole monetary concerns of the country. This will be felt on all its great interests; on its commerce, its manufactures, and soon the industrial classes may feel its paralysing effects. It is not in the nature of things that the burdens of a war can all be thrown on the future, or upon posterity. Nor would this be just, could it be done. It would have a direct tendency to weaken the restraints upon those passions, which lead nations into unnecessary wars. The generation which from imprudence, or misfortune becomes involved in war, must bear a share, and a large share of its burdens and evils. This is as just, as it is a result which is unavoidable. We need not think to escape it; we cannot if we would, and we should not, if we could. The burdens and evils of this war are now pressing upon the country, and this pressure will increase, if the war is prolonged. It is an expensive war, prosecuted in a foreign country and will make a constant drain upon our resources. Its dangers may be less apparent and more remote; but are not on this account, the less certain, or the less deserving of the most serious attention. Is it not time then to consider whether this war cannot be brought to a close, consistently with the rights and honor of the country? And in examining this question we must not lose sight of the original character and objects of the war, as a defensive one on our part—a war in which we were involved by the folly and rashness of the military rulers of Mexico. Although not commenced by us for a redress of grievances, yet being involved in it, it is our right and duty to demand of Mexico full satisfaction of all our just claims upon her. When we can obtain this, we should put an end to hostilities.

Mr. President, thus far we stand well in relation to this war before the world, and have nothing to fear from the impartial judgment of posterity. It was just in its commencement, and has been prosecuted with signal success; and it now only remains that we bring it to a close, in a manner equally consistent with our national rights and honor, and a just regard to the interests of humanity.

If we secure a just indemnity, we should desire no more, as we have a rich harvest of glory in the success of our arms, and the unsurpassed splendor of our military achievements. Those are great, unparalled in modern warfare. Nor is this glory to be lightly estimated. It is not a thing merely to be talked about, or to be the subject of temporary exultation. It is an object of substance, of real value; it is an element of strength and power, and adds to our national security as well as fame. It has given us a name and reputation with the nations of the earth. It has proved to the world what has heretofore been doubted, that we are as great in arms as we are in the arts of peace. It will command the respect of the great powers of Europe, who will hereafter be careful how they trifle with our honor, or trespass on our rights.

But this national reputation has not been acquired without great sacrifices; glory, however valuable, is a costly article. It has been purchased by the sacrifice of many valuable lives, many gallant and brave men. How many of the most noble and gallant spirits of our land have offered up their lives on the plains and mountain passes of Mexico, as the cost of those splendid achievements? Sir, it was only yesterday, that the papers contained a melancholy and mournful list of the gallant dead who have fallen in this war, whose mortal remains were in a single train, conveyed from the city of Mexico, on their way to the United States, to be delivered up to those friends from whom they had parted a short time ago, and whom they were destined never to see again in this life. This sad list made a solemn impression upon my mind; I counted them, and found there were twenty-five. But this is a small part of the officers who have fallen on the battle-fields of Mexico. And of the rank and file, how great is the number, who, in battle and by disease have sacrificed their lives as the price of this national glory?

And yet, we are told that Mexico is to pay the costs of this war. How is its cost to be estimated? Will you look for it in the books of the Register of the Treasury? The sum there may be large, but the costs and sacrifices of war are to be found every where; often in the disasters of trade, which it occasions, the sacrifices in business, and the wreck and ruin of private fortunes. But how will you estimate the value of the gallant dead? Can it be done by day book or ledger, in coin of silver or gold? What is the value of such men as Butler, Cramar, Ringgold, Ridgley, Ransom, Lincoln, and hundreds of others, equally brave, equally dear to their friends, if not equally distinguished? Ask their widows, their mothers, their daughters, who with bleeding, crushed, and broken hearts are left desolate, and perhaps some of them overwhelmed with a weight of grief which may rob them of their reason. Sir, these are melancholy reflections; but they are the bitter fruits of war, and the price of that glory won in battle-fields.

But the victorious career of our arms, everywhere successful, has accomplished nothing towards securing a peace. We have overrun and subjugated perhaps one half of the territory of Mexico; taken possession of all her ports on the Gulf and the Pacific; reduced all her fortresses, and captured her capital, which is now in our possession; and yet she refuses to sue for peace. How is this to be explained? Distracted and mis-governed as Mexico is, and ever has been, other nations that have had differences with her, have not experienced the same result. France and England have had disputes with her, and have compelled her to do them justice. The former by a single effective blow—the capture of Vera Cruz, brought her to her senses, and obtained justice and indemnity at her hands. Her unyielding and obstinate conduct towards us must arise from inveterate prejudice against us, or from an apprehension that it is our purpose to plunder and despoil her of her territory. The events in Texas seem first to have given rise to these feelings, and some of the circumstances connected with the war have not served to allay them. It is well known how she views all the transactions in Texas. She considers all the movements there as having been encourged and sustained by the people of the United States, if not by the government; and appears to entertain no doubt that, from the first, our object was to possess ourselves of that portion of her territory. The annexation, which she regards as consummating this design, seems to have exasperated her to the highest pitch. And after the breaking out of the war, the immediate conquest of her remote provinces, seemed to confirm these opinions.

The divisions among ourselves regarding this war, and the opinions so boldly expressed by both political parties, must also be considered as among the causes which have induced Mexico to hold out and refuse to treat for peace. The opposition have declared this war to have been commenced by the act of the President, in violation of law—that it is an unjust and aggressive war on our part. This could not fail to encourage them to hold out, and to refuse to accede to any terms of accommodation. Perhaps they are now holding back, thinking that the opposition will soon come into power, from whom they have reason to suppose they would obtain much more favorable terms.

On the other hand, the opinions expressed by many of the supporters of the administration, who may be supposed to possess their confidence, and to speak their sentiments, are not calculated to prepossess an exasperated enemy to peace. It is asserted that all that is said and done here, is known in Mexico. What then must be the effect of speeches in Congress and the publications of the press, disclosing a design of subjugating and incorporating with the United States, the whole or a large portion of their country? These discussions, they must find, do not often even raise the question of the right or justice of such a course; but are confined to the expediency of it, and the consequences which may attend it. These things cannot fail to have an unfavorable influence on Mexico, and seem hitherto to have deprived us of all benefit from our sacrifices in the war, so far as regards the attainment of peace.

Certainly the administration and its supporters must not suppose that they can throw the whole responsibility of the failure to accomplish the object which I hope we all have in view—a just peace—upon the opposition which the war has experienced. They should have considered at first that opposition at home was one of the difficulties with which they had to contend. No war should ever be undertaken without duly estimating the opposition which it would have to encounter at home, as one of the obstacles to its successful prosecution. In all free countries, where parties exist, opposition to a war is as certain as to any measure of domestic policy. This has always been the case here and in other countries. It was so in the war of the revolution, and in the war with England in 1812. It has usually been so in England; there was a violent opposition to the war for the subjugation of these colonies, and also to the long war with France, growing out of her revolution. And it makes little or no difference as to the character or object of a war; there would be an opposition to a war purely defensive, to protect the soil, or repel a proud invader from our shores.

But with this liberal indulgence, I would, with all sincerity and kindness, submit to honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber, whether they have not carried their opposition to this war a little too far? Whether they have not overstepped the utmost limit to which, as good citizens and patriots, they could be permitted to go? Whether their arguments have not been a little too ingenious, labored and earnest, to place their country in the wrong? Whether, in their zeal for party, they have not forgot what was due to the rights and honor of their country? To charge the commencement of this war to the President, and in violation of the laws and constitution; to attempt to prove that it was an aggressive war on his part; that he sought a quarrel with Mexico as a pretence for invading and despoiling her of her territory, is a very grave charge, and one that cannot be confined to the Executive, but if true, would rest upon the country. Should this imputation be credited, it would fix a stain on our national character, which time, that corrects most errors, could never efface. It would furnish a dark page in our annals.

And to assume that the President does not wish to make peace, but desires to prolong the war as an excuse for subjugating Mexico and holding it by the right of conquest, is a charge scarcely less serious, and equally unsupported. But there is another light in which their conduct is to be viewed. That party expects to come into power at the next presidential election, and it may be so. In what situation will they be placed, in respect to this war with Mexico, if it should still continue? Have they thought of this, or do they not really expect to succeed? How would they negotiate a peace? Where will they fix the boundary of Texas? At the Nueces, which they say is the true boundary and have labored so hard to prove it? Will Texas consent to this? I think not. Well, suppose they were to insist on the Rio Grande, would not the Mexican negotiator insist, and reply, and have always admitted that the true boundary of Texas was the Nueces. And what answer could they give to such a plea? Would they say that they had maintained this, when in a minority, only to make the then President responsible for the war, but that they did not believe it? Would they say that then they were not responsible for what they did, but now, being responsible, they must maintain the rights of the country? Would not this be a very awkward situation?

And in regard to indemnity for the just claims of our citizens, if they were to insist on it, might not the Mexican negotiator reply that he admitted the claims, but that he was wicked peremptorily against them was unjust and aggressive, as you, as well as we have always maintained, and this gives us a just claim for the expenses and sacrifices it has brought upon us? We will offset the claims of your citizens for spoliations against our demands for the expenses of this wicked war, you have prosecuted against us, if you will pay us the balance. Just hand over the cash, and we will be content. But, supposing they should be able to resist this demand of Mexico, and induce her to acknowledge our claim for spoliations, might not the Mexican negotiator say that by the unjust war you have prosecuted against us, you have exhausted our treasury, taken possession of our resources, and deprived us of all means of payment. But we have uninhabited territories, and we will pay you by a cession of California. What answer would you give? Would you say we cannot take land, as we came into power on the express ground of the no-more-territory policy. I hope my honorable friends will think seriously of these difficulties.

Mr. President: Before I proceed to consider our present relations with Mexico, and the policy which I think ought to be adopted in relation to them, I have to notice some of the positions which have been assumed on the other side of the chamber; particularly by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL.) That Senator said that the administration had no desire for peace; that they wished to prolong the war for the subjugation and absorption of Mexico, or for some other purpose, which was concealed from the public. This is a very grave charge; for to prolong the war for other objects than peace, is to assume the responsibility of all its evils. Now, Mr. President, I know nothing of the purposes of the Executive in relation to this war, further than can be learned from his official acts and communications; and this is all that any one can safely know. We witnessed two years ago, on the Oregon question, the awkward situation in which gentlemen placed themselves here, by assuming to know the purposes of the President. But, judging from the official acts and declarations of the Executive, the Senator cannot be sustained in the charge he has made. The President still says his object is an honorable peace; that he desires a vigorous prosecution of the war for that purpose. What he will consider an honorable peace, we have no knowledge, except what may be derived from the terms which were submitted to Mexico by our commissioner, Mr. Trist. These were said to be his ultimatum. They were, I admit, hard enough upon Mexico. The boundary of the Rio Grande, and the cession of the Californias and New Mexico, were an indemnity for something more than a just indemnity. In considering the terms of peace, we should bear in mind the original objects of the war. These were the recognition of the rights of Texas, the establishment of its boundary, and satisfaction of the claims of our citizens for spoliations. This ultimatum establishing the boundary of the Rio Grande, with the cession of the Californias and New Mexico, is admitted to be more than an indemnity for our claim.—To insist on territory, beyond a just indemnity, could not be justified in a private transaction, between man and man. But the case is somewhat different between nations, in negotiating a peace. It belongs to the successful party to dictate terms. But these should be reasonable, having reference to the original matters in dispute. If they are unreasonable, or oppressive, and are refused, it would justly throw up to the successful party the responsibility of prolonging the war. But the proposition to pay the difference between a just indemnity and the value of the territory to be ceded, exempts the terms in this ultimatum from being regarded as oppressive, although they embrace more territory than I should care to acquire.

The terms then which have been offered as the basis of peace, are not such as to authorize the belief that they were not presented in good faith, and in the hope that they would be acceded to. And we have no evidence that this ultimatum has or will be departed from. The Senator from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVIER,) in his speech the other day, and he seemed to speak from some knowledge of the views of the Executive, assured us, if I mistake not, that the President was prepared to negotiate now upon the same basis. I think, therefore, there is no foundation for the charge, that the President does not desire peace; or that he wishes to prolong the war for the subjugation of Mexico, or other sinister purposes.

That the plan of the administration for the further prosecution of the war might fail in securing peace, and result in the subjugation of Mexico, is an entirely different question, which I shall consider before I close what I have to say.

But the Senator went further, and assumed in the course of his remarks, if he did not directly so assert, that that great portion of our citizens, who sustain the administration, were in favor of a prosecution of this war, with a view to the subjugation and absorption of Mexico. He admitted, that there were exceptions; but considered, that the great mass entertained such sentiments; and had become the advocates of war and conquest. I think this position incorrect, and that it does injustice to the great body of the supporters of the administration. They are not friendly to any policy of war or conquest; they regret the present war, and wish to see it brought to a close, as soon as it can be, consistently with what is due to the justice and honor of the country. I speak of the great mass of the supporters of the administration; for it must be admitted that there are some, who seem to entertain the sentiments the Senator attributed to the whole, or nearly the whole. Those who indulge these magnificent schemes of enlarging our territory by conquest, or who may seem to look with approbation on a policy towards a neighboring province, which might be deemed aggressive, are not in my judgement, in harmony with the general feeling and sentiment of their own party. They belong to what is sometimes called, a progressive democracy, and appear to have lost sight of the original principles of the party to which they profess to belong; or to have advanced on, regardless of those principles. I do not deny that the Senator had some ground for his assumption: but he should not have applied to the whole, what belonged only to a few. The Senator seems to consider these as new ideas, but appears willing to believe, that the whole of the democratic party, have departed from their original principles and policy in respect to our foreign affairs.

It may be natural enough, for him to think, that since he has left us, we have fallen into error, and departed from our former landmarks. If there was any thing in this. I should regret that he had not remained, as from his acknowledged talents, and great influence in his own state, perhaps his counsel and example, might have restrained us from deviating from the path, in which we had been accustomed to walk. We may regret that he should have seceded from the political church of his youth, and the faith of his fathers, and turned to idols; but have no right or disposition to complain of it. This certainly is not my purpose, which is only to defend myself, and those who act with me.

If there has been any difference in respect to their views, regarding the true foreign policy of our country, between the two great parties which have so long existed in the country, it is, that the Republican party were more pacific in their principles and purposes. Mr. Jefferson the head, and in a good degree, the founder of that party, it is well known, was preeminently distinguished for his pacific principles. He was a philosopher and a philanthropist, as well as a statesman, and had a more abiding confidence, in the intellectual and moral qualities of man, as elements on which free government could be safely constructed, than perhaps any other man of his generation. Deeming physical power, unnecessary and dangerous, as a means of maintaining internal order, he depreciated a resort to it, to preserve external peace, or to enforce respect from other nations, when it could possibly be avoided. Those sentiments he carried into his administration, as did his successors of the same political school.

To show what were the principles of the founders of the republic, I have made some short extracts from the messages of some of them, which I propose to read. Every body I am aware is familiar with them; yet they will bear being often read, and there are times when it is peculiarly proper and profitable, to look back to the original fountains of sound political doctrines. I begin with Washington, who was a republican and a whig of the old school:

These, Mr. President, are sentiments worthy of the father of his country. I now will read an extract from a message of the elder Adams, which must be deemed high authority on the other side of the chamber, if not on this:

[illegible]

The sentiments of Mr. Jefferson are as sound in doctrine, as they are beautiful in language:

[illegible]

And what was that one thing? Was it the enlargement of our territory by conquest, or the strengthening the military arm of the country? Very different. He says:

[illegible]

Again:

[illegible]

Here you see that Mr. Jefferson connects in the same sentence, the idea of justice between man and man, with that of justice and friendship with the nations of the world, regarding one principle as equally sound with the other.

I now come to Mr. Madison, who asserts the same doctrines, conveyed in language of equal force and beauty.

[illegible]

"Indulging in no passion which trespass on the rights or repose of other nations, it has been the true glory of the United States to cultivate peace by observing justice, and to entitle themselves to the respect of the nations at war, by fulfilling their neutral obligations by the most scrupulous impartiality. If there be candor in the world, the truth of these assertions will not be questioned; posterity at least will do justice to them."

Again:

"To cherish peace and friendship with all nations; with all to act on liberal conciliatory principles; to maintain what we have a right to claim from others, to refer all injuries we may receive to the tribunal of reason and to accommodation of differences, to a decision of them by an appeal to arms."

Mr. Monroe says:

"It is a state [peace] most consistent with their prosperity and happiness. It will be my sincere desire to preserve it, so far as depends on the Executive, on just principles with all nations, claiming nothing unreasonable of any, and tendering to each what is its due."

These sentiments are as wise as they are just and patriotic. I could quote similar doctrines from the messages of the heads of subsequent democratic administrations, but it cannot be necessary. All are familiar with the avowal of General Jackson, that in our transactions with other powers, we should "ask nothing but what is clearly right, and yield to nothing that is wrong."

And now, Mr. President, let me glance at the administrations of these distinguished men, and see if their official conduct corresponded with their precepts—whether their measures were in harmony with their principles.

It is well known that when the political parties originated in this country, there were difficulties between the United States and France, and that the policy to be pursued towards France was one of the grounds of political difference, as marked as those in respect to questions of domestic interest. The federal party, then in power, were for adopting strong and energetic measures towards the French Republic, which their opponents thought would involve the country in a war with that republic, which they believed could be avoided by a more moderate and conciliatory policy. These differences produced a very warm contest in Congress and the country. Our vessels were captured and condemned, and our Minister expelled from France; and Hamilton and other leaders of the federal party were for resorting to reprisals and warlike measures; and opposed to all further attempts at an accommodation of differences by negotiation. Mr. Adams, however, pursued a more conciliatory policy, and sent Ministers to the French republic, against the advice of his cabinet, which gave great offence to some of them, and to most of the leading men of his party. These ministers were not received by the French government, but insulted, so that they asked to be recalled. This aggravated the difficulties, and occasioned a very violent war spirit in this country against France, and the administration made preparations for war. It is due to Mr. Adams to say, that his course throughout was moderate and pacific, and he again sent another embassy to France against the advice of his cabinet, or a part of it, and of many of his party. These ministers succeeded in their negotiation and saved the country from a war.* Which was the war party, and which favored a pacific policy at their commencement?

Soon after Mr. Jefferson came into office; a difficulty arose with Spain in regard to our right of deposit at New Orleans. This matter has been alluded to in this debate. Whatever may be said to the contrary, the whole history of the transaction shows that Mr. Jefferson's course was eminently moderate and pacific. In this difficulty with Spain, the federalists were the war party as in the controversy with France, although now in the minority. In a private letter written at the time, Mr. Jefferson says:

"That they [Spain] sought to involve us in a war, with Spain, so as to break down our finances."

Subsequently, the country was involved in difficulty with both England and France, who, being at war, violated our commercial rights as a neutral power. Our flag was insulted and our vessels captured and condemned, and our seamen impressed into the British service. Having failed to obtain redress by negotiation, the administration resorted to restrictions on our trade with both of the offending powers. Non-importation and non-intercourse laws, and finally an embargo, were resorted to as measures of annoyance. Mr. Jefferson always believed that our commerce, consisting of the export and exchange of raw materials for manufactures, was so valuable, and that to withdraw it from any European power, would be the greatest injury we could, perhaps, inflict upon them. These various expedients show the unwillingness of Mr. Jefferson to resort to measures of force.

Mr. Madison found the country beset with the same difficulties, and pursued the same policy. This whole course of policy, it is well known, was regarded by the opposition as weak and visionary; they recommended strong and energetic measures, and declared that our commercial rights ought to be defended by force, by reprisals and war. And, finally, when all other measures had failed; when the question had come to this, that we must give up our rights on the ocean or defend them, by a resort to the last remedy of injured nations; when it became a question of surrendering our independence as a nation, or maintaining it by force, Mr. Madison recommended war. But no sooner was it declared, than it was immediately denounced as wicked and unjust, by the same party that had so long urged a resort to force as the only means of defending our rights. Down to this period, it is not difficult to determine which of the two parties were most pacific in their policy. The federalists only became the advocates for peace, after the country was engaged in a war. It is not necessary to trace the history of the two parties in respect to their foreign policy any farther. Their differences, from the close of this war, were confined to questions of domestic policy. But I cannot admit that there has been any essential change in the principles or views of the intelligent portion of the democratic party in regard to our foreign policy. They still favor a pacific policy as the only one suited to our institutions, and most conducive to the prosperity of the country. They still desire "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

Mr. President: I now come to the main question in this debate, which is, what is to be done—what policy is to be adopted in our present relations with Mexico? Others have spoken of the different ways of prosecuting the war. I wish to speak of the best means of obtaining peace, or of putting an end to hostilities. It is the first and highest duty of every branch of this government to bring this war to a close as speedily as can be done consistently with the interest and honor of the country. I will first notice the several plans which have been suggested in the course of this debate, before I proceed to present my own views.

1. To withdraw our troops from Mexico without indemnity and trust to future negotiation. This, if I understand their views, is the course proposed by the Senators on the other side of the chamber; yet I have too high an opinion of these politicians to believe they would pursue such a policy if they were charged with the responsibility of the government. To withdraw from Mexico without obtaining a treaty of peace or indemnity, would be to relinquish all the advantages we have gained by the war. It would be neither compatible with the interests or the honor of the country. It would be virtually an admission that the war had been wrong and aggressive on our part from the commencement. It would cast a shade over the brilliant achievements of our arms. If our forces are withdrawn, they must be distributed; and what reason would there then be to suppose that we could obtain by negotiation either indemnity or the establishment of the boundary of Texas? We should be in a worse condition than before the war commenced, as Mexico would attribute such a movement to our weakness or inability to prosecute the war, and would be encouraged to deny us any satisfaction for our just claims.

2. To assume a military line—the Sierra Madre, or some other. If this is considered as a line for conducting the operations of the war, it falls within one of the other plans which I shall notice, and becomes a mere military question, upon which I have nothing to say. But if I understood the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. HUNTER,) whose eloquent speech I listened to with great satisfaction and with a general concurrence in its views, he proposed the Sierra Madre, as a politico-military line, having reference to indemnity as well as to the prosecution of the war. As an indemnity line, in any sense, I am entirely opposed to it, as it includes more than two thirds of the entire territory of Mexico. It extends on the Gulf, nearly four degrees south of the mouth of the Rio Grande, and includes the greater part of the States of Tamaulipas, Coahuila, New Leon, San Luis Potosi, Zacatecas, Durango, Chihuahua, New Mexico and California. Of the population in these states, I am not informed, but it must be very considerable. Several of these states have not been conquered, and to hold military possession of so large a portion of Mexico, would require a large force, and be subject to nearly the same objections, as the proposition which I shall notice of a military occupation of the whole of Mexico. And what would be the object, unless we intend to retain the country between the Rio Grande and the Sierra Madre; and the objections to that would be nearly the same, as to annexing the whole of Mexico. And if we were to absorb so large a portion of Mexico, she would be so reduced and enfeebled, that we should be obliged to take the whole, in a short time.

3. To maintain our present possessions in Mexico, with a force sufficient only for that purpose, with a view to peace. This is the proposition of the honorable Senator from New York, (Mr. DIX,) in whose judgment I have great confidence. He did not, I presume, intend an indefinite occupation in case a treaty of peace should not be obtained. If regarded as a temporary occupation, to induce a peace, it is substantially the same as the first proposition I shall suggest.

4. An indemnity line, adopting the Rio Grande as a boundary, with the whole or a part of New Mexico and California. This I shall have occasion to speak of, in remarking on my second proposition.

5. To hold our present possessions, and increase our forces, so as to extend our conquests over other parts of Mexico, and compel her to sue for peace. This I consider substantially the same as the next proposition which I shall notice. This appears to be the plan of the Secretary of War.

6. The subjugation of the whole of Mexico, as a means of obtaining peace. I will postpone what I have to say, on the two last propositions, until I have suggested my own ideas as to the best way of bringing this war to a close.

* NOTE.—There is a point of view not before regarding the second mission to France. The envoys were Ellsworth, Davis and Murray. They arrived in 1797 against the advice of Pickering and McHenry, two members of Mr. Adams's cabinet. Mr. Pickering, as Secretary of State, had to prepare their instructions, and never did men receive more offensive terms as the ground to defeat the objects of the mission. Mr. Wolcott, Secretary of the Treasury, wrote a long private letter to Mr. Ellsworth, informing him of the efforts he had made to modify these instructions and make them more pacific in their tone. He tells Mr. Ellsworth that he had succeeded in part, and particularly in smoothing down the harsh and offensive language. But he represents Mr. Pickering's objections, and [illegible] it was difficult to exclude from the instructions many expressions and other topics and expressions which he feared might defeat the principal object of the mission. The object of the letter was, to invite Mr. Ellsworth to visit the seat of government, and try to obtain a further modification of the instructions. This is an unpublished letter which I have seen. It was dated at Trenton, in 1799.

Mr. President: In deciding on the course most advisable to be pursued in order to bring the war to a termination, we must consider the present condition of Mexico, and the results of the war thus far. We are now in the military occupation of more than one half of the territory of Mexico. In addition to the northern provinces, which are sparsely inhabited, there not being more than one person to the square mile, we possess the important central states, of Vera Cruz, Puebla, and Mexico. We hold most of her seaports on the Gulf and the Pacific; we have reduced all her strong fortresses, with their armaments; annihilated her army and deprived her, apparently, of most of the elements of war. We are in possession of her capital, and her government is removed to Queratero, where it is now organized or attempting to do so. The power of Santa Anna and the military party is overthrown, and the men now in power are opposed to that party and are supposed to be friendly to peace, if there is any party in Mexico who can be so considered. Having the possession of all her sea-ports, we control her commerce, and are collecting the duties on imports to be applied to the support of our army in the country. We are also attempting to levy the internal taxes.

In view of these facts, it appears to me, that war has accomplished its mission—that it has done all that it was expected to effect, in respect to peace. Our present relations with Mexico can hardly be considered as a state of war. They are rather a military occupation of the country. They have now no army in the field, and have no means to maintain one. The attempt which seems to be making to organize an army of twenty thousand men, appears to aim only at raising a force like our militia, and is designed no doubt for the defence of the government against the military party rather than to oppose the forces of this country now in Mexico.

With this view of the condition of Mexico, I submit my plan of terminating the war. To hold on to our present possessions in Mexico, until one more attempt can be made to negotiate a treaty of peace. If our army should be reinforced, and preparations made apparently for a more vigorous prosecution of the war, it might favor the object in view, and it is from that consideration that I can give my vote for this bill. I would have Mexico see, that we are able and prepared to prosecute this war as long as we think it for our interest to do so. I would strengthen our forces only for the purpose of favoring negotiation; and not for the purpose of holding the military occupation of the country for an indefinite period, or for any considerable length of time. When the proper time arrives, if it has not already; commissioners of character and standing should be sent there, clothed with full powers to settle all matters in dispute between the two countries.

This plan aims at a speedy termination of the war by treaty, and are there not good reasons to suppose that it would be successful? Whatever credit may be due to the various rumors of negotiations having actually taken place, all accounts from Mexico go to show, that the party now in power are in favor of peace. Since the overthrow of Santa Anna and the military party, the government has fallen into the hands of civilians, whose personal interests must be favorable to peace; for the continuance of the war will be likely to throw the power again into the hands of some military chieftain. War promotes the influence and favors the ambitious schemes of military leaders. The men now entrusted with the government see this, which turns their personal interest, to the side of peace, and they can hardly doubt that the interest of their country lies in the same direction. We now see that all the Presidents since the overthrow of the military leaders, who in rapid succession have been at the head of affairs, have been represented to be favorable to peace—Anaya, Pena y Pena, and Herera—and they appear to be sustained by a majority of the Congress, as well as by the governors of many of the states, who have been assembled to deliberate on the condition of the republic. This party is called the moderos—the middle men or moderate men, occupying a position between the two extremes, of which the military leaders constitute one and the puros the other. If we cannot obtain peace with this party, with what party can we expect it? The military leaders, all accounts allow, are averse to negociation; and the puros, or extreme popular party, appear to be equally hostile to peace. Some accounts represent that their object is to compel us to subjugate the country and establish a government over it, believing that the only way of effectually putting down the military party, which has so long oppressed them. But this can hardly be believed, as it would shew a total want of national sentiment—and it is wholly inconsistent with the manifesto recently put forth by the deputies of this party, in which they protest against the cession of any portion of their territory, even that which is in dispute. The military party and the puros, although the two extremes in their principles so far as they have any, seem prepared to act together, and are threatening a revolution to overthrow the present government. But with the presence of our army they can probably sustain themselves. This appears to be a state of things favorable to negociation; and there can be no doubt but that there must be some truth in the various reports we have had of attempts being made to negociate a treaty.

It may be said that should a treaty of peace be concluded with the present government, it would be overthrown so soon as our army was withdrawn and the treaty set aside. This might be so. But would not the same result be as likely to follow, if a treaty should be concluded one or two years hence, and with a different party in power? There can be no great security for the fulfilment of the stipulations of a treaty negociated with any government that now exists or which may at any time hereafter exist in Mexico. A treaty at any time may be of no great value intrinsically; perhaps worth little more than the parchment on which it might be written. I only say that one obtained now would be as likely to be respected as one obtained at any time hereafter.

But whether a treaty may be observed or not, it affords the most desirable and honorable mode of closing the war, and withdrawing our troops from the country. The bad faith of Mexico would be no dishonor to us.

But should this measure fail I have another plan for terminating the war, or, at least, putting an end to hostilities. It is to withdraw our forces from Mexico, and to hold possession of New Mexico and California, and the boundary of the Rio Grande. This measure executes itself, and does not at all depend on Mexico. We are now in the occupation of those territories and have an organized government there of some sort. The President regards them as already ours; he says, we cannot think of relinquishing them. He recommends the establishment of territorial governments over them. If these provinces are now ours, then we have already indemnity in our hands, for it is admitted in the ultimatum submitted by Mr. Trist, that we consider them as more than an equivalent for our claims. A sum of money was proposed to be paid in addition to the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens upon Mexico. I do not consider, however, that we have acquired a right or title to them, as I do not admit the right of conquest, but we might hold them as security for indemnity on the principle of reprisal. That is a principle of the law of nations; and one which has been favored by our government. I would hold them subject to such arrangement as Mexico might be disposed to negociate. And as we admit that something ought to be paid to Mexico for those territories, that leaves a continual inducement for her to enter into negociation.

Now, what is the objection to this course? Why, it may be said that it will not put an end to the war. But it will put an end to hostilities, which is about the same thing, and enable us to reduce our army to not more than fifteen thousand men, which is the lowest point we should reduce it to if we look to a treaty of peace. It has been said that this course would leave us exposed to a border war, which would require a large force. This is an idle objection. Those provinces are remote from the central and populous portions of Mexico. Her authority there, has never been but little more than nominal; she has not had sufficient force there to defend the people from the Indians. Impoverished, weakened and distracted as Mexico is, and will continue to be, it is idle to suppose that she would be able to send any considerable force to that remote frontier. The inhabitants which would settle there, the hardy adventurers from the western States, who make the bravest and best soldiers, would soon be able to defend themselves. It is confidently asserted, that those in California would never submit to the authority of Mexico, if we were to relinquish the country. They would assert and maintain their independence. A small garrison there of a few hundred men in aid of the inhabitants would be all that could be required for its security. Even the Spanish inhabitants are said to be well affected to the United States.

In New Mexico there might be more difficulty; there is a much larger Spanish population, and they are said to be less friendly to the United States. But an inconsiderable regular force would be sufficient, as our citizens would soon settle there in sufficient numbers to take the direction of affairs into their own hands. And in regard to Texas, she has stood up alone against the power of Mexico, and would want little aid from our army. But whatever force might be required for the defence of this frontier, it could be supplied from the army when reduced to a peace establishment. We should have no other exposed frontier, and the whole rank and file of the army could be stationed there, except what might be required to garrison the forts on the sea-board.

But it may be said that, in adopting this policy, we should lose our commerce with Mexico. This might be so as long as we remained without a treaty. But we may expect a treaty of peace as soon by pursuing this course as any other. And what trade can we expect with Mexico, by a treaty extorted from her, by first subjugating her? Her animosity and unfriendly feelings would still remain, and we could expect little trade with her. Our commerce with Mexico before the war was reduced to a small sum, less than one million; and, therefore, in any view of it is of little importance, compared with the expenses and sacrifices which must be attendant upon the continuance of the war. The President himself sanctions this policy as a last resort. He says, that if Mexico shall finally persist in her course, and refuse to negotiate a peace such as we can approve, we must then "take a full measure of indemnity into our own hands." It becomes then a mere question of time. And is it wise to prolong this war, or military occupation for an indefinite period, when after the expenses and sacrifices of years we may have in the end to resort to the same mode of indemnity, that is open to us now? Shall we suffer the continuance of this war to depend upon Mexico, when we have it in our power to bring it to a speedy close, and secure the full measure of indemnity we demand? Mexico has no responsible government, and can hardly be considered as a civilized nation. We must not, therefore, expect to close a war with such a people as we would with an enlightened nation having a stable and responsible government. And shall we suffer the semi-barbarism of Mexico to keep us in a continual war? When a civilized nation makes war with a barbarous or half civilized people they terminate it at such time, and in such way, as their own interests and security may require. The forms of a treaty of peace in such cases are deemed of little importance.

Mr. President, I come now to consider some of the objections to the two last plans which I have noticed—that of an indefinite military occupation; or the subjugation of Mexico, as a means of obtaining peace. I consider these two propositions as substantially the same, as they would lead to the same result—the annexation of the whole of Mexico. They afford little or no prospect of peace, as they involve the overthrow of both the central and state governments; so that there would be no organ of the nation with which a treaty could be negotiated. They involve the destruction of the nationality of Mexico, so that she would be thrown on to our hands as a conquered country. The idea of organizing a government, under our auspices, and then negotiating with it, would be a mere mockery. And besides this difficulty, before this result was reached, there would be such American interests established in Mexico, as would interpose an insuperable obstacle to dissolving our connection with it.

How long may it take to subjugate the people of Mexico? for the government and the power of the nation are already subdued. The result here aimed at, will make the contest a war upon the people. All history proves how difficult a thing it is to subjugate the people of a country, when animated by a spirit of liberty, or of national antipathy and enmity. The greatest captain of modern times, Napoleon, when he heard of the defeat of his marshals in Spain, is said to have exclaimed, "I will soon put an end to this war of peasants!" But how did he put an end to it? By the defeat and final expulsion of his armies from Spain; and this proved the first fatal blow to his career of conquest, which led to the final overthrow of his colossal power in Europe and France itself. To subjugate seven millions of people, is no small undertaking. May you not, by driving them to desperation, give them "the irresistible strength of weakness?" And what service will it be for our brave officers and soldiers, to prosecute a war against the people of Mexico? Will they war against non-combatants, against citizens, against women and children? Certainly they are too gallant to make war on the women of Mexico. I recently read a letter from one of our officers, dated at Jalapa, saying that the country was beautiful, the climate delightful, and that the senoritas, with their ruby cheeks, looked so charmingly, that, was he not a married man, he should have been afraid of becoming annexed to a Mexican.

But if, after a contest, perhaps of years, you are successful, what will be the result? Why, we shall have Mexico on our hands, as a subjugated country, and must hold it as an appendage, or admit it as states into the confederacy. Success may be more honorable, more gratifying to our pride, but it would be more disastrous and attended with vastly more serious consequences, than a failure.

In considering the question of our annexing or absorbing Mexico, the matter of right does not appear to have entered into the discussion; we have only looked at the consequences, the advantages or disadvantages to ourselves. But what would be our right to incorporate Mexico into our confederacy? The right of conquest is only a successful wrong. Because Mexico, without any responsible government, may refuse to treat for peace, cannot justify us in seizing the country. Should we have any pretence of right, even as much as Catharine of Russia had to dismember Poland? But I will not discuss this question, as I have not time to examine the consequences of such a measure.

The idea of connecting the destinies of this free and great republic with such a country as Mexico is startling, and must fill the mind of every reflecting person with alarm. May not such a union, which destroys the nationality of Mexico, be, in the end, equally destructive of our own? What is Mexico? The very Pandora's box of civilization—if civilization it can be called. In what other country on earth, can we find combined all the evils of race, all the evils in government, all the evils in religion, and all the evils in morals? And if there are any other evils, they may be found there.*

Mixed Races of South America and Mexico.—Tschudi, a distinguished German naturalist, has recently published a work entitled "Travels in Peru," which is well known. In this work, he gives a list of the crosses resulting from the intermixture of the Spanish with the Indian and Negro races in that country. The settlement of Mexico by the Spaniards took place at the same time, and the intermixture of races has been, perhaps, greater in that country than in Peru. An officer of our army informs us that the Mexican soldiers present the most unequal characters that can be met with anywhere in the world. Some are brave, and some are quite the reverse, and possess the basest and most barbarous qualities. This, doubtless, is a result in part of the crossing of the races.

The following is Tschudi's list of the crossings in Peru:

PARENTS.	CHILDREN.
White father and negro mother,	Mulatto.
White father and Indian mother,	Mestiza.
Indian father and negro mother,	Chino.
White father and mulatto mother,	Quarteron.
White father and mestiza mother,	Cholo, pale, brown skin complexion.
White father and chino mother,	Chino Blanco.
White father and cuarteron mother,	Quintero.
White father and quintero mother,	White.
Negro father and Indian mother,	Zambo.
Negro father and mulatto mother,	Zambo-negro.
Negro father and mestiza mother,	Mulatto-oscuro.
Negro father and chino mother,	Zambo-chino.
Negro father and zambo mother,	Zambo-negro, perfectly black.
Negro father and quintero mother,	Mulatto, rather dark.
Indian father and mulatto mother,	Chino-oscuro.
Indian father and mestiza mother,	Mestiza-claro, often very beautiful.
Indian father and chino mother,	Chino-oscuro.
Indian father and zambo mother,	Zambo-claro.
Indian father and chino-claro mother,	Indian, with frizly hair.
Indian father and quintero mother,	Mestizo, rather brown.
Mulatto father and zambo mother,	Zambo, a miserable race.
Mulatto father and mestiza mother,	Chino, rather clear complexion.
Mulatto father and chino mother,	Chino, rather dark.

The effect of such intermixture upon the character is thus stated by Dr. Tschudi: "To define their characteristics correctly would be impossible, for their minds partake of the mixture of their blood. As a general rule, it may be fairly said they unite in themselves all the faults, without any of the virtues of their progenitors: as men, they are generally inferior to the pure races; and, as members of society, they are the worst class of citizens."

What will you do with her. Will you unite Mexico, as states, with this confederacy, with her mixed, mongrel and degraded population? Are her people prepared for this? Have they not been struggling for nearly forty years, to establish a free government, and are, perhaps, farther from it now than when the struggle commenced? Can any man believe, for a moment, that our complicated and nicely balanced system of government, would stand such a shock as this? Like a complicated piece of machinery, would not the derangement of any material part throw the whole into disorder? Could states in Mexico, formed from such a population, act in harmony with the other states of the confederacy? Would you trust to the free action of the popular will there, or would you attempt to control it? And what new elements would you bring into the central government here? Is not this federal government formed out of the states? Do not they constitute its elements, and impart to it its life's blood, by which it exists? And what kind of blood will you infuse into it?

Do not the States form and regulate the constituency of the members in the other wing of this capitol, and also the constituency of the legislature, who elect the Senators on this floor? Congress, in both of its branches, is the offspring of the States, and must receive its character from their action. This government, which is a sort of balance-wheel, to unite and regulate the action of the States, derives its character from them, and if they are wanting in the elements of freedom or order, the defect and disorder will be communicated here, and our whole system become deranged.

But, if Mexico has not the elements of freedom, so that she can be admitted as States into the confederacy, it seems to be supposed that we can hold her as an appendage or colony. My honorable friend from Arkansas (Mr. SEVIER) seems to think there would be no great difficulty in this. He says we might appoint a governor, secretary, district attorney, and judges for each of the twenty-four States in Mexico, and Indian agents to take care of the four millions of Indians, and in this way get along very smoothly. This would be a very pretty colonial system for such a people as the Mexicans. Here are officers to execute the laws, but where are the laws to come from, or is there to be no law but their will?—Who is to make the laws for the colonies, or are they to be governed without law? Shall Congress make laws for those States, or shall the judges make, as well as administer, the law? Or will you have a popular legislature in each? Does not the Senator see that the whole scheme is impracticable?

The case most parallel to this is the British possessions in India. And is Mexico to become our India? If so, it must be governed as the British have governed their India possessions. They have had no such complicated machinery, but a simple despotism. The whole powers of government were for a time confided to a governor and council, without any law but their will; and they always had a large army at their command which constituted the whole strength of the government. After a while judges were appointed, mainly to protect the natives from the rapacity of the English, who had settled in India, and who, as is said by a British writer, were like wolves among sheep. But the British minister and parliament were a little like the Senator from Arkansas—they appointed judges but gave them no law. They, therefore, made law for themselves, and undertook to introduce the common law, civil and criminal, and to enforce it upon a people who knew no more about it than they did of any thing else, of which they had never heard.—The chief justice Impey was another Jeffries, and by his arbitrary enforcement of laws unknown to the people, exercised a tyranny not surpassed by the rapacity of Hastings the governor. He issued his processes and writs, and sent out sheriffs and bailiffs, with armed posses, and seized, imprisoned, tried, condemned, and even executed the natives, for offences which they knew nothing of and which were not criminal by their laws. Even a prince and a high priest among the Brahmins, Nuncomar, was seized, arraigned, tried, condemned and executed for forgery, which, by the laws of the country, was only a fraud. The whole native population petitioned and implored that he might be spared, but he was executed, surrounded by vast multitudes of his countrymen, imploring heaven for his deliverance, and filled with consternation and dismay which no language could describe. The people, seeing that they were liable to be seized, condemned, and punished without knowing for what—that they were exposed to the severe requirements of a law invisible and unknown to them—ignorant whence it came, whether from above or beneath, whether it was of human, divine, or infernal origin—were driven to despair and sought protection from that power which had so long been their oppressor, the governor and council. But this protection they could not obtain, for even the governor and his council could not restrain the oppression and rapacity of these judges without law.

And would the Senator send out judges to Mexico without law? If not, I would ask what laws would govern their proceedings? Would they like the English judges, take the common law, or statute laws of the United States with them? or would they adopt and enforce, the laws of Mexico? Do the people of Mexico know any thing about the principles or forms of our laws; and could they be introduced among them? What do they know of trial by jury, of a capias, habeas corpus, arrest, bail, and all the forms and proceedings of the common law? And would our own citizens who might settle in Mexico submit to the summary and arbitrary proceedings of the Mexican laws?

Sir, the inhabitants of two countries, whose institutions, laws, religion, and usages, are so unlike, cannot be brought under one jurisdiction. The only way we could govern Mexico, would be by a system similar to that of Spain, when it was under her dominion. By a despotic system, a sort of Vice-royalty, the supreme power being in the hands of one man, and he would require an army to sustain his authority. Whatever it might be called, it would be essentially a military government, as Mexico does not seem prepared for any other.

The Indians, constituting the larger part of the whole population, would be taken care of by Indian agents, says the Senator from Arkansas, as we now do the Indians within the United States. But does he not know that the Indians in Mexico do not live in tribes; that they have no separate governments; that they are a part of the citizens of the country, and subject to the laws in the same manner as others?

And now, I would ask, why shall we take, on our hands, a country like Mexico? Would it add to our strength, our wealth, or prosperity? Would it not be a source of expense at all times, and of weakness, in case we were involved in war with any foreign power? Shall we take her, as seems to be suggested by some, because she may fall into anarchy, if we withdraw our forces? What if she does? is that any concern of ours? Are we responsible for the domestic government and peace of Mexico? Is it not one of our most settled maxims, not to interfere in the internal government and concerns of other nations? The only interest we have in this matter, is that there should be a stable and responsible government, that would preserve order at home, and which would not be likely to trespass on our rights as a neighboring power. Some have expressed apprehensions, that a monarchy may be established there. But how can the people be right to establish what government they please? And perhaps monarchy, in some form, is the only government for which Mexico is prepared? That would be most likely to preserve internal order, and afford security to persons and property, which would be favorable to our trade. Whatever system is most favorable to our commerce, would be most beneficial to us.

Shall we take Mexico as some seem to desire, from an apprehension that she may fall into the hands of a foreign power? And would you annihilate her nationality, and extend your jurisdiction over her, for fear some other nation would be guilty of the same wrong? Or would you maintain a perpetual military occupation of the country, to keep it from falling under the dominion of a foreign state? If England or any great European power, should attempt to make a colony of Mexico, we should no doubt oppose it, with that firmness due to our character; and should it become necessary, to the extremity of war. But sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. When such danger arises, if it ever does, it will be time enough, to meet it, and we shall be better prepared to do so, by returning to peace, and husbanding our resources.

But, Mr. President, some have discovered a reason for our extending our dominion over Mexico, in the purpose of carrying there our civilization and extending the area of freedom. Are we under obligations to do this, if it were practicable? But can it be accomplished? Can you introduce the blessings of civilization and freedom by war and conquest? Is there any example in the annals of the world of an enlightened nation having, by war and conquest, introduced civilization and freedom among a savage or semi-barbarous people? If there is any such I have never found it. Mexico itself is an example to the contrary. She was conquered three centuries ago by Spain, then not only the most powerful, but the most civilized and of higher degree of civilization and refinement than any nation in Europe. And what has been the result? The Mexican or Aztec race were not a rude and barbarous people, but considerably advanced in civilization, probably more so than they are now, after being under the dominion of their conquerors, for three centuries. They have lost their original virtues with their independence, and are now a degraded and vicious race.

If we look to the nations of antiquity we shall find the same result. Rome, long mistress of the world, alike distinguished in arts and arms, was in advance of other nations in civilization, with the exception of the Greeks. Her conquests extended over Europe, and parts of Asia and Africa; but in what single country did she plant the seeds of civilization or freedom? Her arms first subjugated the cities of Italy, then Greece, Carthage, and the countries of the East, and crossing the barrier of the Alps, she conquered Gaul, Germany, and the numerous Scandinavian hordes of the North. These hardy and warlike people were repeatedly subdued by Cæsar and other Roman generals, who also visited Britain and established their dominion there. But were any of these people civilized by their conquerors? Instead of this, it seems to have been the conquered nations which imparted the lights of civilization, to their conquerors. Greece subdued by Roman power carried the arts and a more advanced civilization among the Roman people. And the Scandinavian hordes so often subdued by the Roman arms without making any advance in social improvements, when they became conquerors in their turn, and overrun all the South of Europe, appear to have received the first impulse of civilization from the people they had subjugated. The Romans maintained their dominion over Britain a considerable time, but appear to have left no traces of civilization behind them. It seems to be a law of human progress that a barbarous people will not embrace the arts and forms of social life of their conquerors, let them be ever so superior in social advancements. But wherever a semi-barbarous people have made conquests of nations, even in the decay of their civilization, the conquerors have imitated and embraced much that was valuable among the people they had subjugated. The northern hordes who had so often felt the force of the Roman arms, without one ray of the light of civilization being left among them, at length became aroused from their fastnesses, and uniting the different tribes and chiefs, poured down like a mountain torrent upon the countries of the Roman empire, and spread such ruin and desolation around them as nearly to extinguish all the evidences of past civilization. The chroniclers of these inroads of the northern hordes could find no language to describe such horrors, and characterized these ferocious invaders as the "scourge of God."

Such were our Scandinavian or remote Saxon ancestors, from whom we derived that Anglo-Saxon blood which it seems to be supposed is destined to overrun and possess the whole of the western continent. It is from this source that we derive that "destiny" which is to extend the Anglo-Saxon race over the whole of the western hemisphere. This may be so; but I hope this high destiny is not to be accomplished in the way our remote ancestors fulfilled theirs—by a progress marked by desolation and blood. Ours is a different age from theirs, and whatever may be our destiny, I hope it will be accomplished by means which will not derogate from our character as a just and enlightened people.

Mr. President: It seems to be supposed by some that we ought not to bring this war to a close without obtaining "security for the future" as well as "indemnity for the past." This language is found in the message of the President; but I do not know what he means by security for the future. The language sounds very well, but does not seem to have any very precise meaning. We can understand what is meant by indemnity for the past, but what security for the future, as applied to Mexico, can mean, may be more difficult. I apprehend, however, that it could mean nothing more than that in obtaining indemnity by negotiation, we ought to have reasonable security, or reliance for the fulfilment of the treaty stipulations. It certainly could not mean, as has been hinted by some, that we must insist on one half or more of the Mexican territory, to the Sierra Madre, as a security against the other half. Nor can the President intend that we must have a mountain barrier, or some other boundary, affording a strong natural defence, to protect us from invasion and war from Mexico. No such natural boundary exists, and if it did, we have no reason for it.—We want no other security against Mexico than the spirit and valor of our people, and the great and growing resources of our country. These are the only securities we have against Great Britain, bounding on our extensive northern frontier. If we have no apprehensions from her, we certainly need have none from so weak and distracted a neighbor as Mexico.

But I think the origin and history of this phrase, "indemnity for the past and security for the future," did not occur to the President, or he would not have introduced it into his message. It had a bad origin. It was the defence made by Mr. Pitt, for the long and ruinous war in which England was engaged with France. This war continued nearly twenty years, and called forth all the resources of England—not only in fleets and armies, but its treasure was poured out like water, to subsidize the armies of the continental powers of Europe. But the object of this war, involving such vast expenditures and sacrifices, was not very apparent or satisfactory to some, in and out of Parliament. Mr. Fox, and others of the opposition, often pressed the minister very hard, and demanded to be informed of the object of the war. But the only answer they could get from Mr. Pitt, was "indemnity for the past and security for the future." Well, sir, this war, although long disastrous to the British and their allies, was in the end successful. Bonaparte was defeated, his continental system broken up, and he was driven from the throne of France. But what was the indemnity for the past and security for the future, which Mr. Pitt obtained for his country? Ask the the artisans and laborers of Birmingham and Manchester, the men of ceaseless toil, and they will tell you what was that security, which has ever since, robbed them of one-third part of their hard earnings. It was national debt and national taxation. This war added five hundred millions of pounds to the national debt of England, swelling the amount to the the enormous total of eight hundred millions. Such was the security which England obtained from an unnecessary and protracted war, sustained by a minister of great abilities, but by no means a wise and prudent statesman. The great mistake was, in placing a young man at the age of twenty-four, at the helm of state, to direct the destinies of a great nation.

I hope, Mr. President, we shall not be disposed to follow such an example of obtaining indemnity for the past and security for the future. The best security for the future which any nation can have, is peace, as that increases its resources for war.

Mr. President, within the last few years the public mind has been directed to the acquisition of territory and the enlargement of the boundaries of the republic. First, to the annexation of Texas; then the establishment of our title to Oregon, and now in a war with Mexico, which all seem to regard as having a connection with territorial acquisition. These questions have had an exciting and powerful effect on the public mind; and it cannot be surprising, that they have given rise, in certain minds, to extravagant ideas and magnificent schemes of the progress, enlargement, and greatness of our country. Territorial aggrandizement having become the great object on which the national mind is fixed, it is natural that there should be a strife among the leaders of the political parties, divisions and subdivisions, existing among us, to push ahead of each other, each aiming to get an advanced position in the pursuit of the same object. First, peaceable annexation; then the assertion of a "clear and unquestionable title," and finally, acquisition by conquest. Destiny points out our path, and progress urges us on. And where shall we stop, or how far will progress carry us? My honorable friend from New York, (Mr. DICKINSON,) has a resolution before us, for annexing all contiguous territory. I trust he does not intend to do this by conquest, for the principle will carry us a great ways. We cannot stop at the burning sands of Panama, but must pass on to the table lands of Central America, thence to the Rio de la Plata, and finally, to Patagonia, and be brought up at Cape Horn. And but for the straits of Magellen, we might annex the Sandwich Islands, and perhaps Japan.

But I allude more to the indications of public sentiment elsewhere, than in the Senate; to the tone of a portion of the public press; to popular meetings, speeches, addresses of conventions, and other evidences of wild and extravagant opinions. The proposition, to unite the destinies of this free and happy republic with Mexico, that "Serborgan bog," is treated as lightly and disposed of as easily, as a question of forming a new county, or dividing a township. This levity and recklessness, in respect to so grave a question, although not prevailing to much extent, has nevertheless filled me with amazement. Should such sentiment spread, should the public mind become phrenzied with a lust for territory and false notions of national greatness, I should tremble for the consequences. When I witness these splendid delusions, I have been reminded of the memorable words of the Earl of Chatham, who in that indignant language peculiar to him, charged the minister of his day of having "drank of that poison, described in poetic fiction which makes men forget their country." It appears to me that all such, whether in exalted or humble conditions, have forgot their country—that they are only thinking of Mexico. Sir, what is our country? Does it consist only of territory; of those great features which distinguish this continent; its vast mountains, lakes like inland seas, rivers like estuaries of the ocean, and valleys and prairies unknown in any other land? No! These are not our country; they belong to Him who created them. We may be thankful that our lot has been cast in so favored a portion of the globe, but we have no reason to be proud of it, as we have no merit in it. Our country consists of our population and its wonderful organization, political, civil and social; our complicated but harmonious system of government, the simplicity and justice of our laws; our institutions of religion, free to all, and upheld without law; our system of general education and higher institutions of learning; the purity of our morals, and the simple and unsophisticated forms of social life. It is these things which distinguish our country from all others, and of which we may be excused for being a little boastful. It is liberty and all the blessings of freedom which we enjoy, that should enter most largely into our ideas of country. And will the extension of our territory add to their value? Can we have no higher idea of national greatness, than what pertains to extent of territory? Is territory the only feature of national power and glory? Is it to be valued more than those elements of moral power and true greatness, to which I have referred? To indulge a desire for territorial aggrandizement, and especially by conquest, is to imitate the vulgar ambition of kings, and is unworthy of a free and enlightened people. This is not the destiny to which the founders of the republic looked for their country. Its liberty, its free institutions, its respect for justice and the sacred rights of humanity, entered largely into their ideas of the future greatness and true glory of their country. They regarded more its moral than its physical greatness, and sought to give an increasing development to its moral energies. That was the "progress" they anticipated for their country. The best definition of a free government was given by a citizen of my own state. JOEL BARLOW, who seems not to have been justly appreciated. He defined a free government to be "the substitution of moral for physical power." But in this progressive age, we seem to be advancing backwards and substituting physical for moral power.

Mr. President, I have no apprehensions from any reasonable enlargement of our territory, when circumstances throw acquisitions in our way by just and peaceful means. But I would not indulge a passion for territorial aggrandizement; which has a tendency to an aggressive policy that may "trespass on the rights of other nations." A state with a small territory must necessarily be weak; and one of a very extensive territory, may be weakened from that circumstance, by its scattering its population. As fast as our population increases, our territorial possessions have increased much faster. This of course has a tendency to scatter our population and, for a time, to diminish our strength; and even our resources for the value of labour remote from markets is much less than it would be in other sections of the country. Can we not be satisfied with a country stretching across a continent and bounding on two oceans? Nothing short of the whole continent it seems will satisfy some. Whether our political system could be extended and maintained over this continent, if there was a homogeneous population, is a problem that may never be solved. But whether it could or not, I see no object in it. It seems to be the order of Providence, that there should be families of nations, as well as families which compose all communities. Whilst they are often a necessary check upon each other; the commercial and friendly intercourse between them, tends to the general advancement of all.

Mr. President, I have exhausted myself and wearied the Senate, and having said about all that I desired to say, I will detain you no longer. I thank Senators for their patience and attention. I have discharged what was in some respects an unpleasant duty.—If I have spoken with warmth, it is because I have felt what I have said. If I have raised a warning voice against dangers in the future, which a false step at this time might bring upon the country, it was because such were my solemn convictions.

This may be the last time that my voice will be heard in this hall on any great question, affecting the lasting welfare of the country. I shall not long be here; but in retirement I can never be indifferent to whatever concerns the prosperity of the country, the integrity of the Union, and the maintainance of our free institutions, in all their efficacy. And I hope it may be my last aspiration, that it may ever remain the true glory of our country, to cherish liberty as the highest good of the people, and to preserve peace, in the only way it can be done, by observing justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD took the floor, and on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1848.

ORDINANCE OF THE CITY COUNCIL OF ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BENTON presented an ordinance passed by the city council of St. Louis, Missouri, urging upon Congress the propriety of making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor at that place, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of Elizabeth Monroe, widow of Thomas J. C. Monroe, deceased, late a surgeon in the army of the United States, praying a pension, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the petition of Erskine and Eichelberger, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of E. P. Guier, and B. McLaughlin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

SENATE POST OFFICE.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay to the two youths employed in the Senate post office at the last session, one hundred dollars each, in full compensation for their services at the last session.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL STAFF.

The bill for an increase of the medical staff of the army for a limited time, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made under Indian treaties, to alienate the same in fee.

The question being upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by Mr. HANNEGAN on a former day, it was read for information.

Mr. WESTCOTT suggested that as the Senator from Indiana, who had offered the amendment, was not now in his seat, the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. ATCHISON presumed there could be no difficulty in regard to the amendment—however, the Senator from Indiana was now in his seat, and could explain it.

Mr. BREESE remarked, that the object of the bill was to obviate the necessity of special legislation. By the treaty made at Camp Tippecanoe with the Pottowatomie Indians, sections of land were reserved to certain Indians, after the lands had been ceded in bulk to the United States. These Indians supposed they had an estate in fee in these lands, and by deeds approved by the President of the United States, sold their interest in their reserved lands. It was now understood, after careful inspection of the treaty of 1832, that the construction of the terms employed did not give to these Indians an estate in fee in those lands, but an interest during their life-time. The design of the bill now before the Senate was to relinquish to the purchasers of these lands the supposed reserved right of the government of the United States. There were some ten or fifteen cases involved in this bill, and in order to avoid the necessity of special legislation, it was thought that it might be proper to have a general law including the whole subject. Congress had never refused, when any similar application had been made, to grant the relief now sought; and in proof he read an act for the relief of G. S. Hubbard and others. Similar cases had occurred in Alabama, growing out of a like treaty, but he would not trouble the Senate by any reference to them at present.

He then sent to the desk of the Secretary a letter from one of the commissioners who had concluded the treaty, giving it as his opinion that the Indians supposed they had the lands in fee.

Mr. HANNEGAN stated that the amendment which he proposed to the original bill, was intended to meet cases under this bill entirely, which the bill did not. There was a provision in it which required that the deeds should be executed according to the laws of the State in which the lands were located. Compliance with that provision was almost impossible on the part of persons residing at a distance in Missouri, Iowa, and Kentucky. In order to meet that and certain minor objections, he had offered the amendment, which covered the whole ground. In no single instance heretofore had Congress refused to pass special acts in similar cases arising under this treaty. He referred to former acts of Congress, in 1839 and 1841, embracing similar cases. He presumed that the deeds in the present case had had the sanction of the President, but his approval of them was made necessary before the conveyance could be perfect. He presumed that there was no more danger of fraud than in any other case of purchase and sale of Indian lands. The statement of one of the commissioners who made the treaty had just been read to the Senate, and showed that the understanding at the time was, that the reservation was made in favor of the Indians, as all other individual reservations have heretofore been made, and that they had, therefore, a right to sell and convey, with the sanction of the President. That was all that was asked in this case. The papers now before the Committee on Indian Affairs showed incontestibly that a full and ample price had been paid for the lands; indeed, from his own knowledge, he could say that for a portion of them double the value had been paid in money.

Mr. BADGER hoped that his friend from Indiana would not understand him as indicating the slightest hostility to the amendment when he suggested the propriety of the reference of the bill, with the proposed amendment, to the Judiciary Committee. The statements of the gentleman from Indiana, and those also of the gentleman from Illinois, had satisfied him that some act of legislation in reference to this matter was proper and necessary. He was not, therefore, opposed to the measure, but was of opinion that it should undergo the examination of the committee of the Senate supposed to be specially charged with the legal proceedings which might be necessary.

Mr. HANNEGAN explained that the bill had been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and his friend from Missouri (Mr. ATCHISON,) united with him, in requesting that that committee should be discharged from the consideration of the subject, and that it should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to which they thought it propely belonged. He could not conceive that it involved any question requiring the examination of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ATCHISON observed that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. BREESE,) had already shown that Committees had in several instances, acted on this subject in the manner proposed by this bill. The only question involved, was whether the United States would now cede to the purchaser from the Indians, the reversionary interest which it was supposed the United States held in them under the treaty. Upon the broad principle of getting rid of the public lands, if for no other reason, he would say, give that reversionary interest to the purchasers. He held that in getting rid of the public land, an important service was rendered to the government of the United States, as well as to the State in which the land lies, and to private individuals who became purchasers.

Mr. BADGER suggested that his friends on the other side labored under some misapprehension as to his object in desiring the reference to the Judiciary Committee. Although the case had been passed upon by the Committee on Indian Affairs, still there might be a question remaining with regard to the legal safeguard to be thrown around the measure.

Mr. HANNEGAN begged to inform his friend from North Carolina, that the same guards precisely, had been interposed in this case as had existed almost contemporaneously with the government with regard to lands held by individual reservation.

Mr. BADGER then withdrew his motion.

The amendment was then agreed to, and no further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—We have been engaged, Mr. President, in wars with England, and that is the only foreign civilized Christian nation, Mexico excepted, with which we have been so involved. We have had two wars with England, in both of which we were contending for great principles, upon which rest the institutions and liberties of our country. The American people well understand the principles for the establishment of which their ancestors entered upon the war of the revolution. They were published to the world in the ever memorable declaration of independence. The principles, for the defence of which the war of 1812 was declared, are equally well understood. They were promulgated in the pithy sentence, "free trade and sailors' rights." The people of the United States would not suffer Great Britain, by her orders in council, to trammel or commit spoliations upon their commerce. Nor would they permit their merchant vessels to be arrested and entered, and our sailors impressed and made to fight the battles of England on board British men-of-war, or armed vessels. To resist the practice of impressment and spoliation, we went to war in 1812. The causes of these two wars with our mother country, and the principles involved, are now matters of history. I propose, Mr. President, to inquire into the principles and causes of the existing war with Mexico. The people of this country wish to know what they are fighting for, and what objects are to be accomplished.

In the progress of this debate I have witnessed on the part of those who sustain the administration, and especially on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, great research and much anxiety to find precedents, in the past history of our country, to justify every act of the President in relation to the existing war. I know full well the force of precedents. As individuals, we do what our fathers have done. Nations in a single action may set an example to be followed through successive ages. Legislative and judicial precedents become authority. International law is built up or demolished by the military action of nations.

It is, therefore, of lasting consequence to us, to ascertain what precedents we are establishing for our future government. What principles are we asserting in the face of nations? I look back with exultation upon the principles and the actions of those who resisted the domineering conduct and arbitrary exactions of Great Britain. I beheld our ancestors struggling against oppression and in favor of liberty; and in their conduct I find a redeeming example for the imitation of the oppressed of all nations. In their conduct I find grent principles of right and liberty vindicated and maintained. I feel a thrill of gratitude for the blessings I enjoy consequent to their sacrifices. And now, in the midst of our Mexican hostilities, I naturally inquire, will our children regard our war with Mexico, comparatively weak, as having been based upon the same high principles which governed our ancestors when they, being weak, resisted the strong arm of British power? What lessons are we teaching our children and the world by our policy towards Mexico? Are we guided by the landmarks of liberty? Are we acting upon the recognized principles of international law, or are we building up a new code by which we are to be governed, although rejected and condemned by all other nations?

Before going into these momentous subjects, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the war made upon the freedom of speech by the supporters and vindicators of the war against Mexico. In their belligerent career they denounce all those who question the sagacity of the President, in plunging the country into the Mexican war, as traitors, giving "aid and comfort" to the enemy. The President himself set the example. It has been followed by executive partisans with unparalleled malignity. It has at length come to this, that those who do not agree with the administration are denounced in the executive organ, the Union, and other affiliated papers, in terms usually applied by vulgar wrath to the vilest criminals. A copy of the Union, now before me, charges the members of Congress of both Houses with making speech after speech "against the rights and honor of the country," and publishes the opinions of officers and soldiers in the army, to prove that "the course of the opposition in regard to the war has had the indisputable effect of cheering the enemy and prolonging the war." Gen. Pearce is represented as declaring in a public speech, that extracts from American papers republished in Mexico, constituted "the food which fed the ferocity that pursued the army at every turn and caused the butchery of every soldier who fell into their (Mexican) hands." Under the head of "more just indignation," we are informed by the Union that a correspondent of the Pennsylvanian, writing from the city of Mexico relative to the republication at that place, of the speech of a distinguished member of this Senate, declares that "the army here [in Mexico] are deeply incensed by such a display of selfish party ambition, sacrificing truth, principle, country, and his countrymen, all to his overweening desire for place," and adds, "the execrations against him are deep and bitter, and the words villain, traitor, are in every mouth." But it is needless to dwell upon charges like these, made against members of Congress. They are varied, and multiplied, and issued, daily from the administration press, as if the design was to stifle investigation, and to restrain the liberty of speech by denunciation and abuse. It is an evil omen, when the officers and soldiers of the army begin to charge legislators with villany and treason.—When the army, only, is pure, and contains all the patriotism in the land, their denunciations may possibly be succeeded by clearing the halls of legislation with the bayonet. Cromwell and Napoleon knew how to denounce and subvert legislatures. Washington, had he allowed the Newburg letters to operate upon him, might have marched to the glorious continental Congress of the Revolution, and controlled their deliberations by a band of soldiers.—The amendment of my colleague (Mr. CRITTENDEN) proposing to substitute volunteers in the place of regulars, has been voted down, mainly upon the ground, if I can judge from the debate, that the volunteer had attachments to home and country, that he had business to pursue, and that he had a personal worth, a pride of character, which would not allow him to become a mere machine. Remember, if you pass this bill, the ranks are to be filled with men who have no place in the business affairs of life, and who have no ties to bring them back from Mexico. Such were the arguments in favor of regulars, rather than volunteers. Such soldiers would be machines, under such Generals as Cromwell and Napoleon; and, although there may be no danger, during the continuance of the present generation, that a successful commander in war will totally revolutionize the government of the United States, yet an army composed of the materials which the friends of the administration seem to prefer, might be inducted to place their commander on a throne, provided he introduced into his policy a new feudal system, and divided out the lands of Mexico among his supporters. Whatever the army may do in the progress of events, I hope that the body of the American people have not forgotten the maxims that the military should be subordinate to the civil power of the State, and that large standing armies are dangerous to liberty. I shall proceed to express my opinions of the principles and tendencies of the existing war, regardless of anticipated denunciations.

There is another preliminary remark I desire to make. We have been in substance told, here as elsewhere, that those who object to the conduct of the President in reference to the war, and speak and write in opposition to the principles and actions of the Executive, whilst they manifest their own factious tempers, are disgracing the character of the country, and bringing upon themselves the odium which attached to the tories of the Revolution. Denunciations like these usually come from persons having a personal interest in the prosecution of the war, or a party interest to subserve. Those who feel the interests of party are such as have to a great extent the responsibility of beginning the war on their shoulders. With these it is nothing more than a political manœuvre, to endeavor to identify themselves with the honor and glory of the country, and to produce the impression that those who oppose them and their measures, are tarnishing the character and bringing disgrace upon the country. Such selfish trickery is too thinly veiled to hide itself from an intelligent and discerning public. The manner in which this war commenced, can reflect neither honor, nor disgrace, upon the great body of the people of the United States, for the most obvious reasons. They were not consulted upon the subject. The President did not even consult the representatives of the people until after the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. The Congress which recognized the existence of the war, had not been elected by the people with any expectation that their representatives would be called on to decide a question of peace or war. But even if every member had come with instructions from his constituents, no opportunity was afforded to express the popular will before two bloody battles were fought. The message of the President to Congress, which may be denominated his war message, is dated and was delivered on the 11th of May, 1846—only three days after the battle of Palo Alto, of which the President had not heard, at that time. Two days after, to wit, on the 13th of May, the act of Congress, recognizing the existence of a state of war, with Mexico and providing means to prosecute it, was approved. Now, sir, I assert that the people at large took no part in producing these momentous events, and that their character neither shines with increased splendor nor is tarnished in consequence of them. But the character of the people may and will become connected with the future conduct of this war, just so far as they have ability to control its results, and just in proportion as they adopt sound and honest principles and constrain their public servants to act in conformity with them. In a republic, Mr. President, the people may often be deceived by the mistakes or wickedness of their officers. The people may be misled by ignorance or fraud. But these things do not affect the moral character of the people. They only operate upon the public functionary, who, from sinister motives of gain or ambition, sacrifices the general welfare for his own emolument, and then attempts to hide his own disgrace by persuading the people that his disgrace is theirs, and that their character is identified with his. In my judgment, the character of the American people is deeply concerned in making a thorough investigation of the principles, and objects, of this war and in bringing their servants, executive and legislative, to act in regard to it upon the basis of justice. Let the people do that, and they will exalt their national character, and they will become the admiration of the world. If they fail to do it, ultimate disgrace inevitably awaits them. In the hope that I may aid in the popular investigations which are now in progress, I shall proceed to notice the general grounds upon which the war is vindicated, present my objections to the conduct of the President as to the manner in which he has involved his country in the difficulties which surround us, and conclude by a word of advice for extricating ourselves.

Upon this floor, and in the course of this debate, much has been said by Senators who sustain the President, the tendency of which is to render the public mind familiar with the idea that the annexation of all Mexico to our country, if not a positive blessing, would at least be productive of no very great evil. Indeed, one of the Senators from the great State of New York has submitted resolutions, in one of which it is declared:

"That true policy requires the government of the United States to negotiate the cession of such portion of territory upon the coast of, as the circumstances of the case may require, and to which the United States can make a title."

The President, in his message delivered at the commencement of our session, told us that:

"The boundary of the Rio Grande, and the cession to the United States of New Mexico, and Upper California, constituted an alternative, which our commissioner was under no circumstances to yield."

He further told us, in the same message, that:

"As the territory to be acquired by the boundary contemplated would be estimated to be of greater value than a fair equivalent for our just demands, our commissioner was authorized to stipulate for the payment of such an additional sum as might be found necessary to accomplish the object."

Put these sentences together and they amount to a distinct avowal that the President will not make peace unless he can get from Mexico more territory than is sufficient to pay our "just demands." It necessarily follows that he intends to continue the war, with a view to force the adoption of his ultimatum by Mexico, and thereby to obtain from her territory of "greater value than a fair equivalent for our just demands." My ideas of justice have long taught me to believe, that when an individual or a nation was willing to give up as much land, or territory, as was sufficient to pay all just debts, the creditor should be satisfied. But here, from the chief magistrate of this great and powerful nation of ours, we have a rule laid down and prescribed to weak and feeble Mexico, which in substance declares, that we will whip her until she surrenders a certain boundary of land, although it is more than enough to pay all our "just demands." But the President proposes to pay for all he gets over a "fair equivalent." What would be thought of a creditor's morality and sense of justice, whose appetite for annexation was so strong, that a slip sufficient to pay the debt, leaving the dwelling house and curtilage, to the debtor, should not be satisfied until he "swallowed" the whole plantation? Now, sir, consider the debates here, look at the resolutions offered by the Senators from New York and Indiana, weigh well the contents of the President's message, and do not forget the resolutions of mass meetings, newspaper essays and paragraphs, openly advocating, not only the annexation of the whole of Mexico, but the whole of North and South America which does not already belong to us, and then you must perceive the necessity of an appeal to the people of the United States, imploring them to pause and reflect, where they are going, and by what principles they are impelled.

What do we want with more territory, either for a political or commercial object? The whole of Europe contains but 3,000,000 square miles, running up to the uninhabitable frozen regions of the Arctic Ocean. The United States with Texas proper, contains 2,500,000 square miles. With New California and New Mexico added, we shall have more than 3,000,000 square miles. Is it a sentiment of vanity which induces us to enlarge our dominion over the unexplored wilderness of California? Or do we want it because it will add to our power hereafter, and thereby make us more formidable in the eyes of the world, as a military people? In my opinion, we already possess more of the elements of national power than all Europe combined. Inhabiting more favored latitudes, we produce every thing necessary for the comfort of man, in food, raiment, and shelter. There are but few luxuries which may not be abundantly raised in some of our various climates between the twenty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, extending from the capes of Florida in the south, to the sources of the Mississippi river in the north. Cotton, flax, hemp, wool, and we may add, silk, can be produced in sufficient quantities, not only to clothe our own people, but to supply the markets of the world. Sugar, rice, and almost every tropical fruit, can be raised in our southern possessions, more than sufficient to supply the domestic market. In grain and meat of every kind, we can feed our own people, and afford a large surplus to any nation that wants it. We have inexhaustible mines of iron, coal, copper, and lead. Our forests abound in the finest timber in the world. We even possess mines of gold that we may work, without coveting the mines of Mexico. All that we need is, to develop the resources of these rich possessions, and to convert, by art, the treasures of nature to the use of man. In peace we were doing it with a rapidity which astonished the world. We were not content to "go ahead" by steam power alone. Our forward movement was propelled by steam and lightning combined. We have already attained that degree of strength which would enable us to make successful defence against the world in arms. With bays, lakes and rivers, canals and rail-roads, for all purposes of intercommunication and trade, now affording great facilities, but nothing like equal to the wants of our people, with manufactures growing, with commerce, internal and foreign, extending; with all these sources of comfort and enjoyment, and with the certain prospect of their enlargement to an indefinite extent, why need we covet the possessions of other nations? Sir, it is a mistake, a great mistake, to suppose that we shall strengthen ourselves by the extension of our jurisdiction over Mexico. It will weaken us. It will inoculate our system with a poison which may result in our political dissolution, and the death of our liberty. It will certainly be attended with a vast expenditure of money for a long time to come—how long, no man can tell. We shall be compelled to keep large standing armies there, to prevent insurrections and rebellions. The money expended will be a great loss to us, but the valuable lives sacrificed under the influence of the climate, change of food, and other causes, will be still greater. There is a vanity among men which induces each of them, too often, to believe that he can direct and manage, not only his own affairs, but the business of all his neighbors, much better than they can. We overestimate our own powers and ability, when we suppose that we can excel in every pursuit of life, and carry them all on at the same time. There is a limit to the physical and intellectual faculties and ability of our species. We cannot attend individually to every thing. There is also a limit to the powers and capacity of government. No one government, unless it be that of an absolute despot, governing by subordinates the districts assigned them, can comprehend and superintend the various concerns of all the people of the earth. It is just as essential that there should exist different political and civil associations and governments, as that there should be different and separate lands and households among the people living under any one government. The past history of our race exhibits the folly of grasping at universal empire.

> "Rome, Rome thou art no more

may be sung, as well of other cities and dominions. Even the classic language of her orators and poets of the Augustan age is dead. The liberties and laws of republican Rome perished under the fatal influences and policy generated by the enlargement and extension of her empire. Shall we find no warning in her example? Can we legislate soundly or safely for a heterogeneous nation, composed of Anglo-Saxons, Aztecs, Negroes, and Spaniards, of every degree? Shall we have interpreters in this and the other house of Congress, when Senators and Representatives arrive from the State of Yucatan, and twenty other States now constituting the territory of Mexico? Can we hear all their petitions, and legislate on all their affairs? Can one Supreme Court decide all their causes brought up for adjudication? What sort of presidential elections shall we have, when the whole, or even the half of Mexico is annexed? What will the voter in Oaxaca know of the character and qualifications of the candidate residing in New York or Massachusetts? I might add, what will he care?

Our true glory, it seems to me, will be best promoted by throwing away ambition, "'Twas by that sin that angel's fell." Let us develope all the resources and advantages to be found in our already vast country. Let us cultivate the arts of peace, and seek not the subjugation and annexation by war and conquest, of any part of Mexico.

But the rich productions of Mexican mines, and forests, and fields, we are told, would enrich our commerce, and enlarge our revenues, and therefore, we should favor annexation. If peace and amity can be restored, and commercial arrangements made, if intercourse and trade can be placed upon a footing, mutually advantageous, it is difficult to perceive why we cannot derive as much profit in trading with Mexico as a separate and independent people, as we could when united. I have looked into the tables exhibiting the amount of our import and export trade, with her, for a series of years, and I find it has been too inconsiderable, at its most prosperous periods, to make annexation an object, with a view to enlarge our commerce with her. For a period of nine years, prior to, and including 1833, our imports from Mexico, on an average, amounted to $4.798,054, per annum, and our exports to $4,670,375, annually. The next twelve years after that period, our imports have averaged a little more than five millions, annually, and our exports a little upwards of four millions annually. During the year ending on the 30th June, 1845, being the last prior to the commencement of hostilities, the trade had declined so much, that our exports to Mexico only amounted to $1,152,331, and of this amount, there was $368,177, in foreign merchandize, leaving but $784,154, of domestic produce exported. Our imports from Mexico during the same year, were to the value of $1,702-936. The tables thus show, that for a period of more than twenty years, the average of exports and imports, did not exceed $5,000,000 each, per annum. Now, it is the profit on this limited trade, and the prospect of enlarging it by annexation, that are held out, as motives to influence us. It is manifest, that if the whole amount was a clear gain, it would not pay the fourth part of the expense of prosecuting the war one year. As to the additional revenue we might derive from annexation, if we could obtain any, it would be more than absorbed by the increased expenditure in governing the country.

The next point I shall despatch in a few words. It is, that we must take Mexico, the whole of it, to prevent its falling into the hands of England or France, and the establishment of a monarchy by one of them. I have seen no evidence that either of these governments want Mexico. It is the same story which used to be applied to Texas. May we not wait until there is some palpable demonstration, on the part of one or both of these governments, to annex Mexico, and then tell them it shall not be done? The reasoning which justifies us in seizing Mexico, to prevent England or France doing it, reminds me of a story, with which I shall conclude all I have to say on this head. Two persons were passing a farm, one bright moon shining night, and saw a fine turkey roosting on the fence. They deliberated for some time in great doubt, as to the propriety of taking it, one of them regarding it as a violation of conscience to do so. He at length got over all his difficulties; being assured by his companion, that he knew two rogues who were to pass that way, one of whom would certainly take the turkey, if they did not. Under such reasoning the farmer lost his turkey. The mass of the people will understand, and apply the moral of the story.

But it is alleged to be our "manifest destiny" to overrun all this continent with the Anglo-Saxon race, and to extend the "area of freedom," and the liberty of conscience. If these words mean anything, they amount to this, that we are driven by some law of necessity—some decree of the Almighty—to overturn the civil and religious institutions of all other nations on this continent, and to build up in their place just such systems as our own, or such as we may prescribe. If God has chosen us for any such purpose, and to accomplish it by force of arms, the revelation has not been made to me. I have no faith in the doctrines of any modern Peter the Hermit, who preaches propagandism by fire and sword. I am unwilling to enter upon military crusades with a view to teach our politics or religion to the other nations of the earth. Christianity, or perhaps more properly speaking, the professors of Christianity have, as I think, been signally rebuked by Providence in their wars to arrest the "Holy Land" from the dominion of the followers of Mahomet. Sir, it is not in the nature of man to be taught true religion or the true principles of civil liberty and republican government at the point of the bayonet. A state of war rouses every angry passion, and vindictive feeling against an invader. There is an instinctive resentment against those who attempt to compel us to adopt their creeds by force. Hence it is, that no cause can progress under teachers who undertake to produce conviction by the sword, and who kill the body for the sin of unbelief. Persecution never did, and never will benefit the persecutor. It may enable the persecuted to rise upon a tide of sympathy, excited in their behalf. I am a protestant in politics and in religion. I do not believe that we can find infallability on earth, either in church or State. I hope that the spread of the Christian religion over the earth will accomplish great things for the amelioration of our race. I exult in the moral influences, which the thirty-four Theological Seminaries, and their hundred and one professors, the thirty-one thousand seven hundred and sixty-four preachers of the Gospel, and the three millions three hundred and ninety-four thousand one hundred and forty communicants of Protestant churches in the United States, according to the latest returns, are spreading throughout our land and nation. This estimate does not include

Quakers nor Catholics, among whom there are additional hundreds of thousands, who inculcate every virtue, and enjoin the practice of the commandments delivered to Moses. If these Christian people desire the extension of civil and religious liberty, and if they would accomplish their desires, they must work like their Divine Head and Master did. They must persuade, and not attempt to drive. They must make impressions upon the understandings and hearts of other nations by the weapons of reason and love. I admit "the rapture of the strife" on a battle-field, but it is only the essence of the glory of this world, and not of Heaven. It creates the hero to be admired, and not the sage to be beloved. The appropriate business of the one is to sack cities and devastate countries, waste, and consume, the substance of a conquered people, and leave women and children to starve amidst the carnage, and death of their husbands, sons, and brothers. The business of the other is to build up cities, to improve countries, and to bring the blessings of peace and plenty, of intellectual and religious, and social joy, to the happy homes of a numerous population. I had hoped that if we were the children of destiny, that our fatalism would be developed in spreading Christianity and popular government over the world through the instrumentality of a bright and peaceful example, one of universal toleration in matters of opinion, and in which reason and persuasion would take the place of bigotry and the stake. But, sir, I am no fatalist. My faith is, that God hath set good and evil before us, and endowed us with free will to choose between them. Our faculties are capable of guiding us aright, if we will but make a proper use of them; and we sin in the sight of Heaven, if we do not use them.

The defenders of the administration contend that Mexico was preparing to invade our territory, and to make war; and, therefore, they insist, we had the right upon the principle of self-defence to strike the first blow. I admit that individuals and nations when they perceive an enemy about to strike, are not bound to wait and receive the blow, but may commence in order to ward off the injury by disabling the enemy. To show that Mexico intended to make war on us, the withdrawal of her minister, and the resolutions for the annexation of Texas were adopted by Congress, and the heated remarks of Mexican officers are referred to. Among others, a publication made by Garcia Conde at the head of the office of war and marine in Mexico, dated July 12, 1845, has been made to cut a conspicuous figure, in which he says, speaking of the annexation of Texas. "The injustice of that usurpation is apparent, and Mexico cannot tolerate such a grave injury without making an effort to prove to the United States the possibility of her ability to cause her rights to be respected. With this object, the supreme government has resolved upon a declaration of war against that power." Yet the "supreme government" took good care to make no such declaration. Mexican officers have been guilty of perpetrating threats against and abuse of the United States, to an unlimited and immeasurable extent, I have no doubt. They speak to flatter the prejudices of their people, pretty much after some of our high patterns. While we were claiming the whole of Oregon by positive assertions of our right, and whilst political chivalry was threatening to shed its last drop for 54° 40', Mexico was equally vociferous for the whole of Texas. Silly children may be frightened by gasconade—sensible men, never. Cowards crow tremendously, like fowls without game blood, so long as there is a fence between them; but bring them into the ring, and they raise their hack and back out. Sir, it has amused me to see with what avidity we catch the hostile declarations of Mexicans and publish them to the country as a justification to the President for beginning this war. The friends of the administration may have it, if they please, that every man, woman, and child in Mexico had taken the oath of Hannibal, the oath of eternal vengeance against us, and that they were making the most active preparations to march large armies not only into Texas, but into the very "vitals" of the United States; and that the President was perfectly informed of all their movements; and still the President is totally without justification for his conduct, in my opinion. If all these things had been true, in their most aggravated and offensive manner, as soon as they came to the knowledge of the President, it was his duty, under that clause of the constitution which says, "he shall from time to time give to the congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient," to have laid the whole before the representatives of the people, and to call upon the congress—the war declaring power of our government—to act in the premises. But instead of doing so the President, on the 13th of January, 1846, without consulting Congress, which was then in session, orders General Taylor to leave his position at Corpus Christi, where he remained unmolested with his army for months, and to establish himself upon the left bank of the Rio Bravo or Rio Grande. On the 8th of March, 1846, General Taylor began breaking up his camp at Corpus Christi; and on the 28th of that month a flag staff was erected opposite Matamoras; "and soon the flag of our country, a virgin one, (says Capt. Henry in his campaign sketches, page 66,) was seen floating upon the banks of the Rio Grande, proclaiming in a silent but impressive manner that the "area of freedom" was again extended." The brave captain, in admiration of this event, says on the same page, "there was not ceremony enough in raising it, (the flag.) The troops should have been paraded under arms—the banner of our country should have been hoisted with patriotic strains of music, and a national salute should have proclaimed in tones of thunder that, "Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable," had advanced to the banks of the Rio Grande." Well, sir, there is something of glorification in all this; but to the calm observer, it is the invasion of territory held and claimed by a foreign nation. It is an act of war, made by the President of the United States—by the one man power—without consulting Congress; and is therefore a palpable violation of the constitution. If sanctioned by the people, then are we ready to tolerate any usurpation, and to bow our necks to receive the yoke.

It is impossible for the President and his supporters to escape one of two alternatives. He either knew at the time General Taylor was ordered in January to the Rio Grande, that the Mexican authorities and office s were in earnest in their hostile declarations, and were preparing for the execution of them, or had reasonable grounds to believe there was danger from Mexican threats and preparations, or he had no knowledge or belief that any thing serious was contemplated on the part of Mexico. If the first—if he knew or had good grounds to believe that Mexico was seriously engaged in preparing for war, he grossly violated his duty in withholding the facts, and in not communicating them to Congress prior to ordering the army to the Rio Grande. If the second—if he had no important knowledge, and consequently, nothing to communicate to Congress in relation to the hostile movements of Mexico, then he was guilty of marching the army into a country actually occupied and claimed by Mexicans, in ignorance of all the facts which could furnish a plausible apology for the recklessness of the step. He has, therefore, either concealed from Congress, possessing the war declaring power by the constitution, important information, or he has, in ignorance of the facts, precipitated the country into hostilities without affording the representatives of the nation an opportunity to exercise their constitutional powers in declaring or refusing to declare war. It is in this point of view, that the unconstitutional conduct of the President is flagrant. And how is it defended by his supporters? Why, sir, they say we have just cause of war against Mexico: and they and the President furnish a long list of specifications, the most prominent of which I shall hereafter consider. Well, let us admit that it is all true. What then? Because we have just cause of war against a foreign nation, does it follow that the President may begin it whenever he pleases, without consulting Congress, or waiting until Congress has considered the subject at all? Sir, I arraign the President before his countrymen for the exercise of a power in making this war which did not belong to him. He sent an army to take possession of a country in the adverse possession of a people who were citizens of a foreign nation with which we were at peace, although there was no very good feeling towards us. That was an act of war. It was invasion. The President had no more right or constitutional authority to do it, than he has to send the army to Quebec or Havana and take possession of these cities and surrounding country, without the sanction of a previous act of Congress.

To give the Senate and country a distinct and clear idea of the manner in which the war was begun "by the act of" the President, allow me to state facts as I have collected them from Captain Henry's Campaign sketches. He was an officer in General Taylor's army. He writes well and clearly, and from what I have heard of him, although we are not acquainted, his veracity cannot be questioned. Captain Henry states that:

"When General Taylor with his command reached the bank (of the Colorado) some twenty or thirty Mexicans presented themselves and said that if his force attempted to cross, they would fire upon it, that such were their orders."—Page 59.

"Previous to the crossing, the adjutant-general of General Mejia, the commanding general at Matamoras, made his appearance and handed to General Taylor a paper from Mejia, 'forbidding his crossing, stating that he would look upon it as a declaration of war,' and left assuring the general he would be opposed and that a fight was inevitable."—Page 60.

These occurrences took place on the 21st of March, 1846. On the 24th of March General Taylor arrived at Point Isabel and was met there, says Henry, "by a deputation of fifty armed citizens from Matamoras, with some important civil functionary at their head, who presented him a paper protesting against our occupying the country." The general having no time to discuss the matter told them very concisely "he would give them an answer at Matamoras"—page 63. On the arrival of the army at Matamoras or opposite to it on the east bank of the river, General Worth was deputed by General Taylor to answer the deputation which met him at Point Isabel. After some difficulty General Worth and the Mexican General La Vega were brought together. General La Vega, (says Henry) spoke of our arrival as an act of invasion: that the Mexican government looked upon it as such and asked the question, "what would we have done if we had been served so?"—page 66. Well, Mr. President, I should like to hear what answer the President himself or his vindicators on this floor would give to that question. None of them have yet, in this debate, placed themselves in the attitude of Mexico and asked what they would do under similiar circumstances? The rule of doing unto others as we would have them do to us, is, I fear, obsolete in regard to the Mexican war. Well, sir, as I cannot tell how silent Senators, if compelled to speak, would answer La Vega's question, I will give you Capt. Henry's answer, and I mistake the character of my countrymen altogether, if ninety-nine hundredths of them would not answer precisely as the noble Captain He says, "of course no reply could be given, except that we would have fought like lions for what we deemed our possessions." Yes, sir, that is the true spirit of our people. Let any foreign nation send an army to take possession of what we deem ours, and which is in our occupancy; let them put their feet upon any part of the State from which I come, and I will answer for every Kentuckian, that there is not one of them, who will not fly to arms to drive the invader from our soil. And yet, sir, for the assertion of this sentiment here, a sentiment without which there can be no true love of country upon earth, I suppose some malignant partizan may gazette me as giving "aid and comfort" to the enemy.

I will proceed with my extracts from Capt. Henry's book. On the 28th March, as the army advanced to Matamoras, "two of the advanced guard of the Dragoons, being some distance from the main body, were pounced upon by a body of Mexicans and carried off prisoners to Matamoras"—page 65. "April 1st. General Taylor having demanded the release of the captured Dragoons they were returned to-day, with nearly all their equipments"—page 70. On the 11th of April, General Ampudia, long looked for arrived at Matamoras—page 70. On the 12th of April General Ampudia sends a communication to General Taylor, telling him, "he must leave his position in twenty-four hours, retire to the Nueces and there await the settlement of the question by negotiation, in default of which, Mexico would look upon his position as a declaration of war." "General Taylor sent word to Ampudia that he did not require twenty-four hours, but would reply at 10 o'clock A. M. tomorrow." On the 13th of April, he did reply by saying "he was sent here by order of his government in a peaceable attitude and intended to remain; and then warned him against the responsibility of firing the first gun"—pages 74 and 75.

Well, sir, who fired the first gun? On the 4th and 5th days of April our troops shot two of their own men as they were deserting to the Mexicans. The deserters were shot, one on each day, as they were swimming the river—page 72. The first blood shed was that of our own men, and by the guns of our own men. Heaven forbid that this evil omen in the commencement of this war, should portend civil strife and bloodshed among ourselves in its final results. On the morning of the 10th of April, "Col. Cross left camp and not returning in the evening great fears were entertained for his safety"—page 73. On the 17th of April Lieutenants Dobbins and Porter with ten men each "left camp with the avowed intention of catching, if possible, some of the band of the notorious Romeno Falcon, hoping to discover some clue to the murder of Col. Cross"—page 77. On the 18th of April, Lieutenants Dobbins and Porter having separated their commands, Lieut Porter's party, at about 2 o'clock P. M.—met with a party of armed Mexicans engaged in jerking beef. "As they approached their camp, a Mexican snapped his piece at Lieut. Porter, who returned it with both barrels of his gun. The enemy immediately fled, and the Lieutenant found himself in the possession of ten horses and twenty Mexican blankets"—pages 77 and 78. Here we have the first snap from the Mexican and the first fire, two shots, from our officer. Whether the Lietenant supposed he had found Falcon and his men, to catch some of whom he had left camp, and whether he made any demonstrations evidencing his intention to capture any of them before the Mexican "snapped," Captain Henry does not inform us. But after the Mexicans fled, and after Lieut. Porter had taken the ten horses and twenty blankets, we are told that he and his men mounted and proceeded towards the camp. They had not proceeded far before they were attacked by a party of Mexicans concealed in a chapparal, "Lieutenant Porter ordered his men to dismount, the enemy kept up a brisk fire; both of the Lieutenants barrels snapped and nearly all the pieces of his men had been rendered useless by the rain." The result of the whole was that Lieut. Porter, and one of his men named Flood, were killed, and the balance of his party dispersed, and got to camp as best they could. The soldier who got in last, said he concealed himself in the chapparel, and saw the proceedings of the enemy. He reported that—

"As soon as our men broke, they, (the Mexicans,) rushed upon the Lieutenant and Flood, the latter they surrounded and deliberately knifed, and then performed the same inhuman office upon Lieutenant Porter."—Page 78

Before this fight between Lieutenant Porter and the Mexicans commenced, General Taylor had blockaded the mouth of the Rio Grande, and stopped "all supplies for Matamoras." This appears from his letter to the Adjutant General, dated the 15th of April, page 118, of document 196, for session 1845—6. On the 26th of April, General Taylor wrote the Adjutant General, informing him, that General Arista had arrived in Matamoras, on the 24th, and assumed the chief command of the Mexican troops.

"On the same day," says General Taylor, "he (Arista,) addressed me a communication, conceived in courteous terms, but saying that he considered hostilities commenced, and should prosecute them."

Page 120 of same document. In the same letter, General Taylor mentions the engagement between the Mexicans and the dragoons, sixty-three strong, under Captain Thornton, and says—

"Hostilities may now be considered as commenced, and I have this day, deemed it necessary to call upon the Governor of Texas, for four regiments of volunteers, &c."

Captain Henry's account of the defeat and capture of Thornton, may be found on pages 82 and 83, of his book. It occurred on the 26th of April, 1846. I have thus given a very abridged account of the proceedings on the Rio Grande, up to the time when, according to the admission of all, war between the two nations existed. I have referred to book and page, where I derived my information. Is it not clear, that it was occasioned by the act of the President, in sending General Taylor with the army, to the Rio Grande? Is it not equally clear, that the Mexicans did not desire war with us, notwithstanding their threats against us? Our resolutions for the annexation of Texas, which are at the bottom of Mexican hostility, were approved on the 1st of March, 1845. If Mexico intended to make war on us for this act, why did she delay more than a year, before drawing the sword and striking the blow? If she wanted war, why did her authorities from time to time, meet General Taylor in his advance, and almost implore him to go back, or they would be compelled to fight him? If she wanted war, why did Ampudia on the 12th of April, require General Taylor to retire to the Nueces, and there abide negotiations between the two governments—why did he almost implore General Taylor to do so?

"If," said Ampudia, "you insist in remaining upon the soil of the Department of Tamaulipas, it will clearly result, that arms and arms alone, must decide the question; and in that case, I advise you, that we accept the war to which, with so much injustice on your part, you provoke us, &c."

(See translation, page 119 of document 196 aforesaid.) Sir, the idea is ridiculous, that weak and distracted Mexico, with a population of but little more than 7,000,000, so weak that she had not even attacked Texas, for years after the battle of San Jacinto, and when Texas had a population of not more than 100,000 or 150,000 at most, should seriously think of making war against the United States, with a population of 20,000,000, backed by an efficient Navy, when Mexico did not own a single ship, and sustained by an army not inferior, numbers considered, as they have proved themselves, to any in the world. Mexican gasconade, was intended by their leaders, to operate upon the ignorant masses of their own population, and to produce a political effect at home. Parades, no doubt, thought he would make himself popular, and get up a pronunciamento in his behalf, by assuming to be the devoted advocate of the honor and interests of Mexico, and by deluding his countrymen, through their prejudices against us. He succeeded, overturned Bustamente, and rode into power. That was all he wanted. And we have not a few among ourselves, who, like Parades, pretend to be perfectly devoted to the honor and interests of their country, but who, I am sorry to think, are just as willing as Parades, for their own advantage, to play upon the prejudices, and flatter the martial tastes of our people. I believe they want, and expect power, and official emoluments from it. There is danger that they will succeed, and force us upon the mad career of foreign conquests.

The President and his defenders, fully sensible that the march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande, blockading the mouth of the river, and taking possession of the country, were acts of war per se, as Mr. Tyler would say, if the country on the Rio Grande belonged to Mexico; have been driven to the necessity of claiming all the land east of that river, from its mouth to its source, as a part of our own territory through the annexation of Texas; and being ours, the President had the right to march our army into it; and hence it is contended, Mexico was the invader, and shed the blood of our citizens upon our soil. Well, sir, I will punish any nation that invades our soil and sheds the blood of our citizens; and hence it is with me an important inquiry, to ascertain whether we did own the land up to the Rio Grande, where Porter and Thornton were killed. To satisfy my own mind, and to enable me to take such course as a Senator which truth and patriotism required, I have examined the question of title as well as I could, and my researches have resulted in the conviction that we do not own the soil where the first blood was shed in this war. I will state the grounds of my opinion as briefly as possible. By the treaty with Spain in 1819, we relinquished to her all claim which we therefore may have had to the territory lying west of the Sabine. After the Texian people, by their revolution, had thrown off the Spanish yoke, and established their independence, we, by treaty made in April 1831, conceded to Mexico the same boundary as before that time we had agreed upon with Spain. Thus, by two treaties, we have relinquished all title and claim to land west of the Sabine river, now the eastern boundary of Texas. Have we at any subsequent time acquired a new title? It is contended that we have through the Texian revolution and the annexation of Texas to the United States. By conceding the same territory to Mexico which we acknowledged in 1819 belonged to Spain, and when Mexico had no other title to it than that which was founded on revolution and conquest, we have admitted the principle that Texas may acquire title in the same manner; and, consequently, if she did so acquire it, that it became ours by consummating the contract of annexation. The whole question turns, therefore, upon a fact. Did Texas conquer the country up to the Rio Grande opposite Matamoras? As to the declarations of Texas that the Rio Grande was her boundary, they are too idle to require notice. If men or nations could, by mere assertions, acquire property or territory, there would be no end to their wealth and dominion. Unfortunately for the honest reputation of individuals and nations, the society within governments, and the relations of governments, are kept in perpetual turmoil by unjust assertions and claims. We must have facts, then, and not assertions.

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. DOUGLAS) insisted that the revolution in Texas commenced in consequence of the destruction of the Mexican federal constitution of 1824, and the creation of a central consolidated government, to which Texas was unwilling to submit, and that Texas successfully resisted the efforts of Mexico to bring her into subjection to the central government. That is, I believe, all true, and I could perceive very clearly that these facts constituted a just foundation upon which Texas could rightfully assert title to all the lands within her acknowledged limits before the revolution commenced. Up to these limits she was possessed before she asserted her independence, and that possession, coupled with right, would continue until Mexico succeeded in dispossessing her—which was never done. I therefore agree that Texas had title to all the land within her proper limits, and that we acquired her title by annexation; although I must believe it was bad policy on our part to trade with Texas for that title which she had secured by a revolution not ten years old when we made the bargain. We ought at least to have waited until she had enjoyed peaceable and adverse possession long enough to have an ejectment before purchasing the property.

Mexico seems to doubt whether there be any international statute of limitations which bars her right in so short a time as Texas and the United States have agreed on. But let that pass. Conceding that Texas, by her successful defence secured title to all the land within her proper limits, does that defence equally avail to give her title to part of the Mexican State of Tamaulipas and New Mexico? Certainly not. How then can Texas, under the circumstances, enlarge her original boundaries? She could only do it by conquest, and the permanent occupation of the conquered district.

It must be borne in mind, that the original western boundary of Texas was the river Nueces, that the territories of Coahuila and Texas united, formed one of the Mexican States, that Coahuila lay on both sides of the Rio Grande, having a co-terminus boundary with Texas, formed by the river Nueces. That the Mexican State of Tamaulipas covered the country on both sides the Rio Grande, extending from the Nueces west along the gulf coast and bounded on the North by Coahuila, and that New Mexico lay above on both sides of the Rio Grande. It must also be kept in mind, that Taylor's army was sent into the State of Tamaulipas, according to the original boundaries of these Mexican provinces, and that the first battles occurred in what was at one time part of Tamaulipas, beyond all question. Conceding, did Texas at any time conquer and hold permanently that part of Tamaulipas in which the first blood was shed? Did she ever garrison her conquests and keep any military force in that part of the country? If she ever did I have no knowledge of the fact. If the fact exists, it is passing strange that it cannot be proved. I do not believe such a fact ever did exist, and I will now present the grounds of my belief as rapidly as possible.

In the first place, the evidence furnished by Capt. Henry is conclusive to prove that the Mexicans had possession in fact of the country on the left bank of the Rio Grande at the time General Taylor invaded it under the orders of the President. On the 24th of March, 1846, as Taylor approached, the Mexicans at Point Isabel, except one, burn their houses and fly before the army—(page 62, of Henry's book.) At page 63 Capt. Henry says:

"The country around Palo Alto is really beautiful, and I am not surprised the Mexicans are loth to part with it."

On pages 64 and 65 he speaks of the Mexican "settlements;" "large fields" being enclosed; passing through a "long line of Mexican huts;" "stopped at one and there was a regular rush for eggs and chickens;" "the floor paved with bricks and covered with beds;" "the poor devils (Mexican population) at their cottage doors appeared pleased at our arrival and saluted us as we passed." Our army camped in a corn field on reaching the Rio Grande. The corn was about "six inches high."

"General Taylor sent for the owner and told him he would pay him what he thought was the value of the corn." - Page 68

At page 67 Capt. Henry describes the country and its richness. Speaks of the army occupying cotton and corn fields, mentions the remains of a "beautiful garden" in which the "orange, lemon, fig, banana, plaintaine, peach, and cocoanut" grew, and says:

"The rich bank of land is between thirty five and forty miles in width, and some two hundred and fifty in length."

Capt. Thornton was attacked when he and his men were at a house in a "large plantation"—page 83. In all this we see incontestible proofs that the Mexicans had possession of the country. When and how did the Texans ever have possession of it? If they ever had a single settler in it west of the Nueces, give us his name, tell us who he was, and where he settled?

(Here Senator HOUSTON informed Mr. U. that a man named Powers had settled west of the Nueces, in 1832, under a Mexican grant.)

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Well that was years before the Texan Revolution commenced? What became of him? Was he a citizen of Tamaulipas or Texas? Did he conquer the country up to the Rio Grande?

Reliance has been placed upon the settlement of Corpus Christi and the holding of that place as evidence of Texan occupation and possession. But if I have ascertained the facts connected with that settlement correctly, they prove precisely the reverse. Capt. Henry, who staid there six months, gives us the account of its settlement, and how it was occupied and held, at pages 18, 19, and 20, of his book. He says:

"It was first settled by Col. H. L. Kinney, in 1838, who in conjunction with his partner, Mr. Aubrey, established a trading post, to meet the immense traffic carried on by the Mexicans. It is, the village now contains, the entrepot of the Indians who come to the coast to trade with us in peltries, &c. But he was forced to keep a regular company of men, at his own expense, to defend his 'ranch.' Its proximity to the Rio Grande made it the most convenient point for the contraband trade."

"For the suppression of this illicit trade, the government of Mexico kept constantly stationed on the Rio Grande a corps of troops called commissaries. They were usually commanded by some worthless vagabond who was ready on a moment's notice to sacrifice his duty for a bribe."

Capt. H. then gives us an account of an expedition sent by the government of Mexico, under an officer of the "commissaries," and two hundred men, to destroy Kinney's goods and to take him prisoner. Kinney crossed the Nueces to obtain assistance. On his return he found his valiant company had not only deserted him but stolen many of his goods. Kinney evinced tact and bravery, but finally saved his establishment by bribing the Mexican officer, and Capt. Henry winds up the account by saying:

"So much for a little ingenious bravery, and a happy application of the lesser of the evils."

There, sir, you have the history of Corpus Christi—a smuggling establishment in its origin, and protected against Indians by soldiers employed by a private company and not the government of Texas, and maintained against Mexico by the bribery of her officers. But, sir, this is not all my proof. I have the statement of one of the most respectable men in Kentucky, whose nephew was one of the officers at Corpus Christi, and who informs me that his nephew told him last summer, when on a visit, that the small force at Corpus Christi could not hold possession at all times without tampering with the Mexican officers, that his nephew had given a fine horse to keep fair weather with the Mexican commander at Matamoras, and that Col. Kinney himself had taken the oath of allegiance to the Mexican government. Now, sir, if these things be so, and there be no evidence that Texas ever marched an army to the Rio Grande in the neighborhood of Matamoras, is it not preposterous to contend that Texas, by conquest, extended her territory into the State of Tamaulipas up to the Rio Grande?

I find by an examination of the laws of Texas (and the laws of a people constitute their best history,) much which confirms the idea that Texas made and held no conquests up to the Rio Grande. On the 10th of December, 1835, Texas resolved to call a convention to form a constitution, and in her resolutions declared that "all free white males and Mexicans opposed to a central government," were allowed to vote. Also soldiers then in the army were allowed to vote by proxy. The judges and alcaldes were authorized to designate the places of holding the elections. In these resolutions no particular district or territory was specified from which representatives were to be elected. They constituted a general invitation to all persons opposed to the central government of Mexico to cooperate.

On the 5th of June, 1837, Texas passed a resolution "relating to elections for depopulated districts," in which it was provided, that the President might order polls to be opened for the depopulated districts in any part of the republic where the citizens of such districts or counties may be temporarily residing, until such times as they could return with safety to their homes. This resolution was to continue in force during the war with Mexico. Here, then, is record evidence taken from the statute book of Texas that a part of the districts even of Texas proper had been depopulated by the war. What districts were they? The laws of Texas furnish the answer, and furnish it most effectually, so far as my present inquiry is concerned. On the 18th of January, 1845, the resolution relating to elections for depopulated districts was repealed so far as it operated upon the counties of Refugio and San Patricio, and from and after the passage of the act elections in these counties were to be held within their limits and not elsewhere.—The 4th section of the act of 1845 provides that the reorganization of these counties shall be had within six months from and after its passage, and proper returns made of all elections of county officers, to the Department of State. The 5th section of the act of 1845 makes Corpus Christi the county seat of San Patricio county. Before that time the county seat had been on the east side of the Nueces. By the constitution of Texas, adopted 17th March, 1836, San Patricio county was entitled to one representative. Thus we have the laws of Texas proving that San Patricio, on the Nueces, was a depopulated county and remained subject to the operations of the resolution of the 5th June, 1837, as a depopulated county, until the passage of the act of the 18th January, 1845, and before the six months allowed for the organization of the county under this act had expired. Texas in convention had accepted the proposals made in our resolutions for annexation. It thus appears that, instead of Texas extending her settlements and possessions towards the Rio Grande, that she admitted by her laws that two of her counties or districts had become depopulated, and she did not even attempt to reorganize them until about nine years after the battle of San Jacinto. But, sir, there is yet more Texian law which bears upon the question. I have not been able to discover any statute of Texas which defines the boundaries of San Patricio and Refugio counties. I was limited in time in making researches and then the indexes are so deficient, my progress was slow. I did find, however, a resolution dated 17th December, 1836, requiring the chief justices of the several counties to give information to the Secretary of State as to the boundaries of their counties. From this I infer that there was no statute prior to that date giving the bounds of the counties of San Patricio or Refugio, or if there be not a statute, that it did not extend their bounds west of the Nueces. Whether the chief justice of San Patricio reported that his county went to the Rio Grande, I do not know. If he did his report cannot extend a jurisdiction over the Mexicans upon that river, and separate them from the State of Tamaulipas.

In the map published by Thomas G. Bradford in 1839, and entered according to the act of Congress in 1838, Texas is laid down as being bounded west by the Nueces. That map lays down the line separating Coahuila and Tamaulipas as crossing the Rio Grande above Laredo leaving that place in the State of Tamaulipas. Coahuila and Texas were united and formed into one State by an act or decree passed at Saltillo on the 15th of August, 1824, in which they are declared to be one State and the territory thereof, to be that recognized as both provinces up to that time.—In the laws passed by the legislature of the State of Coahuila and Texas, I find an act under date of the 12th of April, 1827, granting the exclusive privilege of introducing steamboats to Bradburn & Staples, "in that portion of the Rio del Norte, (alias Rio Grande,) that belongs to the state;" thus showing that only a part of that river passed through the territory. In apportioning the representation, I find an act passed in March, 1827, which gives the "districts of Saltillo, Paras, and Monclova, three deputies proprietors each; that of Texas two, and Rio Grande one." I have thus found nothing which gave Texas the shadow of a right originally, to that part of the State of Tamaulipas, in which the battles on the Rio Grande were fought; and I have looked in vain for the evidence of the fact that Texas made and held any portion of Tamaulipas as a conquest. Having no original right, and making no conquest in the neighborhood of Matamoras, we could acquire no title through Texas by annexation. On the 12th of June, 1837, the legislature of Texas passed a resolution authorizing their President to send a flag of truce to Matamoras to procure a release of prisoners then there. If at that time she had conquered the country, why did she not erect a battery, as Gen. Taylor did, opposite to Matamoras, and by her cannon compel the surrender of the prisoners? If the country was not then conquered, at what subsequent period was the conquest made? I will not pursue the inquiry farther. I have presented the facts upon which my mind has been forced, to the conclusion that the Mexican government did not commence this war "by invading the territory of the State of Texas, striking the first blow, and shedding the blood of our citizens on our own soil;" but that it was unconstitutionally commenced by the President of the United States.

What are we now fighting for? Indemnity for the past and security for the future, the President answers. I am for these also; but my indemnity and my security may be very different from the Presidents. What does the President include in his ideas of indemnity? The expenses of the war, and the amount of the "just and long deferred claims of our citizens" against Mexico? I think the Texian is the last person who should complain of the non-payment of "long deferred claims." He ought to have recollected that he had refused to pay the claims of our citizens for French spoliations, even after they had been provided for by Congress, much longer deferred than any of their claims against Mexico.—But although the President will not himself pay, it may still be very proper to make Mexico do it. How much will the expenses of the war and the claims of our citizens amount to? I wish to go a little into particulars and ascertain the sums we are to demand, and then we shall be better prepared to decide upon the extent and value of the indemnity to be exacted. The President tells us in the message that Mexico cannot satisfy the claims of our citizens and "reimburse the United States for the expenses of the war," except by ceding to us a portion of her territory. "The doctrine of no territory is the doctrine of no indemnity," says the President. Let us begin the calculation, and estimate the expenses of the war and our private claims. The amount stands thus:

Balance in the Treasury 1st Febry. 1846, now spent, - -	$9,126,439
Treasury notes under the act of 23d February, 1846, - -	10,000,000
Treasury notes under the act of 28th January, 1847, -	23,000,000
Loan on Treasury notes now asked for by Secretary of the Treasury, - -	18,789,114
Add the value of bounty lands according to the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office to the Committee on Public Lands, - - - -	14,550,000
We have thus expended, if we could get peace to-day, - -	$75,465,553

But this is nothing like all, we have by the war laid the foundation for an increased expenditure of millions more, and with which the country will be burdened for years to come. The claims of the mutilated and disabled soldier, and the widows and orphans of the dead, for pensions, are pouring in upon us. There is a claim now before the committee of which I am a member for more than $15,000, for property taken and used to supply the wants of one of our regiments, and how many more thousands we shall be called to pay for property used in the same way, no one knows or can even conjecture. The claims of our citizens against Mexico are as follows.

Amount allowed by the Commissioner, under the treaty, and part of which has been paid, - - - -	$2,826,079
Amount approved by our Commissioner but disapproved by the Mexican Commissioner and not acted on by the umpire, - - - - - - - -	928,620
Amount of claims not acted on or decided, - - - -	3,336,837
Total individual claims	$6,291,5376

If we could arrest the war this moment, with what we have already spent, with the liabilities already incurred, and with what we should be compelled to expend in bringing our armies home and paying them up to the time they were disbanded, no reasonable estimate of our extra-war-expenses can bring them below a hundred millions of dollars. But how will it be if we go on? The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the deficiency for the year ending 1st of July, 1849 at $36,274,055. Pass this bill for ten thousand more regulars, and the other bill reported by the Military Committee for twenty thousand more volunteers, and bring upon the country the increased expenditure of feeding and clothing them, supplying them with arms and transporting them to, and marching them through Mexico, and add these new expenditures to the past and well may the tax paying people of the United States begin to tremble and ask, what is to become of us? Now, it is the Presidents proposed policy to obtain indemnity from Mexico in land for this vast expenditure. We must not forget that the President authorized his Commissioner, Mr. Trist, to pay something to Mexico for the cession of California and New Mexico, but he did not tell us how many millions he had authorized Mr. Trist to give. Enough appears however to show, that in the President's opinion, if he could secure territory amounting to his ultimatum, he would thereby secure a pecuniary indemnity for the government and an ample fund also for the satisfaction of individual claims. Now, sir, I do not hesitate to declare that a pecuniary indemnity is an impossibility. The idea can have no other effect than to delude the people. I will not charge that it was thrown out with that design. It can be demonstrated, if our past experience is worth any thing, that the hope of a pecuniary indemnity is a sheer delusion. Suppose New Mexico and California ours, what steps must we take to gain this pecuniary indemnity with which to reimburse the government and pay the claims of our citizens? We must begin with other heavy expenditures, and we must pay them years before we shall get a dollar in return. Our first step will be to establish two or more territorial governments; our second, to create two or three surveyors general, and to provide for the employment of a multitude of deputy surveyors; and our third, to create land offices and provide for registers and receivers. In doing all this the Executive will have a harvest of patronage by which he can feed scores of lean and hungry partizans. The national Treasury will pour its treasure into the laps of Territorial Governors, Judges, Legislators, Marshals and Attornies, Surveyor Generals and Deputy Surveyors, Registers and Receivers. Verily, the first plague of Egypt, the curse of blood is now upon us, but as it passes away the second follows. I see the frogs, skipping and jumping in the shape of innumerable office seekers and office holders. Yes, sir, and they will, as of yore, invade our bed chambers and kneading troughs, so that the people will not be able to sleep or eat.

But, sir, there is something more of expense after you have quieted the Mexican title and purchased her claim to New Mexico and California; you must, if you do as you heretofore have done, extinguish the Indian titles to the land, before you begin to survey and sell it. Your Indian Department now costs you annually about $1.720,000. How many more thousands shall we have added to it in the shape of annuities to the Camanches and to all the Indians who inhabit the territories we acquire?

There is still yet another thing to be considered. When we get California and New Mexico, how much vacant and unappropriated land shall we get with them? In the acquisition of Florida and Louisiana, we did not molest private rights. We have confirmed the Spanish and French grants, and spent thousands and thousands of dollars legislating about them, and providing for commissioners to investigate them. But what will be the value of the vacant land we shall get? We have reports of bleak mountains and desert plains and some rich vallies; but the great California basin is yet unexplored, and no one can tell us anything of its value.

Now, sir, when you add to the expenses of the war and the claims of our citizens, the necessary expenditure to support territorial governments, to support your land system, to extinguish Indian titles, and to distinguish the appropriated and the vacant lands, is it possible for us, by bringing our new acquisitions into market, to obtain, by the sales, money enough to pay the interest on the capital? It is impossible, unless the vacant lands to be acquired are more valuable, and will sell faster, and at higher prices than our own rich public domain has done.

For the last fifteen years, the sales of our public land has given us an annual average of $5,856,319. During the years 1745-6-7, when the country was flooded with the "better currency" of General Jackson's pet-bank system, when speculation and speculators in private as well as political circles had run mad, more than $48,000,000 of dollars were received, arising from the sales of the public land. Leaving out those three years, and then the average receipts of the remaining twelve of the last fifteen years, for public lands, is only $3,305,803. The Land Committee, of which I am a member, obtained from the Commissioners of the General Land Office, a report, dated the 22d of January last, from which it appears that up to the 1st day of January of the present year the whole number of acres of public land sold by the government, amounted to 99, 295,661 acres, and that the amount, of purchase money received therefor was $137,358,274. The Commissioner reports the sums paid for the public lands to France, to Spain, to Indians, and for surveying and selling, &c., at 9,525,019; leaving an apparent balance in favor of the government of $56,833,255. The interest account however on the expenditures of the government, is very defective—so that it is a doubtful question, if interest were properly calculated and added to the principal, whether, up to this day, after more than fifty years sales of the richest vacant domain on earth, the government has yet been indemnified for its expenditures and interest upon them. In view of all these facts in reference to the operations of our land system, there is not the least reason to suppose that we can even get enough from the sales of the vacant and unappropriated lands in California and New Mexico, to pay the interest on our money invested in this stock, much less a reimbursement of the principal.—Every day we continue the war, this account becomes worse and worse on our side; and of this fact the President and his advisers seem to be sensible, for they have changed their policy in conducting the war, and now say—Mexico shall be taxed, and forced to contribute the means of her own subjugation.

The President, after speaking of the kind manner in which he had directed our commanders to treat the Mexican people, with a view to prevent the body of the Mexican population from taking up arms against us, says, "Not appreciating our forbearance, the Mexican people, generally, became hostile to the United States, and availed themselves of every opportunity to commit the most savage excesses upon our troops." After mentioning how they "robbed and murdered," the President says, "The Mexicans, having thus shown themselves to be wholly incapable of appreciating our forbearance, and liberality, it was deemed proper to change the manner of conducting the war, by making them feel its pressure, according to the usages observed under similar circumstances, by all other civilized nations." How were they to be made to "feel?" By taking their property for the support of the army, without paying for it, and by levying contributions or taxes, is the answer. This ten regiment bill has been denominated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, a "wise financial measure," inasmuch as it will enable us to conquer the mines of Mexico, and collect contributions.

The first remark I shall make upon this new policy of making Mexico pay money through the instrumentality of our army, is, that it seems to contradict that part of the message which says, "Mexico has no money to pay." If we can force some four or five millions of dollars from her, annually, by an army of tax-gatherers, she certainly, with a little patience on our part, could pay our individual claims in cash; and consequently, the "doctrine of no territory" is not necessarily the "doctrine of no indemnity." The Secretary of the Treasury contemplates four sources of revenue in Mexico: first, seizing supplies without paying for them; second, duties on imports; third, duties upon exports; and fourth, the seizure and appropriation of all the internal revenues of Mexico, except transit duties, which are to be abolished. But how much money, with the help of the army, can be collected from these sources, the Secretary seems to have great difficulties in estimating. He says, it will depend upon future contingencies.

"If" says the Secretary, "our armies are withdrawn from the capital and ports of Mexico, nothing would be received from such contributions. If they were withdrawn from the capital, retaining the ports, no safe trade could be carried on with the interior, and to the restricted, precarious system of the customs, existing two months ago, a very small revenue would be derived from this source, as shown by past experience—probably not exceeding $1,000,000 per annum. If, however, the ports at present occupied by our forces be retained, and all the rest seized or blockaded, so as to prevent the carrying of imports into the interior, through any other ports than those held by our forces; if the roads were then open to the interior, through the city of Mexico and the mining region, and the whole country rendered secure, it is my conviction that the revenue from all these sources above specified ought not to be less, so far as the duties on exports and imports are concerned, than has heretofore been collected by the government of Mexico."

After all these "if's," the Secretary has left us entirely in the dark as to the sum we may expect from Mexican taxation, and after various statements, winds up by telling us,

"Under these circumstances, it is impossible to name any precise sum as that which probably would be derived from military contributions in Mexico."

No one could expect a "precise sum" to be named by the Secretary; but I should have been gratified had he ventured a guess with his superior information. But what are we to do, in order to get something more than we have heretofore obtained from Mexico? According to the Secretary's suggestions, we are to hold all conquests already made, go on with other conquests, open roads and keep open communications, and then, all this being done, the Secretary is only convinced that we ought to receive (not that we would,) not less than Mexico has heretofore collected, "so far as the duties on exports and imports are concerned." I cannot give my vote for this bill as a financial measure, upon such uncertainties. Well, sir, I have turned my attention to General Scott's orders, in execution of the plans of the President, for collecting revenues in Mexico. His total levy upon the nineteen or twenty states of Mexico has been $9,679,954, and he proceeds to apportion it among the several states in proportion, I suppose, to some rule of population or wealth, or both combined. He thus requires, Mexico, state and federal district, to pay $668,332, the state of Puebla to pay $424,276, and so of the rest, making up the aggregate. General Scott's object seems to be, to seize the fourth source of Mexican revenue, mentioned by the Secretary. His assessments upon the several states, are to take effect from the time they are severally occupied by the army. In addition to the $3,020,970, the General continues for the use of his military chest, the duties on the production, melting, assaying and coining the precious metals. Now, the whole revenue thus proposed to be levied by General Scott, cannot greatly exceed, if it reaches $4,000,000. Suppose duties on imports and exports would go to $6,000,000 per annum, about twelve times as much, I believe, as we have heretofore received, and suppose we levy, by foraging the country, get $5,000,000 more. By these means we should collect a total of $15,000,000, about the amount of Mexican revenue, according to Mr. Poinsett, in her most prosperous days. Can any one expect greater success than this? I do not believe we shall get one-fifth part of it; but suppose we get the whole, how then will the account stand? I can answer from the laws upon your statute books. You appropriated for the support of your army for the fiscal year, ending on the 30th of June, 1845, $3,803,375 39. This was the last fiscal year of peace, immediately preceding the commencement of hostilities. You appropriated for the support of the army for the fiscal year, ending on the 30th June, 1848, $32,108,161 88. Thus the difference between your peace appropriation for the support of the army, and the appropriation for the first entire fiscal year of the war, is $28,967,084 49. At this rate, if you could get $15,000,000 annually from Mexico, to help sustain your army, you would still have to supply, for that branch of the service alone, by loans or taxes, $13,965,086 49, annually, more than was spent in time of peace. Does not every body see national bankruptcy, or heavy taxation staring us in the face, unless we put an end to this state of things.

But, sir, on what machinery does General Scott rely, to collect his Mexican taxes—what agencies does he intend to employ? Let me read you what he says on the subject:

"The Governors and members of the Legislatures in the different States, and collecting officers now in commission, and heretofore charged with the collection of the Federal dues of any kind, will be individually held responsible in their persons and property, for the collection and full payment of this assessment, one half monthly, &c."

And again he says:

"On the failure of any state to pay its assessment, its functionaries, as above, will be seized and imprisoned, and their property seized, registered, reported and converted to the use of the Occupation (Army,) in strict accordance to the general regulations of this army. No resignation or abdication of office by any of the said Mexican functionaries, shall excuse one of them from any of the above obligations or penalties."

In what volume of the laws of nations, shall we find any thing to justify such orders as these? In what history of the most renowned conquerors, savage or civilized, shall we find precedents for proceedings like these? We invade and overrun a foreign country, and then say to its governors, legislators and officers, you shall go and collect taxes for us, from month to month, and year to year, and if you dare refuse, we will send your bodies to dungeons, and confiscate your property. No resignation or abdication, shall save you! In our own history, this capital has been occupied by our enemies. Should it occur again, are we willing to have the laws we prescribe to Mexico applied to ourselves? Speak, ye Senators, and tell me, which among you, at the order of an invader, to save your property and escape a jail, would be induced to assume the office of tax-gatherer for the enemy? Sir, there is no patriot, there is no man who has a spirit, who would thus degrade himself to the scorn and contempt of his own fellow-citizens. It is not the speeches we make here, which induces the Mexicans to proclaim, "Death to the Yankees, without mercy," as General Pearce may suppose; but it is the conduct of this administration of ours. If these new principles are interpolated in the code of nations, there will be an end throughout the civilized world of those rules, courtesy, chivalry, magnanimity, and mutual respect, which have heretofore, greatly alleviated the horrors of war; and deadly hate, plunder, and extermination, will be the result. Instead of whig speeches, aggravating the bitterness and vengeance of Mexican hostility, they must have directly the contrary effect; because they will convince Mexico, that all sense of justice, and all respect for the rules of civilized warfare, have not yet entirely departed from among us.

I think I have proved that a pecuniary indemnity for the expenses of the war, is an impossibility. What security do we want for the future? We have that in our strength, and in the capacity which the army has exhibited to achieve victories and overcome obstacles. The army has manifested a capacity which has astonished us. In that, there is cause of exultation, and in the prowess of our army and navy we have security. Does the President wish Mexico bound over to keep the peace, and to enter into bonds with Great Britain or France as surety? If that is his meaning by "security for the future," I shall leave it to the President to take the preliminary oath. As for myself and Kentuckians, we cannot swear that we are afraid.

A few more words, and I have done. In prosecuting this war, we have lost about five thousand officers and soldiers, in killed and wounded. We have lost a great many more by the climate of Mexico, and other causes. For this loss there is no indemnity. If we continue this war, losses in the death of officers and soldiers will continue.

I believe the annexation of any considerable portion of the Mexican population to our country would be a lasting curse. What, then, ought we to do, in the difficulties which surround us? My opinion is, that this Congress ought to declare, by resolution, what we require of Mexico. I would say to her, you must pay every cent you justly owe our citizens; you must and shall refrain from future spoliations; you have committed many faults, you must reform; you may pay us what you owe, in money if you can; if not, we will take the bay of San Francisco and the country around it, and to our Oregon line, if you prefer to give it. That bay will be valuable to us as a naval power, and worthless to you. I would assume a defensive line, including such territory as would secure the claims of our citizens, and say to Mexico, this we intend to hold a reasonable time, to enable you to do us justice; and if you will not, then we shall permanently appropriate it. If any Senator who sustains the administration will introduce resolutions based upon the principles stated, I shall rejoice to vote with him in their support. I know it is useless for me, or any one on this side, to move in the matter.

I shall vote against the bill, because Mexico is already conquered, and we shall have no more battles of consequence to fight, and because I am opposed to raising armies for the purpose of collecting taxes in a foreign country. The taxes to be collected would not support the ten regiments, if raised. Were I not exhausted, I would speak of the irresponsible and dangerous power which the President is exercising, through the army and navy, in his attempts to appropriate the revenues of Mexico, without law, and at his own discretion. But I must desist.

If my advice is disregarded, as I suppose it will be; if this bill is passed, and if, in addition, you call for more volunteers, as a citizen, I shall obey your laws. It is a part of my creed to submit to the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed, and to endeavor to carry it out. As a legislator, it is my province to oppose the adoption of measures which I believe to be injurious; but when adopted, acquiescence and a fair trial of them, is the duty of us all. Upon these grounds I have heretofore invited volunteers to your standard, in public speeches. I shall vote for all supplies to sustain the existing establishment, but will not enlarge the army, which, with the forces in the field, and those authorized to be raised under existing laws, exceeds 60,000 men.

I have endeavored to exhibit the dangers of our present position, the erroneous executive action which brought us into difficulties, and I have reasoned against a career of conquest and annexation. If the people will not arrest such a career, we shall see whether destiny or fate conducts us to universal empire, or with a whirlwind of anarchy rends and scatters in irrecoverable fragments the political edifice of American liberty.

Mr. TURNEY took the floor, and on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, requesting to be informed whether "any taxes, duties, or imposts" have been "laid and collected" upon goods and merchandize belonging to citizens of the United States, exported by such citizens from the United States to Mexico, and if so, what is the rate of such duties and what amount has been collected, and also by what authority of law the same has been laid and collected," I refer the Senate to my annual message of 7th December last, in which I informed Congress that orders had been given to our military and naval commanders in Mexico, to adopt the policy, as far as practicable, of levying military contributions upon the enemy for the support of our army.

As one of the modes adopted for levying such contributions, it was stated in that message that—"On the 31st of March last I caused an order to be issued to our military and naval commanders to levy and collect a military contribution upon all vessels and merchandize which might enter any of the ports of Mexico in our military occupation, and to apply such contributions towards defraying the expenses of the war.—By virtue of the right of conquest and the laws of war, the conqueror, consulting his own safety or convenience, may either exclude foreign commerce altogether from all such ports, or permit it upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe. Before the principal ports of Mexico were blockaded by our navy, the revenue derived from import duties, under the laws of Mexico, was paid into the Mexican treasury. After these ports had fallen into our military possession, the blockade was raised, and commerce with them permitted upon prescribed terms and conditions. They were opened to the trade of all nations upon the payment of duties more moderate in their amount than those which had been previously levied by Mexico; and the revenue, which was formerly paid into the Mexican treasury, was directed to be collected by our military and naval officers, and applied to the use of our army and navy. Care was taken that the officers, soldiers, and sailors of our army and navy should be exempted from the operations of the order; and as the merchandise imported upon which the order operated must be consumed by Mexican citizens, the contributions exacted were, in effect, the seizure of the public revenues of Mexico, and the application of them to our own use. In directing this measure, the object was to compel the enemy to contribute, as far as practicable, towards the expenses of the war."

A copy of the order referred to, with the documents accompanying it, has been communicated to Congress. The order operated upon the vessels and merchandize of all nations, whether belonging to citizens of the United States or to foreigners, arriving in any of the ports in Mexico in our military occupation. The contributions levied were a tax upon Mexican citizens, who were the consumers of the merchandize imported. But for the permit or license granted by the order, all vessels and merchandize belonging to citizens of the United States were necessarily excluded from all commerce with Mexico, from the commencement of the war. The coasts and ports of Mexico were ordered to be placed under blockade on the day Congress declared the war to exist, and by the laws of nations, the blockade applied to the vessels of the United States as well as to the vessels of all other nations. Had no blockade been declared, or had any of our merchant-vessels entered any of the ports of Mexico not blockaded, they would have been liable to be seized and condemned as lawful prize by the Mexican authorities. When the order was issued, it operated as a privilege to the vessels of the United States, as well as to those of foreign countries, to enter the ports held by our arms upon prescribed terms and conditions. It was altogether optional with citizens of the United States and foreigners to avail themselves of the privileges granted upon the terms prescribed. Citizens of the United States and foreigners have availed themselves of these privileges.

No principle is better established than that a nation at war has the right of shifting the burden off itself and upon it on the enemy, by exacting military contributions. The mode of making such exactions must be left to the discretion of the conqueror, but it should be exercised in a manner conformable to the rules of civilized warfare. The right to levy these contributions is essential to the successful prosecution of war in an enemy's country, and the practice of nations has been in accordance with this principle. It is as clearly necessary as the right to fight battles, and its exercise is often essential to the subsistence of the army.

Entertaining no doubt that the military right, to exclude commerce altogether from the ports of the enemy in our military occupation, included the minor right, of admitting it under prescribed conditions, it became an important question at the date of the order, whether there should be a discrimination between vessels and cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States, and vessels and cargoes belonging to neutral nations.

Had the vessels and cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States been admitted without the payment of any duty while a duty was levied on foreign vessels and cargoes, the object of the order would have been defeated. The whole commerce would have been conducted in American vessels—no contributions could have been collected, and the enemy would have been furnished with goods without the exaction from him of any contribution whatever, and would have been thus benefitted by our military occupation, instead of being made to feel the evils of the war. In order to levy these contributions and to make them available for the support of the army, it became, therefore, absolutely necessary that they should be collected upon imports into Mexican ports, whether in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States or to foreigners.

It was deemed proper to extend the privilege to vessels and their cargoes belonging to neutral nations. It has been my policy since the commencement of the war with Mexico, to act justly and liberally towards all neutral nations, and to afford to them no just cause of complaint, and we have seen the good consequences of this policy by the general satisfaction which it has given.

In answer to the enquiry contained in the resolution as to the rates of duties imposed, I refer you to the documents which accompanied my annual message of the 7th of December last, which contain the information.

From the accompanying reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, it will be seen that the contributions have been collected on all vessels and cargoes, whether American or foreign, but the returns to the Departments do not show with exactness the amounts collected on American as distinguishable from foreign vessels and merchandize.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, February 10, 1848.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeable to law, accompanied by returns of the Militia of the United States, with their arms, accoutrements and ammunition.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE presented a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Illinois in favor of an act granting indemnity to the citizens of that State who suffered by Indian depredations during the Black Hawk war in 1831 and 1832, which were ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the memorial of Richard M. Johnson, praying compensation for the buildings erected at his expense, for the use of the Choctaw Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a petition of citizens of Milton in the State of Florida, praying that the public lands may be divided in equal proportions for the free use of the citizens of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER presented the memorial of Hezekiah L. Thistle, representing that injustice has been done him by the Commissioner of Patents in granting to a subsequent applicant a patent for an invention claimed by him, and praying that the Commissioner may be directed by law, to issue a patent to him for said invention; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CLAYTON said: I have the honor to present the memorial of Passed-Mid. Rogers, asking compensation for losses and injuries received in the service of his country. His memorial is couched in terms as modest and unassuming as they are respectful to Congress, and glances at the leading incidents of an eventful story of daring enterprise and heroic fortitude, in captivity and distress, to which there can scarcely be found a parallel in the annals of the war. I shall ask of the Senate that this memorial be printed, in order that he may have the full benefit of his own statement; and I now propose to make a few remarks in relation to the claim which he presents, for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the members of it, to the facts of the case, because I suppose that is the committee to whom the memorial may most appropriately be referred. This young officer was one of the daring few who, in the month of November, 1814, were distinguished for cutting out and destroying the Mexican barque, "Creole," then moored under the guns and fastened to the walls of the fortress of St. Juan d'Ulloa. Subsequently to the destruction of that vessel, the naval commander under whom Mr. Rogers served, was desirous that a reconnoisance should be made of the localities in the vicinity of Vera Cruz, as well for the purpose of aiding a land attack as of destroying the enemy's depot of ammunition, and this young sailor volunteered with a few others—a small boat's crew—to perform this dangerous service. On three successive nights this small party penetrated the dense chapparel in the neighborhood of the city of Vera Cruz, made a complete reconnoisance of all the objects of importance which they were sent to examine, and afterwards reported complete drawings of the localities around the city, which were held by General Worth to be of great value, as he occupied, in the investment of the city, the particular spot which was the subject of this investigation. It was during this reconnoisance, on the last night of it, that Mr. Rogers was captured by a band of Mexican guards; and his capture was undoubtedly owing to his own generous impulse in saving a brother officer. On that occasion he narrowly escaped death at the moment of his capture, in consequence of the exasperated feelings of the Mexicans consequent on the destruction of the "Creole." He was carried that night to prison in Vera Cruz, where he remained four days and nights without sustenance, in a cell verminous, filthy and damp, where the only intelligence that reached him was, that he had been condemned to death as a spy, by a civil tribunal, the sole evidence offered before it being to the effect, that he was the leader of the party engaged in cutting out and destroying the "Creole." He then remained in constant expectation of death for many weeks, and when, as he thought, his death-summons was coming, his only answer to it was the request, that he might avoid the Mexican mode of killing a man behind his back, and meet death as an American, who could look it in the face. He remained in that state of suspense for a long period; his imprisonment at Vera Cruz lasting for three months. For some reason the bloody sentence which had been recorded against him, was never executed, and a military commission was ordered to sit upon his case. When Gen. Scott was advancing to invest Vera Cruz, Mr. Rogers was marched on foot from that city to Perote, and confined in the noxious cells of that fortress. As the American army advanced into Mexico, he was again removed and conveyed to Puebla. All his property had been lost in the wreck of the Somers, and that which was conferred upon him by the hand of friendship or charity was taken from him by the robbers; whilst his life was at the same time in constant peril from the excited state of public feeling against our countrymen. At a short distance from Puebla the incensed rabble stoned him, and on that occasion, also, he narrowly escaped death. Owing to this excited state of public feeling, his guard was compelled to remain with him within a league of Puebla till midnight, lest he should be torn to pieces by the exasperated populace in the city. When taken to Puebla, in so great peril was he, that the foreign residents of that state interceded in his behalf, and obtained an order for his removal to the city of Mexico. In rags and wretchedness he was marched to the capital, where he remained a prisoner until intelligence of the battle of Cerro Gordo arrived, when General Santa Anna, the hero of the Alamo, ordered his victim to be conveyed still further into the interior. Knowing that death would be the consequence of that removal, he made a successful effort to escape. Always in infinite peril, he made his way in Mexican disguise, being often subjected to examination from bands of guerillas and Mexican guards, until he reached the plains which led him to Puebla, where General Scott was preparing with his victorious army to advance upon the city of Mexico. From his knowledge of the localities in the neighborhood of Mexico, and the numbers and condition of the Mexican forces, Mr. Rogers was now enabled to give valuable information to the Commander-in-Chief; and his character for courage and intelligence being well known, he was employed as a volunteer aid-de-camp by General Pillow, and in all the bloody actions which succeeded he was distinguished as amongst the bravest of the brave. The despatches of the commanding general, whose aid he was, fully attest his character for skill and gallantry, and recommend him in the strongest terms to the notice of the Commander-in-Chief, bestowing upon him as high eulogiums as on any other officer of his division. Engaged in all the other actions in the field, Mr. Rogers was particularly distinguished for his conduct, as his brother-officers relate, in the storming of Chepultepec, where he was one of the seven who first mounted the walls of that fortress, and planted the standard of his country over "the Halls of the Montezumas." The sailor has now returned from the wars, but no brevet commission awaits him, because the deck was not the field of his fame. He has earned his laurels upon the land, but although promotion may not attend him for the service which he performed upon land, his claims for justice are strengthened by this service; and the only object which I have in view on this occasion, is to commend his claims for sheer justice to the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think that a stronger case could scarcely be presented for the consideration of an American Congress. I do not undertake to point out the mode or measure of redress which the case demands. I leave that to the ability, the patriotism, the benevolence of the gentlemen of the Military Committee. We all unite in commendation of those of our countrymen who have been distinguished in this war. We are accustomed to rejoice over the achievements of our countrymen in Mexico, without reference to party distinctions. When the gallant dead are brought from Mexico to their home, we follow the hearse, "the war horse and the muffled drum," and unite in signifying to the world that the whole nation sorrows for the fallen. I hope that the same feeling which is so successfully invoked in behalf of the memory of the gallant dead, may be manifested to the living, and that when the pensioner shall return from Mexico—the crippled and war-worn soldier—claiming his dues, we shall be ready to award to them just compensation for the services which they have rendered to their country. I hope it may never be said of us,

> "How proud they can press to the funeral array
> Of him whom they shunned in his sickness and sorrow;
> And loathful now scrape the last blanket to-day
> Whose pall shall be borne by subscription to-morrow!"

I move that the memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The reference to the committee was then unanimously ordered.

Mr. HALE.—The other day a memorial was presented by the honorable Senator from Ohio (Mr. CORWIN) in favor of peace, and the Senate, as I understand, on the score of economy, refused to allow it to be printed. On a subsequent day, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. DAVIS) presented a memorial coming from the large and highly respectable body of Friends in the New England States, very brief and respectful, praying that measures might be taken to bring about a speedy peace. It was also refused to print that memorial, on the ground of expense. I hope that the same rule will be applied to those memorials which ask for action in favor of war, or of those who have performed what are styled meritorious services in war. I hope that we will show some uniformity of action in regard to this matter; so that if those memorials asking for action which seems to imply approbation of the principles avowed in them in favor of the war, be printed, the Senate will not refuse the same measure of justice to memorials which come not from private individuals, but large bodies of christians, asking the government to do something towards the restoration of peace. For this reason I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of printing this memorial.

Mr. TURNEY.—I think it is necessary to take in this instance the course which has been heretofore adopted in similar cases.—I move a reference to the Committee on Printing.

The reference was, of course, ordered, the rule requiring it if one member object.

FORTIFICATION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a fortification at Proctor's Landing on Lake Borgne in the State of Louisiana.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill of the Senate entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of a register or enrolment to the schooner Robert Henry."

The House of Representatives have appointed JOHN W. HOUSTON, of Delaware, LUCIUS B. PECK, of Vermont, the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the absence of Mr. HAMPTON and Mr. ROBINSON.

THANKS TO GENERALS SCOTT AND TAYLOR.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott and the troops under his command for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847; and the joint resolutions from the House of Representatives of thanks to Major General Taylor, reported them without amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Caldwell, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

CLAIMS FOR LOSSES IN THE FLORIDA WAR.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill providing for the obtaining of testimony in relation to claims for losses sustained in the late Florida war; which was read and passed to the second reading.

FOREIGN FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the subject, reported a bill for giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments, for the apprehension and delivery up of certain offenders; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. DAYTON remarked that as it was desirable that speedy action should be had upon this bill, he would avail himself of the earliest opportunity which might be presented for calling it up.

JOHN P. BALDWIN.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John P. Baldwin, submitted a report accompanied by a bill, for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

FLORIDA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. YULEE, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the payment of certain companies of Florida Volunteers; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL STAFF.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That a message be sent to the House of Representatives to request the return of the bill for an increase of the medical staff of the army for a limited time.

THANKS TO GENERAL SCOTT.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott, and the troops under his command, for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time, by unanimous consent, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. HALE.—I have no disposition to trespass on the attention of the Senate, but I cannot suffer the question to be taken without expressing the grounds of my opposition to the passage of this resolution. In doing so I have no object in view except to manifest consistent opposition to the war in all its phases—in all its aspects—and in whatever way it can be presented. I feel constrained to record my vote against the passage of this resolution, because I cannot, by any possibility, by any sophistry, separate in my mind a vote of thanks to those officers for the agency which they have had in the war, from an approval of the war in which they are engaged. I do not propose, at this time, to repeat to the Senate my convictions as to the character of the war I assume I have already sufficiently expressed those convictions. I propose briefly to vindicate the propriety of the course which I propose to take upon this occasion. Let me invite the attention of the Senate to a proceeding parallel to this which occurred in the British Parliament, on a proposition to thank the officers engaged in the American war for the services, which they had rendered to the mother country against the people of the colonies. By reference to the "British Annual Register," we find that on the 27th of November 1781, a motion was made in the House of Commons that the thanks of the House should be given to Sir Henry Clinton, Knight of the Bath, for the important services rendered by him and troops under his command, in the reduction of Charlestown; and that the thanks of that house should also be given to earl Cornwallis, for the signal and meritorious services he had done to his country, by the most glorious victory obtained by him over the American rebels at Camden.

[illegible] motion, as original [illegible] other amendments, be [illegible] condition of that American war. A [illegible] country. He had con- [illegible] signal [illegible] services to his ma- [illegible] and conse- quently should withhold his thanks and gratitude, where he did not think them wanted, in a word [illegible]

On this motion Mr. Fox addressed the House, and I beg to read a short extract from the report of the debate:

[illegible] war; he condemned the conduct of the war in question, but he made a distinction between thanks and praise. He might abhor the principle of the war, but he could not suppose the intention from the action; they were united in his mind; there they formed one whole, and he would not attempt to divide them. He would not vote the thanks of the House to any general [illegible] acts of England were in such [illegible]

It seems to me that that is the only consistent course of action for those who disapprove of this war, in all its stages and aspects, and in every possible way in which it can be presented. I hold that that is the only consistent ground for those who maintain that this war has been wrong in its beginning, wrong in its prosecution, wrong in the objects to which it looks, and wrong in the means by which it is hoped to attain those objects. Entertaining such a view of duty on this occasion, I cannot give thanks to any body for any agency in this war, except such agency as tends to bring it to an immediate termination. Any judicious efforts, here or elsewhere, to bring this war to a close—to a speedy and honorable close, will command my earnest and most cordial thanks; but I have no thanks to offer those who have been employed in the prosecution of a war which I believe to be thus unjust from its commencement. Nor can I accede to another proposition which I have heard maintained with a good deal of energy here and elsewhere—that an officer of the army or navy has no discretion—that he is a mere machine of the administration—that it is to say "go" and he goeth; "come" and he cometh, without attaching to himself any share of moral responsibility for the character of the transaction in which he is engaged. I do no believe in any such doctrine. I do not believe that officers of the army or navy are such machines, and that by receiving commissions in either service, they divest themselves of all responsibility for the character of the transactions in which which they may be engaged in pursuance of the orders which they receive. There is one bright page in the history of the English army, which I think might, with great propriety, be commended to the thoughtful consideration of every gentleman who thus represents the officers of the army as irresponsible machines. It is found in the history of the Earl of Effingham, a distinguished officer of the British army, and a member of the House of Peers. He was the colonel of a regiment in the British service, when he received orders to join the army about to embark for America, and fight the rebels at Charleston and Camden. His conduct on that occasion was worthy of all commendation; and would to God that we had had some one who inheriting a portion of his spirit, when the order of this administration was issued, directing the advance of the troops to the Rio Grande, would have followed so illustrious an example! The story is briefly told in the "Annual Register" for the year 1776, and with the indulgence of the Senate, I will read it:

"The Earl of Effingham, whose [illegible] genius had led him when a youth into the army at a time [illegible] to try in theory [illegible] whatever real service was to be [illegible] a volunteer in the war between the Russians and Turks, had since his return, as a peer in parliament, uniformly opposed the whole system of measures pursued against the Americans, and finding, at length, that the regiment in which he served was intended for the American service, thought it inconsistent with his character, and unbecoming of his dignity, to enforce measures with his sword, which he had so utterly condemned in his legislative capacity. He accordingly wrote a letter of resignation to the Secretary at war, in which having declared the cheerfulness with which he would sacrifice life and fortune in support of the safety, honour and dignity of his Majesty, [illegible] he observed, that the same principles [illegible] with the [illegible] sentiments of duty and affection [illegible] which [illegible] people of [illegible] which form the best security for their fidelity and obedience to his government. [illegible] [illegible] modification, at being called to such service, [illegible] that [illegible] for many ages, in the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] intention [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] reputation of this country abroad? And, yet, such are the sentiments of the gentleman from New Hampshire. I solemnly believe that General Taylor, more perhaps than any other single individual in this country, is entitled to our thanks for saving the lives not only of his own troops, but the lives of those sent on this expedition. Every battle that was fought, it seems to me, resulted almost in a miraculous escape from the overwhelming disaster which seemed to be impending over our army. If he had failed at Buena Vista, it is almost certain that the troops under command of General Scott would have been destroyed by the Mexican hosts which surrounded them; and I yet am told that those who saved the lives of our troops—who went forth under our national flag are by the solemn judgment of the Senate to be condemned because when ordered to pass into the enemy's country, with craven indifference to honor—in traitorous violation of their duty—they did not retire and give up their commissions! Yes, the gentleman would have had those officers to resign in the face of the enemy. I believe his doctrine goes so far, and that it would be consistent with his notions, that the officers and men should receive pay whilst they are guarding garrisons, but retire the moment that the order to encounter the perils of war was issued. According to his idea, they are to be judges of the justice and propriety of the war. I do not know, however, that the ideas which the gentleman has just now expressed, are at all different from some which I heard the other day, and to which I shall now take the opportunity to advert. The very first remark which I heard from that gentleman in this Senate-house, was to maintain that whilst science in adventurous experiment was soaring to heaven, and making discoveries in the bowels of the earth, refuting the Mosaic cosmogony, he was not allowed to present memorials on your table for the suicide of this confederacy. Such was the doctrine then maintained by the gentleman—that he was forbidden to present, on your table, memorials and petitions which, if they had been acted upon, would have resulted in the immediate infamous suicide of this confederacy. What did the gentleman then maintain? Nothing at all different from that which he now asserts:—that one portion of this confederacy should have the liberty of presenting memorials of that kind, to alter the Constitution, so that one portion of the confederacy should be deprived of those guarantees under which it entered the Union. I recollect one of the remarks made by the gentleman on that occasion, and I hope he will pardon me for quoting his classic language. He said that he had learned in yankee school-books not only to spell words but to understand their meaning. I believe he said that so far as regards one portion of the confederacy —at least that was the tendency of his remarks—it should be put under ban of the condemnation of the other; and that it was correct in a representative of the federal government—I mean the Secretary of State—to protest against the interference of British power so far as it affected only that portion of the confederacy. Let me ask him, suppose the proposition had been made to introduce slaves into New Hampshire to the exclusion of others, and to settle the Maine boundary with a view to do so, would he or would he not have invoked the federal powers to protect that portion of the confederacy? But perhaps, sir, I am now going beyond the legitimate limits of the present question. I protest against this attempt to cast contumely and reproach upon the officers and soldiers who have obeyed the orders of this government, and who deserve the lasting approbation of the country.

Mr. CASS.—As it appears to be probable that this discussion may be prolonged, and the hour for taking up the special order has already passed, I move that the resolution be passed by informally.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Oh! no. Let it be acted upon now.'

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. CALHOUN, (in his seat.)—Let it be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his motion?

Mr. CASS.—I believe not, Mr. President. I think I must adhere to it.

Mr. HALE.—I desire only to say a few words personal to myself.

Mr. CASS.—If the Senator desires to make a personal explanation, certainly I have no objection to withdrawing the motion.

Mr. HALE.—The honorable Senator from South Carolina says that I have undertaken to cast obliquy upon the officers of the American army. I certainly have said no such thing—I have intended no such thing. I said that the officers engaged in this war could never have my thanks. I could not thank them for anything they had done, because it was impossible. in my mind to separate the actors in the war from the war itself. Then, simply with the view of showing that I was not without precedent in my course, I referred to a fact in history, drawing no inferences whatever from it. The severe philipic which the honorable Senator has thought proper to pronounce upon the precedent which I have cited, must be directed against the honored statesmen who stood up in the Parliament of Great Britain, and maintained the cause of the American colonies—the cause of human liberty and human rights, against the arms of that power which was then endeavoring to crush the spirit of freedom, bursting into life in these colonies. I have not undertaken to mark out for a single individual the course he is to pursue on this floor in reference to this subject; nor do I ask any to follow that course which I myself adopt. But so long as I have the honor of occupying a place here, I must follow my convictions, let them lead me where they will. When I cannot follow my convictions, I will not come here. The honorable Senator has referred to some remarks which I made the other day, upon the occasion of presenting a memorial in reference to the subject to which he alluded. I think that the Senator undertook to characterize that memorial, and the course which I adopted on that occasion, in terms, which to say the least, if he had known all the facts, he would not have employed. What was the character of that memorial? Did it ask the Senate to transcend any of its acknowledged powers? No. It was a memorial drawn up by a society of professing Christians, who eschew the doctrine of the justifiable employment of physical force, and simply asked that the American government would use all the powers vested in them by the constitution, for the removal of that which they deemed to be an evil. The memorialists could not be heard. Their petition could not be received by an American Senate.

Mr. BUTLER.—I did not exactly allude to that part of it, and perhaps, indeed, I should ask pardon of the Senate for referring at all to what was not altogether germane to the immediate subject before it; but if I recollect right there was a memorial or paper of some kind asking an alteration of the constitution to enable them to interfere with that institution of the South. On another occasion, however, I may advert to this matter; and was betrayed into it now, from the circumstance that the gentleman on all subjects of this kind stands very much alone.

Mr. HALE.—I am quite willing to "stand alone," provided I stand on my convictions. I mean, sir, to vote as I talk. I do not come here to make a speech denouncing this war as unjust and unconstitutional, and then stultify myself by voting men and money to the President, to carry it on. My speeches and my votes shall be, at all events, consistent with each other. While I think as I do, I shall vote as I speak. I do not know but I may be alone in that; but whether it be so or not, I shall so act, and leave it to be said whether it is a reproach to me or others, that I am thus alone.—Permit me to say to that honorable Senator in all kindness, and with no disposition to be offensive, that he entirely mistakes and misapprehends the character of that portion of the American people whom I am supposed to represent on this subject. Once, for all, let me say, that we desire no interference with—nor disturbance of the existing institutions of the States. If the institution of which you speak be a blessing, bless yourselves with it; if it be a curse, stagger under it as you may let us remain free from it—let us alone.—It is all that we desire—all that we ask. And permit me to say that our efforts will not cease, our exertions will not weary until we have done what we can to relieve ourselves of any share of reproach or responsibility in respect to what we regard as a great and erying evil. We do not pretend to interfere with it, then, but we say, "keep it to yourselves!" Do not come here and ask us to tax people to the last point of endurance, to carry on an aggressive war for its prosecution, sustenance, and maintenance. Do not desire to go into our States, interfering with us there, and in claiming to preserve your institutions, disenfranchise us. We hear a great deal about the far-famed compromises of the constitution; but go into the State of New Hampshire, before a justice of the peace, with the certificate of any one claiming me as his slave, and you may drag me from the embraces of my family and all that I hold dear. The habeas corpus and trial by jury are in a moment trampled in the dust, and slavery rides omnipotent over all the guarantees of the constitution! It is from this that we ask to be relieved. We make no war upon you. That is all that we attempt, and so far as we are enabled to do so, we shall continue the attempt to maintain the integrity of our own constitution and our own institutions against these encroachments. Beyond that we have no desire to go. Beyond that have never gone. The Senator, then, entirely misunderstood the purport of the efforts made by me, if he gave them any other character. A single word in regard to the matter immediately before the Senate, and I have done. I think I cannot have been misunderstood when I said, that I did not characterize the acts of the officers of the army. I have spoken of the war in which they are engaged. I believe it to be unjust; and what would we have thought of the sincerity of the patriots in the British Parliament—of Chatham, for instance, whose manly eloquence was exerted in denouncing the aggressions upon the liberties of the colonies, if he had united in the vote of thanks to Cornwallis and Clinton? That is all that I have maintained. I believe this war to be unjust, and, therefore, I cannot vote for the thanks of Congress to be given to any one who has had any agency in the prosecution of that war.

Mr. ALLEN.—I move that this subject be passed by informally, and that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the special order.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. TURNEY.—Mr. President: I believe that speedy action on the bill now under consideration is of the highest importance to the country: and I would now cheerfully yield the floor if the vote could be taken immediately on that question. But as the discussion has become protracted, and a duty seems to be imposed upon all to state their views on the great subject involved in the bill, I deem it to be proper to submit to the consideration of the Senate and the country the sentiments and opinions which I entertain in reference to this subject.

In the first place, sir, I desire to express my cheerful assent to the most elaborate discussion of the question now before us. I find fault with no gentleman for the fullest expression of his opinions, although that expression of opinion may be calculated, in my judgment, to affect injuriously the interests of his country. If I believed, as Senators on this floor profess to believe, that this war is unjust and unconstitutional, I should unite with the Senators from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] and Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN.] I should take no middle course. Sir, I hold that no middle course can be taken. If our country be in the wrong in this war; if the war has been unconstitutionally waged, for the attainment of the ambitious views of the Executive,—patriotism, justice, every consideration, demand that the war should be stopped. In such a case, I should certainly unite with the gentleman from New Hampshire in the declaration that I could give no vote of thanks to individuals engaged in the prosecution of the war for the purposes of robbery and plunder. I should feel that those who were engaged in fighting the battles of the country in such a war were to be regarded in the light of the midnight assassin, who seeks, through bloodshed, to seize upon his plunder, and that every genuine lover of his country was bound to arrest the progress of such a war.

But I differ altogether from the views which these gentlemen have expressed; and I think that, entertaining such views, their policy is by no means consistent—they should bring this war to a close. This leads me to the inquiry, not the details of this bill, or the character of the troops to be raised, but directly in regard to the justice of the war.

In the consideration of this question, I must call the attention of the Senate and the country to one important fact. When the bill recognizing the existence of this war was before this body, we did not hear, from any quarter in this chamber, that the war would be unjust. We heard from no Senator that the war grew out of the removal of the army from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande. Not a syllable of complaint was uttered in relation to that question; and yet then, I contend, was the proper time at which it should have been brought up. I am surprised that Senators did not then take that ground of opposition to the bill declaring that war existed by the act of Mexico. Was there a single individual here then, who believed that there was a possibility, by any legislative action of ours, to raise troops, and convey them to the Rio Grande in season to reinforce General Taylor, and relieve him from the dangerous condition in which it was supposed he was placed? Did any gentleman then suppose that the troops would arrive in time to relieve General Taylor? He was at Fort Brown, surrounded by the Mexican army, and having at his depot only a small quantity of provisions. He was without the means of subsistence for more than a few days. He was of necessity obliged to seek supplies, and, in order to do so, to encounter the enemy in the open field. Did any Senator believe that it was possible for the government, by any legislative action, to raise an additional military force, and convey them to the Rio Grande in time to render any aid in extricating Gen. Taylor from his then dangerous condition, as it appeared to be? No gentleman entertained such an idea. A motion was made to strike out the preamble, and reasons were assigned for striking it out, but no such reason as that we had invaded the Mexican territory. Far from it, as I will be able to show, conclusively, from the documents. The reason assigned was, the uncertainty as to the fact whether war did, in point of fact, exist.

Well, we are now engaged in war; and as it is, as I shall maintain, a just war, I hold that it ought to be prosecuted to the utmost. A great deal of complaint has been made because the war has not been brought to a close. Is it, I ask, in the power of this government to bring the war to a close, in an honorable manner, securing to the country the great objects for which it has been prosecuted? I am of opinion that the war would long since have been brought to a close but for our own divisions. If the whole American people could have thought alike in relation to this war, and the objects of its prosecution, we should long since have had it brought to a close. Our divisions, and the knowledge of them on the part of the Mexican government, have protracted this war.—Mexico sees a powerful party in the United States arrayed against the war, and she is thus encouraged to persist in her obstinacy, in the hope that, eventually, she may obtain such a treaty as she desires. And here let me ask, what sort of a treaty would that be, which those who oppose the war could consistently accept?

It is natural that men should differ about almost every subject submitted to the consideration of the human mind; but it is rather singular that difference of opinion should be confined to strict party lines. We all united here in voting the men and money demanded by the Executive for the prosecution of the war at the last session of Congress. Then our cause was admitted to be just; but after some progress is made, we find ourselves divided in opinion, not in regard to the manner in which the war should be prosecuted, not in regard to the mode in which it had been so far conducted, but in relation to its origin, its causes, and its objects; and this division of opinion corresponded exactly to party lines. I am free to confess, that in the contemplation of such a state of things, there is almost enough to shatter confidence in the stability and perpetuity of our free institutions and form of government. If this were the first time that we witnessed division of opinion, and that, too, upon questions connected with our foreign relations, I should almost be tempted to say that the days of republic were numbered. But we are not left without hope, even in the midst of this divided state of public opinion. In the struggle for independence, there was great division of popular sentiment, and again, in the war of 1812, a similar divided state of public opinion existed, and that, too, according to strict party lines. We all know the effect of such a course upon the enemy. They see us divided amongst ourselves. They are thus led to entertain hopes which otherwise they would not for a moment cherish. Especially does this division of sentiment operate to our disadvantage, when it is known by the enemy that, according to our system of government, our rulers have to be selected every four years, and that that period is now rapidly approaching. The enemy is thus encouraged to cherish strong hopes of obtaining a more advantageous settlement after the Presidential election, which they suppose may introduce another party into power in the administration of public affairs. We heard the other day from my colleague that party was a tyrant. That was a true and just remark. We have seen it exemplified in our own State. Previous to the appearance of the letters of the distinguished statesmen of New York and of Kentucky in opposition to annexation, I believe there was not a single individual of either party opposed to that measure; not only so, but, in my opinion, the feelings of all members of both parties in that section in the country were engaged in favor of the measure. Yet, notwithstanding this state of feeling, such was the power, such the tyranny, of party and party discipline, that in the latter State a majority of the people were induced to cast their votes in favor of the man who opposed it, and against the man who advocated it. This they did, not in accordance with their own judgment or feelings, but under the iron rod of this tyrant party and party discipline.

But that might be regarded as a question merely of expediency—one, to be sure, involving the great interests and prosperity of the country, but not equal in importance to that now under consideration. The present question has a totally different aspect; and I think that in the course of the argument presented by my colleague, he admitted that he and I agreed as to the vote which we should give on it, when we left our constituents. He informs us that he came here with the expectation of voting the men and money necessary to carry on the war. I think that in so voting, he would have voted in accordance with the views of a majority of the people of that State which he has the honor in part to represent.

Now, the people being in favor of this war—having full confidence in its justice—and entertaining the opinion that it ought to be vigorously prosecuted to a peaceful termination, the next consideration is, can the power of this tyrant party so influence them as to cause them to wheel to the right about, countermarch, and take sides in favor of the enemy? The question now before us is one of infinitely greater importance than any mere question of expediency. On mere partisan questions, party feeling may control public opinion; but when the national honor, interest, and safety, are all involved in a war with a foreign power, and at the moment of time when thousands of our patriotic citizens are in the field, offering up their lives in the cause of their country, I am sure the people will refuse to obey the dictum of party, if it does not accord with their own sense of right and patriotic devotion to the cause of their country. At least, I think I may answer for the people of Tennessee, that they will never rally under the flag of party in opposition to their own judgment and patriotic feeling. That, sir, is my native State, and I claim to know something of the feelings which influence its people. She, whose sons have fallen in Mexico—who has sent forth her volunteers at the first tap of the drum, who has contributed three or four times, perhaps, indeed I may safely say ten times, the amount of troops called for from her limits—cannot, I am sure, sacrifice those patriotic feelings, and take sides against their country.

But we are told that a change has been made in the policy of the administration with regard to the war; that the entire subjugation of Mexico is now contemplated; that the war was just in its origin, but that it is now prosecuted for the accomplishment of objects which would, if attained, be fatal to our own institutions. In order to counteract the evil effects of this alleged new policy, it is contended that we should withdraw the troops, and allow the enemy to have perfect freedom for all manner of excess, plunder, and assassination. Sir, I can see nothing in the message of the President, or in any other public document, to justify any such conclusions; and if I were disposed to charge the opposition with it—and I am not so disposed—I think I would not be without some ground for the allegation, that that is a mere pretext to justify their opposition to the war. I might say, that the gentlemen on the other side, unable to sustain themselves, are seeking, on the eve of a Presidential election, to present a new issue more favorable to their success; that they have discovered that the ground heretofore occupied by them—that the war is unnecessary and unconstitutional, and therefore no indemnity ought to be demanded or received for the immense expense incurred in its prosecution—meets with no favor with the people, and, therefore, to avoid the odium of this condemned position, they seek to shift their ground by presenting a new issue. Sir, these gentlemen have no right to assume for us measures and positions we never assumed for ourselves; and, therefore, I shall hold them to the issues which they themselves, upon mature consideration and full consultation, submitted to the public, as presenting the true position of the two great parties of this country upon the existing war with Mexico.

I shall not attempt to go into that, nor to answer the objections urged against the prosecution of the war; but proceed at once to the consideration of the inquiry—what did produce this war? Was it the annexation of Texas? or was it the removal of the army from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande? That is the issue made by the opposition since the war commenced.

I hold, as I then held, that the annexation of Texas was the cause of Mexico waging war against the United States. Whether the army had been removed to the Rio Grande or not, war was the inevitable result growing out of the act of annexation. How far, then, is this administration responsible? Annexation took place under the Tyler administration; and although the Senator from Maryland, not now in his seat, (Mr. JOHNSON,) having made, as I conceive, an able and conclusive argument in regard to the justice of this war, chose to cast some reflections on the administration for provoking war in the mode of annexation, I shall advert for a few moments to the subject.

What were the powers and duty of the President under the resolutions of annexation? They are all defined in the third resolution, which is as follows:

"And be it further resolved, That if the President of the United States shall in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the foregoing proposition to the Republic of Texas, as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that Republic; then,"

Let it be remembered that the legislative power took the matter into their own hands, and imposed upon the President the duty of submitting to the Republic of Texas the plan of annexation. They gave him the choice of selecting either the House or the Senate resolutions. Thus he acted merely as a ministerial agent. It was not like a case of ordinary negotiation, in which, after a proposition had been submitted, there was a right to withdraw it if it were declined. The law required him to make the proposition to the Republic of Texas, giving him only the discretionary power which I have just described. That selection of the mode of annexation was made before the present administration came into power. It was made by the Tyler administration in the last hours of its existence; and the selection being made, and the proposition submitted, the law was complied with. The President had discharged his duty under it, and his power the subject was consequently exhausted. It only remained, then, to be seen whether Texas would assent to the terms proposed. I am free to admit, that if the Senate resolution had been adopted, the war might have been avoided; but as the House resolutions were selected, it was not in the power of man to avert the war. If the Senate resolution had been adopted, negotiations might have been opened, and Texas might have been annexed by joint resolution at the next session of Congress, according to the terms agreed upon between the two parties. In the mean time, annexation not having taken place, she might have been consulted about it. Compensation might have been made, and an amicable settlement been effected. By the adoption of the House resolutions, however, all the power of averting the war was taken from the President, to whom no discretion was left.

In proceeding to establish the fact that annexation caused the war, I shall refer to the record. And I shall begin with the position occupied by the whig party in in 1844, pending the Presidential election. There was then but one universal sentiment in the party, expressed in the language of the distinguished citizen of Kentucky, who was regarded as the embodiment of their principles. And what was that sentiment? The great issue was then was, will you have Texas and a war, or no Texas and peace? That was the great issue which was submitted to the American people. The whig party then occupied, as I think they do now, the side of Mexico. They said annexation would produce war; that annexation was war. That is not their argument now. We are now told that the administration could have avoided the war. Here let me read an extract from the celebrated Raleigh letter of Mr. Clay, of 17th April, 1844:

"Recognition did not affect or impair the right of Mexico, or change the relations which subsisted between her and Texas. She, on the contrary, has preserved all her rights, and has considered by assent, and, as I know, is resolved to assert her right to reduce Texas to obedience as a part of the republic of Mexico."

Mr. Clay then goes on to say:

"Under these circumstances, if the government of the United States were to annex Texas, it would acquire along with it all the encumbrances which Texas is under, and among them, the actual or suspended war between Mexico and Texas. Of that consequence there cannot be a doubt. Annexation and war with Mexico are identical. Now, for one, I certainly am not willing to engage this country in a foreign war for the object of acquiring Texas."

Thus, sir, we see the great issue in 1844 was that of annexation; and Mr. Clay, the candidate of the whig party for the presidency, took ground expressly, that to annex Texas was to make war with Mexico, and for that reason he was opposed to annexation. More, sir; the whole whig party of the nation, from one end of the Union to the other, after this letter made its appearance, took the same ground, and supported Mr. Clay for the presidency, for the avowed purpose of defeating annexation, and thereby to avoid a foreign war with Mexico; but, sir, the democratic party advocated the annexation of Texas, and to maintain their position, they assumed, that to annex Texas to the United States gave no just cause of war, because Texas was a free and independent republic, and had so been acknowledged to be by all the prominent nations of the world; and, therefore, Texas had, under the laws of nations, as much right and power to make and conclude a treaty of annexation, or for any other object, as Mexico herself, or any other nation whatever; that this being the condition of Texas, the United States had, by the laws of nations, a right to treat with Texas for annexation, or for any other purpose, without giving offence or any just cause of war to Mexico; and that, if it was necessary to exercise this right, as they believed it was, in order to promote the interest of the nation, and the happiness and prosperity of the people, they would not be deterred from doing so by the foolish gasconade, and the unjust and illegal pretensions of Mexico. Thus, sir, the issue was joined, and the people rendered their verdict in November, 1844, in favor of annexation; and it was accordingly done. But, sir, war was the consequence of annexation: the whig prediction has been verified; but, strange to tell, notwithstanding all this, they now abandon the position occupied by them in 1844, and say that annexation did not produce the war, and, in fact, that it was no just cause of war; thus plainly admitting that their position was erroneous, and that the position of the democrats was the correct and true one. Having thus abandoned this ground, and being extremely anxious to cast censure on the present administration, they now say this war was brought on by the President, unnecessarily and unconstitutionally, by the removal of the army to the Rio Grande. Is this true? I hold that the annexation of Texas is the sole and exclusive cause of the war. This question I propose to examine: now for the proof. I shall read, Mr. President, an extract from a letter written by the Mexican minister of foreign affairs to our minister in Mexico, dated Mexico, May the 30th, 1844; it is as follows:

"That the firm and constant resolution has been, and is, to preserve the integrity and dignity of the nation; that, at this time, as very opportune for the publication of his protest, as he gives them here as express as if they were in full—signally recalling to mind, as special, that of the 23d of August, 1843, in the words, 'That Mexico will consider as a declaration of war against the Mexican republic, the ratification of that agreement for the incorporation of Texas into the territory of the United States.'"

Thus we see, Mr. President, that the letter of Mr. Clay, and which was adopted by the whig party as their text in 1844, is identical in sentiment, and almost verbatim in language, with the letter of the Mexican minister just read. Again, sir, the same Mexican minister, in his letter of the 2d of July, 1844, reaffirmed the statements in his letter just read, and I will not consume the time of the Senate by reading it; but as I desire to go a little further back, I will read an extract from the letter of Mr. Almonte, the Mexican minister, to Mr. Upshur, Secretary of State, dated November 3, 1843. He says:

"And he moreover declares, by express order of his government, that on sanction being given by the Executive of the United States to the incorporation of Texas into the United States, he will consider his mission ended; seeing that, as the Secretary of State will have assumed, the Mexican government is resolved to declare war so soon as it receives information of such an act."

November 11, 1843, reaffirmed.

I refer you now, sir, to the letter of Mr. Almonte to Mr. Upshur of the 11th of November, 1843, in which he says, that—

"Though the undersigned has declared, by the express order of his government, that war would be the immediate consequence of the annexation of Texas to the United States, he certainly has not done so with the object of intimidating the government of the honorable Secretary of State, but with a view of showing how far Mexico would carry her resistance to an annexation of that nature."

Now, Mr. President, is it not a little strange that the whig party here, in and out of this body, should, after the issue tendered by their leader in his letter of the 17th of April, 1844, and which was by them so ably and eloquently maintained throughout the canvass of 1844, being—as they were, backed and sustained in their position and assertions by the letters which I have read, and many more equally as strong, which I have not thought necessary to read; and when, also, their predictions and assertions have turned out precisely as they asserted they would—should now abandon all they then said on this subject as unworthy of notice, and to acknowledge that the position then assumed by the democracy to be the true and correct one? All now agree that annexation was no just cause of war If, then, I shall be enabled to prove my position, that this is the exclusive cause of the war, I shall have established the great fact, that the war in which we are now engaged with Mexico, is a just war on our part, and consequently, the charge which has been, and now is so repeatedly being made, that the war was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally brought on by the Executive, must be admitted to be unfounded, and has not the semblance of truth to sustain it. Sir, I will proceed with the proofs, for they are of such a conclusive character, that they need no comments to carry conviction to every impartial mind.

I now call the attention of the Senate to the letter of J. N. Almonte to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] then Secretary of State, dated the 6th of March, 1845, which is as follows:

"The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, has the honor to address the honorable John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State of the United States of America, with the object of making known to him the profound regret with which he has seen that the general Congress of the Union has passed a law giving its consent and admitting into the American confederacy the province of Texas.

"The undersigned had flattered himself with the idea, that on this question the good judgment and sound counsels of the citizens most distinguished and most eminently responsible for the conduct of the public affairs of this republic would have prevented it, in the last months of the legislative term, and of the Executive of the Union. Unfortunately, however, it has been otherwise; and, contrary to his hopes and his most sincere prayers, he sees consummated, on the part of the American government, an act of aggression the most unjust which can be found recorded in the annals of modern history, namely, that of despoiling a friendly nation like Mexico of a considerable portion of her territory.

"For these reasons, the undersigned, in compliance with his instructions, finds himself required to protest, as he does in fact protest, in the most solemn manner, in the name of his government, against the law passed on the 28th of the last month, by the general Congress of the United States, and approved on the 1st of the present month be the President of these States, who rely the province of Texas, as a component portion of the Mexican territory, is agreed and submitted into the Treaty. The undersigned, nevertheless, positively, in the name of his government, has to call upon in terms unmistakeable the rights on which Mexico rests to recover the above mentioned province of Texas, which she now sees herself constrained to do by the infringement and open violation which those rights sustain with the annexation of Texas to the United States, in spite of the solemn protest which the undersigned has repeatedly made in the name of his government against the consummation of such an act.

"The undersigned will say, in conclusion to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, regarding that business, he placed in communication with the President of the United States, that, in consequence of the above stated, which he has to repeat, he has made arrangements to leave the city without delay for New York.

"The undersigned avails himself, &c."

This letter, Mr. President, establishes several important facts: the first of which is, the annexation of Texas closed the doors to all further negotiation between the two governments, and made the resort to arms the only means of settling their differences. The second fact established is, that the war would be for the whole of Texas to the Sabine. And a third fact, which I think is one of great importance, is this: Mr. Almonte states that he "had flattered himself with the idea, that on this question the good judgment and sound counsels of the citizens most distinguished and intimately acquainted with the conduct of the public affairs of this republic would have prevailed," &c. Sir, does not Mr. Almonte, by this language, point directly to Mr. Clay as the man of good judgment, and to Mr. Clay's letter and the whig speeches in support of it, as containing the sound counsels of the citizens most distinguished, which he had hoped would have prevailed. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me to be a self-evident conclusion. What effect, then, did this letter and these speeches have upon the Mexican mind? What would Mexico say and think when she witnessed not only politicians but States, in their sovereign capacity, declaring that annexation would lead to a dissolution of the Union? Such resolutions were passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts. Would the Mexicans from these facts naturally conclude, that, in a war with us for the re-conquest of Texas, we would be distracted and divided among ourselves, and that we could not, therefore, bring the whole powers and energies of our government to bear in the prosecution of such a war? Sir, I doubt not she did so believe; and, at the commencement of the war, from the unanimity which seemed to pervade all parties in recognizing the existence of the war, and voting men and money for its prosecution, I did believe that she had been deluded into that belief by these acts of the whig party; but, sir, since the whig party have obtained a majority in the House of Representatives, which enables them to defeat any measure that has for its object a further prosecution of the war to a speedy and honorable termination, and thereby to force the government to withdraw our troops from Mexico, to the dishonor and disgrace of our country, to the sacrifice of the claims of our citizens, and also of the best interests of the government, by sacrificing her claim on Mexico for a reasonable indemnity of the expenses of this war—I am induced, from what I daily see and hear, to fear that Mexico was not mistaken in her conclusion, and that our divisions here, growing out of annexation, or from some other cause, are so great, and of such a character as to weaken, if not entirely to suspend, the further use of the execution of the war until after another election, when I doubt not the people will send representatives here who will sustain the honor and interests of the nation, especially when engaged in a foreign war, and that war growing out of an act which they themselves directed should be done. Thus, sir, our diplomatic intercourse ended with Mexico, and with it our friendly relations; and all under the Tyler administration. This was the condition of things when the present administration came into power; and how it discharged its duty by endeavoring to re-open negotiation and to preserve peace remains to be seen. To accomplish these objects was the business, and, I think, the earnest desire of the President; and to accomplish which, among the first acts of his administration, was to open with Mexico a sort of unofficial correspondence through our consul at her capital. This resulted in an agreement on the part of Mexico to receive a minister from this government, for the purpose of adjusting and settling, if possible, the boundary between the two countries and all other differences between the two governments; and, in pursuance of this understanding, and to preserve peace, the minister was immediately despatched to Mexico with full and ample powers to adjust and settle all questions of difference between the two countries. Was he received? and why was he not? He was not received; and I will now give you the reason assigned by the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs for his rejection. I shall read, sir, an extract from the letter of Mr. Lanzas to Mr. Shidell, dated the 12th of March, 1845. Here, sir, speaking of the annexation of Texas, he says:

"A fact, such as this, or to speak with greater exactness, so notable an act of usurpation, created an entire new necessity upon Mexico, for between loans, should it treat with proper firmness, perseguir. The Supreme Government of her, before any determined that it would look upon such an act as cause for war, and, as a consequence of this declaration, negotiation was by all very reluctant at an end. And war was the only recourse of the Mexican Government."

Sir, not one word of complaint is here uttered about the removal of the army to the Rio Grande. In point of fact, the army had not been removed, and was not for fourteen days thereafter. Mexico, therefore, did not, and has not, at any time, complained of this act, or asserted it to be the cause of war. On the contrary, before the army was removed to the Rio Grande, and when every effort was being made to reopen negotiations and to preserve peace, she tells our minister, who had been sent for that purpose, that annexation closed the door to negotiation, and war was the only recourse of the Mexican government. This argument, then, of the whig party in this country—that the removal of the army to the Rio Grande brought on this unnecessary and unconstitutional war—is flatly and positively denied by the Mexican authorities. This, sir, is an idea first conceived in the United States, and never thought of in Mexico. I had hoped that there was too much love of country and patriotism among all parties of our own countrymen, to permit any from inventing and asserting charges and allegations which had no foundation in fact, for the purpose of placing our own country in the wrong and our enemy in the right, when engaged in a war with a foreign nation. But in this it seems I have been mistaken. Mr. President, I desire to go further, and to refute and put down, I hope forever, another position assumed in this country equally unfounded: that is, that peace could have been preserved by sending a special commissioner to Mexico, with power to settle all questions growing out of the annexation of Texas, instead of sending, as we did, a minister clothed with those powers. In a letter from our consul, Mr. Black, in Mexico, to the Secretary of State, he details a conversation which he had with Mr. Pena y Pena, the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject of Mr. Slidell's mission to Mexico. This letter is dated the 18th of December, 1845, and refers to a conversation which took place on the 29th of November preceding, in which the Mexican Minister, after speaking of the arrival of Mr. Slidell at Vera Cruz, said:

"That ought not to be. The Government did not expect an envoy from the United States until January, as they were not prepared to receive him; and he desired, if possible, that he would not come to the capital, nor even disembark at this time, and that the consul should endeavor to prevent his coming so, as his appearance in the capital at this time might prove destructive to the Government, and thus defeat the whole affair. You know the Opposition are calling us traitors for entering into this arrangement with you. I [the consul] told him that I regretted this had not been known in time, as the envoy would be now on his way to the capital, and that the Mexican Government had set no time for his arrival; to which the minister replied, that he knew there was no time left. Mr. Pena y Pena proceeded further to say, that the Government itself was well disposed and ready to proceed in the negotiation; but that, if the affair was commenced now, it would endanger its existence; that the Government were preparing the thing, and giving the opinion and convincing the departments, which they expected to have finished by January, and then they would be able to proceed with more security; that the Government were afraid that the appearance of the envoy at that time would produce a revolution against it, which might terminate in its destruction."

This, Mr. President, was the true reason why Mr. Slidell was not received by the Herrera administration. It was, as Mr. Pena y Pena said, because they were afraid of a revolution which might terminate in the expulsion, from power, of the then administration. And, sir, were these fears thus expressed by Mr. Pena well founded? Sir, the revolution did take place, and which did result, as predicted, in the expulsion from power of the Herrera administration, on the 30th of December, 1844.

But, sir, this is not all my proof. I have more and stronger still. I shall read, sir, an extract from the letter of Herrera to the Mexican minister of Foreign Affairs, declining an acceptance of the appointment of one of the commissioners to treat with the United States. This letter is dated the 25th of August, 1847, and he says:

"As a Mexican, who desires the welfare of his country, I ought to state to your Excellency, that being at the head of the government in the year 1845, just passed, when the Government of the United States first moved in sending a commissioner to arrange the differences which, on account of the Texas question, disturbed the harmony which ought to exist between two coterminous republics; for no other act than showing their desire would be an obstacle to his presenting himself and having his propositions heard, my administration was calumniated in the most atrocious manner; for this act alone the revolution which displaced me from the command was set on foot; and if I were now to take part in the same question, it would give occasion for a renewal of the scenes which then took place; and the best result from existing circumstances through negotiations, however honorable, would be worse received than it might be if they were undertaken by persons who may have had no part in that affair."

To this letter the Mexican minister answered on the next day, as follows:

"MEXICO, August 26, 1847.

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have made known to his Excellency, the acting President, your excellency's note of yesterday, in which you decline accepting the trust of commissioner for the purpose of listening to the propositions for peace which the Government of the United States wishes to make through their own commissioner; and, in reply, he directs me to inform you, as I have the honor to do, that the very reasons upon which your excellency relies were those which led to your appointment, since they show that two distinct persons, according to their different circumstances, have concurred in one essential point, namely, the propriety of hearing propositions, the avowed object of which is to terminate the evils of the war. Consequently, his Excellency hopes upon the receipt of your excellency's note take charge of this weighty and delicate business, for which purpose he appeals to your well known patriotism, and to the good disposition which you have evinced to serve the republic."

Not one word in all this as to the character of Mr. Slidell, whether he was to appear under the name of a minister or that of a commissioner—his powers and duties being the same under both titles. No, sir; this protest did not enter into the objections to his reception by the Mexican government. So far from it, that Herrera, the then President, who rejected Mr. Slidell for the reasons given by Mr. Pena y Pena, now, in this note, substantially reaffirms what was said by Mr. Pena to Mr. Black. Sir, comment on these documents is unnecessary; they are self-evident.

But, sir, I will now return to the main question—that is, did annexation produce the war? I have read you a portion of the correspondence of the Mexican government, which I think fully sustains my position. I now proceed to examine our own correspondence, with a view to see, if I can, what they thought would be the result of such a policy. This, sir, becomes the more important, as the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN), who was then Secretary of State, and as such negotiated the treaty of annexation, has denounced the war as unjust, and the preamble in the act, asserting that it was brought on by the act of Mexico, as being false and untrue; and who asserts that the war was brought on by the Executive removing our army to the Rio Grande. What, sir, did he think would be the effect of annexation? I propose to compare his opinions when Secretary with his opinions now when a Senator. In June, 1844, the Senator, as Secretary of State, addressed a letter to our Minister in Mexico; and, in speaking of the treaty of annexation, he said, we would, indeed, have been glad in doing so, to have acted with the concurrence of Mexico, if circumstances had permitted—not because he believed that she had any rightful claim of sovereignty to Texas, or that the latter was not competent of itself to transfer the full and complete right and title to its territory, but because, in our desire to preserve the most friendly relations with Mexico, we were disposed to treat her with respect, however unfounded we believed her claim to Texas to be. It was in conformity with that desire that the instructions were given to make the communication to the government of Mexico, announcing the signature of the treaty, and our readiness to adjust all questions which might grow out of it between the two countries, on the most liberal terms.

Why desire the concurrence of Mexico, if war was not apprehended from the act of annexation? And why say to Mexico, that we are willing to settle all questions growing out of annexation on the most liberal terms? What are the questions growing out of annexation, referred to in this letter? The resolutions of annexation recognize but one, and that is the question of boundary. Sir, in my opinion, the Secretary was willing to purchase from Mexico the claim to the whole of Texas; or, in other words, he was willing to pay to Mexico a round sum of money, by way of buying his peace. This, sir, is what he means by settling all questions on the most liberal terms. If I am mistaken in this view, he is present, and can correct me. Then, sir, I ask, why propose to purchase a peace, if there was no danger of a war?

On the 10th of September, 1844, the honorable Senator wrote another letter to our minister in Mexico, from which I will now read an extract. He says:

"Nor will our honor, any more than our welfare and safety, permit her to attack Texas while the question of annexation is pending. If Mexico has thought proper to take offence, it is we, who invited a renewal of the proposition, and not she, who accepted it, who ought to be held responsible; and we, as a peaceful party, cannot, without implicating our honor, permit another to suffer in our place. Entertaining these views, Mexico would make a great mistake if she should suppose that the President would regard with indifference the renewal of the war which she has prosecuted against Texas. Our honor and our interests are both involved."

Mr. President, this is a warlike document. It is, sir, that our honor and our interest are both involved in defending and protecting Texas against Mexico, pending the question of annexation. This, sir, was, I think, a correct sentiment—one the people would have sustained. Sir, they would never consent to a sacrifice of their national honor or of national interest. He then intended to fight Mexico, if she invaded Texas. This is my construction of this letter; and I would be pleased to hear from the distinguished Senator from Texas, who was then the President of that republic, and to whom a copy of this letter was sent—in order, as I had supposed, to satisfy him that this government would in good faith defend and protect Texas, pending the question of annexation, and thereby preserve both the honor and the interest of this nation—whether he did not view it in the same light. But, sir, I now fear that this letter would have been the means not only of sacrificing our honor and our interest, but it would also have been the means, if Texas had been invaded, of deceiving her, and of enabling Mexico to invade her. Texas was then relying upon us for succor and defence: our failure to comply with her expectations would have misled her, and she would not have been prepared to meet and expel the enemy.

Now, sir, I will read you an extract from the letter written by our Secretary to General Howard, and containing a copy of the one I have just read. General Howard was instructed to deliver that copy to the President of Texas. The letter which I now read bears date the 10th of September, 1844, (the same date of the other,) and in which he says:

"All that he can do is, to make suitable representations to the Mexican government against the renewal of the war, pending the question of annexation, and the savage manner in which it is proposed to conduct it, accompanied by appropriate protests and indications of the feelings with which he regards both; and to recommend to Congress to adopt measures to repel any attack which may be made."

Now, sir, it seems all this show of fight about national honor and interest turns out to be nothing but wind—a war of words and gasconade. How do these two letters, written on the same day, comport with the honor and interest of this government? But, sir, I will proceed.

I will now read an extract from the letter of the Secretary which announced to the Mexican government that a treaty for the annexation of Texas had been signed. This letter is dated the 19th of April, 1844—in which he says:

"Seeing this, this government has been compelled, by the necessity of the case, and a regard to its constitutional obligations, to take the step it has, as the only certain and effectual means of preventing it; it has taken it in full view of all possible consequences, but not without a desire and a hope that a full and fair disclosure of all the causes which induced it to do so would prevent the disturbance of the harmony subsisting between the two countries, which the United States is anxious to preserve."

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina apprehended no danger of war from annexation, what does he mean by saying he had "taken the step in full view of all possible consequences?" What step? Annexation. What consequences of that step did he have in full view? Sir, it was war, and nothing else. Then, sir, he believed at that time that annexation would produce war; time has proved his opinion to have been correct; and yet he denounces the war. Sir, I do not envy any laurel he may win by the pursuit of such a course.

I have other evidence, Mr. President, which, I think, is in itself conclusive to every impartial mind. Sir, it is the letter of the four Mexican commissioners to Mr. Trist, when negotiating a treaty of peace, on the 6th day of September last, in which they say:

"The existing war has been undertaken solely on account of the territory of the State of Texas, respecting which the North American Republic pretends to unite the said State to the United States by which it was annexed to the North American Confederation, after having proclaimed its independence of Mexico. The Mexican Republic offering (as we have informed your excellency) to consent, for a proper indemnification, to the pretensions of the government of Washington to the territory of Texas, the cause of the war has disappeared, and the war itself ought to cease."

Now, Mr. President, can any impartial mind any longer imagine what language could be stronger. I repeat it, the existing war was commenced solely on account of Texas. This is a war, then, for Texas. Who commenced it? Surely we did not, for we had possession of Texas. Then it was commenced by Mexico for the purpose of reconquering Texas; and in this, as in everything else that has been written or said by Mexico as to the cause of this war, we hear not one word of complaint about the removal of the army to the Rio Grande as having any agency in bringing on the war, or of hastening hostilities between the two countries, and therefore it is that I have insisted that this question owes its origin to, and is advocated alone by, citizens in this country, and for purposes best known to themselves; and the same remark holds good in relation to the other question, that our minister was rejected simply because he was not a commissioner.

I have now presented, Mr. President, my documentary evidence to show that this war is waged by Mexico for and on account of the annexation of Texas to the United States; and in doing this, I have not discussed the boundary of Texas, because that question is not involved in this war; and further, because as Mexico has made no question about boundary, except for the whole of Texas to the Sabine, the whig party here are estopped by their own record, manufactured by themselves for the avowed purpose of placing themselves right before the country and before posterity. On this subject, sir, when the bill recognizing the existence of the war was before the Senate, then was the time to inquire into the cause of the war, and whether it had been brought on by our army invading the territory of Mexico, or by the Mexican army by invading American territory. This question was then considered, and Senators then made up their minds and took their positions. And to show the position assumed by the whig Senators, I will read from the Congressional Globe a few remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN):

"Mr. CRITTENDEN expressed a desire that the ground taken upon this subject by the majority here should be placed, on the Journal, and on this particular bill, so that to strike out from the first section of the bill the words, 'to prosecute said war to a speedy and successful termination,' and insert, 'for the purpose of repelling the invasion, the President be [etc.]'" &c.

In favor of this motion, and for the reasons given by the Senator from Kentucky, the entire whig party in the Senate recorded their votes. What invasion was to be repelled by this motion? It was to repel the Mexican invaders, and to drive them from our soil. They had crossed the Rio Grande, and therefore were, in the opinion of the whig Senators, as well as those of the democrats, invading our country. How, sir, could this be, unless the Rio Grande is the boundary? Sir, I hold these Senators to this record; they made it themselves, and are, therefore, estopped from contradicting it. I am aware, Mr. President, that the preamble of the act was a subject of discussion when the bill was under the consideration of the Senate; but, sir, did any Senator in that discussion pretend or assert that that part of the preamble to the act which asserts that the war was brought on by the act of Mexico, was not true? No, sir; I have looked over the debate in vain, and can find no such thing. On the contrary all seemed to agree, that if war existed at all, it was brought on by the act of Mexico. By what act did Mexico bring on the war? She crossed the Rio Grande, and thus invaded our country, and after doing so, commenced hostilities—shedding American blood on American soil. Now, sir, to show that I am right in this view, I shall call the attention of the Senate to what was said on this subject at the time. I shall read, sir, from the Congressional Globe, as follows:

"Mr. MANGUM had made up his mind to vote for the bill, but he entered his most solemn protest against the hasty declaration of the preamble about the existence of the war, and he would ask the Senate that that protest be entered on the Journal.

"Messrs. J. M. CLAYTON and DAYTON entered similar protests."

Mr. MANGUM.—If the Senator will pardon me I would state, that vote was put upon the ground that there was no evidence of the existence of war or of a battle having been fought. It will be remembered that the documents, which accompanied the message, were not printed or even read. The bill was presented on mere information that war had been commenced by Mexico, and the adoption of the preamble was resisted in the absence of all evidence either of the existence of war, or if it existed that it was commenced by the act of Mexico. This explanation is necessary in order to prevent any misconception which might arise from the imperfect character of the report from which the Senator has quoted.

Mr. TURNEY.—Thus, Mr. President, it is seen that the only objection to the preamble consisted in the fact, that some Senators doubted whether hostilities had commenced, and not that the act which produced hostilities, or the hostile act itself, was the act of Mexico.

But, Mr. President, there is still another answer to this charge, that this war was produced by the removal of the army to the Rio Grande. If this was an illegal and an unconstitutional invasion of Mexico, the President is not alone responsible for it. He, sir, is not a military man, but he is a remarkably cautious and prudent one, and in this instance, as well as in every important step in the prosecution of this war, he has acted upon the advice of those who not only had a knowledge of military science, but who were on the ground, and had the best means of obtaining all the necessary information to enable them to form a correct and sound judgment as to what ought to be done. If, then, he is to be censured for this act, after using all the means in his power to obtain correct information, what ought to be done with those upon whose professional skill and ample means of information he acted? Gentlemen ought to remember that there are those who are equally responsible with the President. Now, sir, for the purpose of showing that the President was justified in his course, and that General Taylor, (an authority I am sure the Senators on the other side of this chamber will not question,) advised the removal of the army to the Rio Grande, I will read an extract from the despatch of General Taylor, of the 4th day of October, 1845, in which he says:

"For these reasons, our station this far [by, I think, been the best possible, but now that the organized force we can muster abroad, it may well be a question whether the views of the government would be best carried out by our remaining at this point. It is with great difference that I make any suggestions on topics which may become matter of diplomatic negotiation; but I cannot conceive it in any other manner than that, as days, makes the line of the Rio Grande an ultimatum. I cannot doubt that the settlement will be greatly facilitated and hastened by our taking possession at once of such position as we may desire to occupy permanently, and which we can hold without the necessity of a movement that must. Our strength, or attitude of preparation, should be so placed in a manner not to be mistaken. How we can best carry into effect the object upon the under ground, is not present to my mind. To invade Mexico, by the frontier to march the government of Mexico at the city of the Rio Grande. The limited force, if necessary, our ultimate the country as far as the Rio Grande. The limited force, if necessary, our ultimate the country as far as the Rio Grande. The arms of occupation will in a few days be concentrated at this point in condition for vigorous and efficient service. Mexico has never yet made no positive declaration of war, recommitted any overt act of hostilities. I do not believe that, under all the circumstances, particularly those of July the sun, to make a forward movement to the Rio Grande without authority from the War Department."

Thus, sir, we see that the President acted upon the advice and strong recommendations of General Taylor; and if the act was wrong and he is to be censured for it, a much greater degree of blame and censure ought to fall on the military man possessing all the means of information, who advised it. But, sir, I have no censure to cast on any one. Far from it. I think it was a proper and judicious act; one in which all the parties concerned are justly entitled to praise. Sir, what would have been the indignation felt throughout this country, if the army had been retained at Corpus Christi, and the Mexican army had crossed the Rio Grande, and on their march to the interior of Texas, had devastated the country, murdered and plundered the citizens, burned their houses and destroyed their farms? Would we then have been told by the whig orators that this was all right? No, sir; they would have been the loudest and the most bitter in their denunciations of the President for not doing what he has done.

But, Mr. President, I have heard other charges made against the President for the manner and mode of conducting this war.—Some say he did not call out men enough; others, that he called out too many; and others find fault with his plans of campaign. One word, sir, in answer to all these objections. The President, I admit, is responsible for all these things. He is to manage and to conduct the war; and I would inquire whether any error of this character has been committed? I deny it. Everybody seems astonished at the success of our armies; we have gained every battle, and have made astonishing progress, taking their principal towns and strong places; then we had troops enough in the field, and our plans must have been well laid and well executed. But, sir, it would be very remarkable if no error had—as I think, in point of fact, no error was—committed in all this business. If any had been committed, who would be to blame for it? I have admitted the President would be responsible; but, sir, others would be to blame also; for I have no doubt that the President, prudent and cautious as he is, had the advice of the commanding general of the army upon every plan of a campaign, and also of the number of men necessary to execute such plan with certain success. This we know to have been his course at the commencement of the war, and I doubt not he has continued it.

But, Mr. President, the Senators on the other side of this chamber inquire, with an air of triumph, why we do not bring this war to a close? Why not make a peace? For what purpose do we desire further to prosecute it? Sir, we have thus far prosecuted this war with unparalleled success; and I doubt not we would have had a peace long since, but for our own divisions in relation to the justice of this war. Mexico knows as well as we do when our Presidential elections take place. She knows that the leaders of the whig party of this country have taken open and bold ground against the war—denounced it as unjust, unnecessary and unconstitutional—waged by us for the purpose of conquest, robbery and plunder. Can we expect, under these circumstances, a peace, until after the Presidential election? If the whigs should be successful, Mexico would expect a favorable peace—one that would surrender to them the country at least to the Rio Grande, if not to the Nueces; and as the war is both unconstitutional and unjust, they would expect a reasonable indemnity for the expense, suffering, and loss produced by it; and could the whig party refuse this if the war is unjust? They would be justly entitled to it. Again, sir, Mexico would tell them, You know you had no right to annex Texas, and that this illegal and unconstitutional act produced this bloody and disastrous war, and, therefore, you ought to pay us for Texas also. What answer, consistent with his former position, could a whig President make? None that I can conceive. I am asked how I would end this war. My answer is, that I would fight it out. True, sir, we have vanquished the armies of Mexico in every battle that has been fought, and have taken possession of a large portion of their territory, including the capital, many of her populous cities, and her strongly fortified places, yet she is not subdued. She still persists in her refusal to treat for peace, and will continue to do so until she is whipped into submission. When that time arrives—when she asks for peace, and proposes to make atonement for past wrongs and aggressions, I shall be ready to discuss the terms of peace.

Mr. President, I will now give a statement of a few questions growing out of this war, in which the leaders of the whig party and the Mexicans most heartily concur:

1. The whigs held that to annex Texas was to make war with Mexico. So said Mexico; but this having been decided by the people, the whigs now agree with us, that it was no just cause of war. Shifting their position, they now say that the removal of the army to the Rio Grande produced the war.

2. That the war is unjust and unconstitutional. The Mexicans assert the same thing.

3. That it is unjust and oppressive to levy contributions on Mexico. So say the Mexicans.

4. That to demand an indemnity from Mexico for the expenses of the war is oppressive, and amounts to robbery. The Mexicans take the same ground.

5. That this is a war waged and prosecuted for conquest. So say the Mexicans.

6. That, as the war is unjust and unconstitutional, and, in the extreme, oppressive to Mexico, we ought to withdraw our army. So says Mexico.

These, Mr. President, are my opinions, and, if I am in error, I have the consolation that I err on the side of my country.

Mr. BREESE took the floor, with the intention of addressing the Senate on Monday.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BERRIEN presented the credentials of the Hon. HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON, appointed by the Governor of the State of Georgia, a Senator of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. WALTER S. COLQUITT.

Mr. JOHNSON, having taken the oath prescribed by law, took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BADGER presented the memorial of Mrs. M. Rodgers, widow of Commodore John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, deceased, praying payment for double rations due her late husband as senior officer of the navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented additional documents in relation to the claim of George Poindexter; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MILLER presented the memorial of the executors and heirs of John Rogers, deceased, praying bounty land and half-pay; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CORWIN presented a memorial of the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Salem, praying for an immediate termination of the war with Mexico; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a petition of citizens of Stark county, Ohio, and a petition of citizens of Monroe county, Michigan, praying for a speedy termination of the war with Mexico, by withdrawing our troops within the limits of our own territory, and then settling the point in dispute by negotiation or reference; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Muskingum county, Ohio, remonstrating against the prosecution of the Mexican war, for the purpose of conquest, or forcing Mexico to sell any part of her territory to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the petition of Joseph Newell, asking to be allowed to change the location of a section of land granted him under an Indian treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEVIER presented the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Fort Smith, praying the division of the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts, and the location of the seat of justice for the western division at that place; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of H. B. Gaither praying compensation for services as clerk to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs west of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Sarah Ten Eyck, executrix of Conrad Ten Eyck, deceased, late marshal of the United States for the District of Michigan, praying the payment of a balance due him by the government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of Reuben M. Gibbs, a pensioner of the United States, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the memorial of Charles Larabee, a pensioner of the United States, praying to be allowed an increase and arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Asahel Kingsley, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying the establishment of a mail route from Alaqua, Florida, to Geneva, in Alabama—and a petition of citizens of Florida praying the establishment of a mail route from Ucheeanna to Milton in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WESTCOTT observed in offering these petitions, that the people of West Florida had for sometime past complained of the mail arrangements there as a nuisance, and if a remedy was not provided, they would prefer its being abated to continuing as at present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of the American Colonization Society, praying reimbursement of the expenses incurred by that society for the support of a number of Africans, captured by an United States' vessel of war, from on board a slave ship, and landed at Monrovia, in Liberia, which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BAGBY presented the memorial of Peter Raudon, representative of John Raudon, deceased, praying indemnity for property destroyed during the Creek Indian hostilities; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of Samuel F. Butterworth, praying compensation for services in carrying the mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the petition of James H. Causten, assignee of Col. John B. Hogan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHRIST CHURCH BURIAL GROUND.

Mr. GREENE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Vestry of Washington Parish, reported a bill to authorize the sale of part of public reservation numbered thirteen in the City of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to the second reading.

PRESERVATION OF LIVE OAK TREES, ETC.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DOWNS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend an act entitled "An Act to provide for the punishment of offences committed in cutting, destroying, or removing live oak and other timber or trees reserved for Naval purposes," approved 2d March 1831; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: I am charged by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that they request the [illegible] "An Act for an increase of the Medical Staff of the Army, for a limited time."

The Speaker of the House of Representatives, having signed the same, I am directed to deliver them to the Senate for the signature of the President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bills.

An Act for the relief of [illegible] and Lachlan Wait.

An Act to authorize the issuing of [illegible] to the heirs of Wilkinson.

An Act to confirm the boundary line between Missouri and Arkansas.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL STAFF.

Mr. BADGER moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for an increase of the Medical Staff of the Army, for a limited time, had been passed.

The motion was postponed until to-morrow.

MR. DICKINSON'S RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. YULEE moved a postponement of the prior orders, in order to take up the resolutions submitted on the 14th December, by Mr. DICKINSON, and that his resolutions, offered on the 12th of January, as a substitute for those submitted by Mr. DICKINSON, might be considered.

Mr. FOOTE objected. He regarded the bill now before the Senate as one of vital importance, and expressed his decided opposition to engaging in the consideration of any other subject which might encroach upon the time allotted to the special order. He was not at all disposed to give way to a wordy debate, which would interfere with the great measure now before the Senate, and be, perhaps, of mischievous tendency.

Mr. YULEE replied, that he would be very sorry if what he had to say on this subject should be regarded as mischievous in its tendency. It was his purpose to discuss, upon its constitutional merits, a question which had not been introduced by him on that floor, but which was introduced by an honorable Senator from one of the most important States in the Union, and which was fully discussed by him during the morning hour. Having presented a substitute for the resolutions submitted by that gentleman, he had felt himself entitled to ask the indulgence of the Senate, for an op-personal explanation, stating the grounds on which those resolutions rested. It was during the morning hour that the proposition of the Senator from New York was discussed, and it was during the morning hour that he (Mr. Y.) solicited a like indulgence from the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE would not urge his objection, as assurance had now been at least impliedly given, that the discussion of the bill before the Senate would not be interfered with, by allowing the Senator from Florida to present his views on the proposition. But his conscience and sense of duty would not permit him to consent to the introduction of any matter which was likely to impede, in the slightest degree, the progress of the debate on the great subject to which he alluded.

Mr. DOWNS also objected to the introduction of the resolutions of the Senator from Florida at this time. It was not probable that the discussion on them could be avoided, as there was a difference of opinion in regard to them, even on the part of Senators from the south. Still, he was anxious to have the question discussed, and would be very happy to hear the discussion, when the Senate was less occupied than at present.

Mr. YULEE said that after he had spoken a day could be fixed for the consideration of his resolutions.

Mr. DOWNS remarked that in that case no opportunity of reply would be afforded to gentlemen who might be disposed to differ from the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TURNEY said that if the resolutions were taken up only during the morning hour so as not to interfere with the discussion of the special order he had no objection; if on the other hand the special order was trenched upon he must refuse the discussion solicited by the honorable Senator from Florida.

Mr. CASS suggested a postponement of the resolutions till after the special order had been disposed of by the Senate. It was not a matter of pressing importance that the sentiments of the gentleman from Florida on this subject should be expressed to-day. For himself he would hear the gentleman with great pleasure, but it did seem to him to be in every way most expedient to defer the consideration of his resolutions, and avoid any interruption of the debate on the special order, on which it was highly important to obtain speedy action.

Mr. BADGER begged to submit, with great respect to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the application thus made by the Senator from Florida stood on peculiar grounds. Agreeing fully with that gentleman in the general position that nothing should be done by which the discussion of the special order should be encroached upon, yet he reminded him that the Senate had permitted the honorable Senator from New York to occupy a portion of the morning hour in remarks on the resolutions submitted by him for which those of the Senator from Florida were proposed as a substitute. That was regretted by him at the time, as he regarded it as a precedent leading to encroachments on the time allotted for particular business. But in these circumstances it did after all appear to be due to the Senator from Florida that he should be indulged in a like opportunity of expressing his views, deferring the further discussion of the subject till after the special order had been disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE said he disliked to occupy the time of the Senate, but it was important to make a remark in reply to the Senator from North Carolina. That gentleman had declared in such breath that when the Senate allowed the Senator from New York to discuss his resolutions, he condemned the act—he disapproved of it—he felt at the time that it was a bad precedent, likely to lead to serious interference with the regular business of the Senate, and yet, now he urged the Senate to do the very same thing. Why? On the ground of courtesy, forsooth, to the Senator from Florida. It appeared, then, that they were to do wrong that some good in the way of courtesy might come from it—to do what the Senator from North Carolina himself admitted to be improper and had condemned at the time—to persevere in doing evil in order to avoid wounding the sensibility of a Senator! Now, the great question was, what did the country demand at their hands? Were they to [illegible]

Mr. YULEE here begged to inform the Senator that he did not propose [illegible] all were the direct question [illegible] ten regiment bill.

Mr. FOOTE replied, that he had distinctly stated, if the Senator from Florida did not interfere with the discussion of the bill, he would not object to allowing him to present his views on his resolutions; but if the Senator encroached in the slightest degree—no more even than a second of time—on that bill, he felt bound to oppose the taking up of his resolutions.

Mr. YULEE said that he expected that he would get through with what he had to say, before the expiration of the morning hour, and would have done so if he had not been interrupted by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE regretted that the Senator from Florida had not been explicit when he first announced his desire that his resolutions should be taken up.

Mr. CAMERON observed that he thought it would save time to allow the Senator from Florida to proceed with his remarks. He understood that the Senator would not occupy a longer period than the half hour which yet remained of the term allotted to morning business. The Senator would not, if that was the case, interfere in the slightest degree with the speedy action of the Senate, on the Ten Regiment Bill, a measure which was vitally important to the interests of the country, and on the progress of which a speedy peace very much depended.

Mr. HANNEGAN suggested that the Senator might be allowed to proceed, with the understanding, that at one o'clock, he should give way to the special order.

Mr. BADGER begged to detain the Senate only a moment, for the purpose of setting himself right in regard to an observation which he made, and to which the Senator from Mississippi had attempted to give a construction which was not altogether correct. He did not suppose that the Senator from Florida ought to be indulged in making his speech, on the ground of "courtesy;" but he thought that in the circumstances of the case, the Senate had so committed itself, that it was perhaps an act of justice to allow that gentleman to express the views on the resolutions offered as a substitute for those of the Senator from New York, who had been indulged in an opportunity of presenting his own at length. There was, therefore, no ground for the charge of inconsistency in the remark which he had made, that although at the time he feared that the extension of that indulgence to the Senator from New York, might lead to inconvenience in the interruption of the public business, yet it seemed to be proper to grant a similar favor to the Senator from Florida. It was better, he thought, to submit to the inconvenience, than deny to the Senator from Florida, the opportunity of presenting his views, as nearly contemporaneous as possible with those of the Senator who took a different view of the subject.

Mr. FOOTE had only to say that he regarded justice to the country as more important, than justice to individuals.

The question was then taken on the motion to take up the resolutions submitted by the Senator from New York; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The resolutions submitted by the Senator from New York (Mr. DICKINSON) were then read as follows:

Resolved, That treaties between the government of the United States and the people of [illegible] are [illegible] upon the consent of both parties, which cannot be obtained, and the subject matter of which cannot be settled, except by the application of the powers of war; and that, as a treaty [illegible] with the power and the right of the people to declare war, with the powers and rights of the [illegible] of the Union.

[illegible] Resolved, That the [illegible] to the United States, is the common property of the Union, and the sovereignty over the same vests in the people of the several States composing the Union.

Resolved, That [illegible] has no delegated authority, nor the territorial community any inherent right, to exercise any legislative power within the [illegible] to which the citizens of the United States have equal and [illegible] any part of the common property, may be impaired or embarrassed.

As a substitute for these resolutions, the Senator from Florida submitted the following, which were also read:

Resolved, That the territory belonging to or which may be acquired by the United States, is the common property of the Union, and the sovereignty over the same vests in the people of the several States composing the Union.

Resolved, That Congress, as the legislature [illegible] has no delegated authority, nor the territorial community any inherent right, to exercise any legislative power within the [illegible] to which the citizens of the United States have equal right to emigrate with their property, and to settle and enjoy any part of the common property, may be impaired or embarrassed.

Mr. YULEE.—It has seemed to me due to all the interests involved, that there be a clear understanding of the position of all parties in this country upon the question to which these resolutions relate. So far as the Senator from New York, and those who agree with him, design to repudiate the principles of the Wilmot Proviso, and have added in supplressing its prevalence in the North, they are entitled to our profound thanks; and I join in commending the spirit with which they have sought to advance towards a satisfactory adjustment of differences. But it is impossible for me to close my eyes to the fact, that although various approaches have been made, since the last session, in the direction of the constitution, none of these attempts have reached a point satisfactory to the public mind, and we are, to all practical intents, very much where we stood at the last session.

What is it in the principles of the Wilmot Proviso that excites so justly the alarm and indignation of the southern states of the Union? That Proviso contemplates the exclusion of the people of a portion of the states of the Union from the use of acquisitions obtained through the common wealth and strength of the whole. It insults us by resting this discrimination upon a ground injurious to the morality and dignity of the South. It strikes at the security of property in the southern states, by aiming to surround them with a cordon of States having antagonist institutions; and threatens the security of their rights, by disturbing the political equilibrium of the two great sections of the Union. On these accounts, the Wilmot Proviso is justly regarded, by a large portion of the people of the Union, as an odious attempt to insult, to betray, and to injure them. It is feared as an attack upon the compromises of the constitution, and execrated as a disturber of the harmonies of the Union. In its inception, and its application, and in all its aspects, it is distasteful to all who, viewing it as I do, reverence the Union, respect the rights of the states, or set any value upon the dignity of citizenship. It is needless for me to say, that as a liege citizen of a southern state, I can lend no aid, directly or indirectly, to results so ominous as those involved in the Wilmot Proviso; nor countenance political effort with any party which in the remotest degree suffers its taint to rest upon it.

Since the last session of Congress, several propositions for a settlement of the question have been advanced from distinguished quarters. For one, I heartily thank them all for the noble spirit of independence and justice which they have exhibited a disposition to practice. But their propositions seem to involve, in the contemplation of the advocates of their opinions, results practically the same as those of the Wilmot Proviso. It becomes important, therefore, to explore still further the field of the constitution for a secure foundation to our rights.

The two leading propositions to which I will refer, because they seem to comprehend in their scope all the rest, are—

First. The Missouri compromise line as the rule of settlement; and,

Secondly. A transfer of the question to the inhabitants of the territory.

Neither of these satisfy me. Legislative compromise is the most unsafe and shifting ground upon which the rights of a people can rest. No other evidence of this is necessary than is furnished by the fate of the tariff compromise, and still more recently by the votes of the late Congress upon this very Missouri compromise. The constitution furnishes the only enduring and steady basis of right, and the legislation of Congress is incompetent to modify or compromise the terms of this fundamental compact; for otherwise the creature may control the creator. Nor is the proposed transfer of the question to the inhabitants of the territory less objectionable. It is not only in conflict with the duties and authority of Congress, but it resigns to the first few persons who chance to be upon acquired territory the whole disposition of the destiny of our territorial possessions. The insufficiency of either of these plans to avert the evil effects of the Wilmot principle, seems to be conceded by their respective advocates, who, while they patriotically denounce the agitation of the Wilmot Proviso, adopt, doubtless from honest conviction, grounds which they acknowledge must produce the same practical results. They hold, that because the laws of Mexico prohibit slavery, it could never exist in territory acquired from her, unless expressly established or authorized by Congress; and one branch of them assign to the inhabitants of the territory an original right of legislation in respect to their local government, including the subject of slavery—thus denying to Congress the power to legislate for the protection of our citizens in the territories of the United States. Of course, if the repeal of the restriction depended upon Congress, it would be in the power of the north to control the question, as they have a settled majority in the House of Representatives; or, if the question was left to the inhabitants of the territory, those who were transferred with it, would fix its destiny as a non-slaveholding territory, by continuing the restriction and excluding the settlement of slaveholders.

[He referred to sundry evidences to show that such were the views and acknowledged anticipations entertained upon the subject, by many who were resisting the agitation of the Wilmot Proviso in the Northern States.]

Thus it will be seen that both these propositions rest upon grounds which render inevitable the same practical result as the Wilmot Proviso, namely, the encirclement of the South by a belt of non-slaveholding States, with all its fatal consequences upon our prosperity and existence. The only difference I can see, is in the temper which is exhibited. While the advocates of Wilmotism march boldly up, with hostile spirit, to the violent immolation of the States of the South, the advocates of the other propositions, acting, as I believe, under an erroneous conception of the Constitution, invite us to aid in our own immolation; thus converting the execution into a felo de se. However we may estimate their respective motives, the fatal effects would be the same, and, therefore, with equal decision to be repelled. Believing that it is the right of a citizen of the southern States to go upon any territory belonging to the United States which is opened to occupation, and to reside upon it securely, with his slaves and other property, under the guarantees of the constitution; and believing, further, that Congress has no power over him the shield of its protection in the enjoyment of this right, against disturbance from any quarter, I deem it due to the State I represent to dispute the opinions which conflict with my belief. And I engage in the discussion the more readily from the conviction that, as the advocates of these doctrines manifest a purpose to plant themselves upon whatever ground a true construction of the constitution may require, we may, by a thorough discussion at an early day, discover where is the line of truth, and join together in its maintenance.

The Senator from New York (Mr. DICKINSON,) being as yet the only exponent upon this floor of the doctrine of a right in the inhabitants of our territories to control the question of slavery, I shall proceed to an investigation of the principles he advances. As I understand the Senator, he holds, that the people inhabiting a territory of the United States, have the right of self-government in all that concerns their domestic or internal affairs, as "an inherent right of sovereignty." "That Congress (to use his own words) can exercise legislation only so far as is necessary to protect the interests of the United States; and that the legislation for the people should be exercised by themselves, under the constitution." So far as the logic of my friend is concerned, the admission of his whole proposition would not produce the conclusion he designs. His proposition contains two admissions which press the whole fabric of his argument to the ground. He admits them to be territories of the United States; and while transferring the power of legislation from Congress to the persons inhabiting them, admits they must legislate "under the constitution." Now, in admitting the territory to be "territory of the United States," that is to say, belonging to the people of the States which compose the Union, the further admission is involved of a right in the people of the several United States to enjoy its use. And in admitting that the people of the territory must legislate "under the constitution," he places their authority under the same limitation that would restrain Congress from legislation tending to exclude the citizen of any State from an equal and just participation in the common property. Surely, if the people of the United States own the territory they have a right to enjoy their property without hindrance; and if the constitution covers the territory, the local legislation must be subject to all its limitations. So that, after all, the question raised by the Wilmot Proviso would return with the same force as ever—is there a power of legislation under the constitution, no matter whether in Congress or elsewhere, by which the citizen of any State can be excluded from participating equally with all the rest in the common property of the Union?

But I presume the argument of my friend contemplated a power in the people inhabiting a territory to legislate upon the subject of slavery, and upon all other subjects not relating to the disposal of the soil. I take issue with him here, and utterly deny to the inhabitants of territory of the United States any original power of legislation or government whatever within the territory, except as a result of revolution. In the first place, the Senator's position is opposed to the whole course of legislative practice upon the subject. From the ordinance of 1789 respecting the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, down to the bill relative to the Oregon territory, reported a few days since, Congress has always exercised an exclusive control over the territories. An original right in the inhabitants to govern themselves in any degree whatever has never been recognized, nor until recently ever asserted. In the next place, his position is opposed to the whole current of direct judicial decision, and to the opinions of all the most eminent writers upon American political law.

"All about the right of conduct on a territorial government." — M'Cleod v. State of Mercantile, 1 Wh. R. 122.

Chief Justice Marshall says, speaking of the exclusive power of Congress to govern a Territory belonging to the United States:

"Whether any limitations on this power are to be found in the nature of the contract by which the territory was acquired, is a question of great delicacy, which it is unnecessary now to decide." — 1 Peters' Rep. 548.

"Rules and Regulations respecting the territory of the United States, may be combined with a power to form a government for it." — The Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia, 5 Peters' Rep. 11.

"Perhaps the best reasons which can be assigned for the existence of this power in Congress, to govern a territory brought within the limits of the United States by conquest, is derived from the consideration that the relations of the conquered to the conquering country will be changed." — 1 Peters' Rep. 287.

"As the Congress of nations admits the right to acquire territory either by treaty or conquest, it would seem to follow, as an inevitable consequence, that it possesses the power to govern it, when it becomes acquired. The territory thus acquired, becomes entitled to admission into the Union, as soon as it contains sixty thousand inhabitants, in one State. It may consequently be said to be the domestic concern of the whole people, and that power would be abused by any other, if exercised." — 2d Story's Com. Const. 1324.

To the same effect will be found Rawle on the Constitution, 237; 1 Kent's Commentaries, 383, 386; 3 Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, 198.

I will add an authority from Louisiana, which is the more deserving of attention, from the circumstance that it is to be presumed the bar and court were fully conversant with all the mooted questions of territorial right. The counsel in the case contested "the power of Congress to govern the Territories," and contended, "that, admitting they possess, they cannot delegate it." The court remarks upon this case as follows:

"It can no doubt exist in a country, it would [illegible] the people of the part of the constitution to the United States to which [illegible] their attention. Congress have the power to govern and make all needful rules and regulations with regard to the territory or other property of the United States.' Now, a very needful regulation with regard to the land of the United States, considered as the subject of property, is to provide for its settlement. The individuals who move either as mere emigrants, or as persons [illegible] government, and those thus assembled can establish a government of their own, independent of, and unconnected with the legislature, or the United States, except in the enjoyment of the [illegible] erected be at liberty to decline being incorporated into the Union?"

But let us now try his proposition by general principles. Let me remind the Senator of one or two elemental principles, too well established to require demonstration; as, first, that the legislative power is an attribute of sovereignty. Secondly, that sovereignty is indivisible. I concede that the several attributes or functions of sovereignty may be exerted through divers agencies; but sovereignty, or the exclusive and supreme ultimate authority in a state, from which all political action proceeds, must, from its very nature, be complete, and incapable of division; for, otherwise, there might be in the same state, and at the same time, two supreme powers; which is an absurdity. Now, then, tried by these axioms in political science, how stands his theory of an "inherent" legislative right in the inhabitants of a territory? If they possess it, it must be because they possess, in some degree, sovereignty. If they possess any sovereignty, they possess it in its entirety. If they possess it in its entirety, they are an independent political state, and are of course independent of the United States, as of all the world; and the country covered by their jurisdiction cannot be territory of the United States; for sovereignty comprises an ultimate dominion over all the lands within the boundaries of the society. This conclusion cannot be avoided,

...e premise of the Senator's proposition be conceded, that the ...al States of a territory possess any "inherent right of sovereignty," or of "self-government," whatever. The possession of such ... in any degree, precludes the existence of any supervision or sovereign authority external of the community. I will read a passage from the Senator's remarks, which appears to comprehend his entire views as to the rights of the inhabitants of a territory of the United States:

> "It ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible]

which the citizen brings it. The trustee of the States is as much the agent of one State as another, and is bound to reverence and regard the institutions of each. The tenure by which property in slaves is held, must be treated by the federal government as a rightful tenure, and be protected as property, so long as it is permitted by a State of the Union. This is not the government of the people of New York any more than the people of Virginia.—It is upon this principle that the constitution authorizes the recaption of fugitives, and that the federal government has always claimed indemnity for injuries done by foreign nations to the slave property of citizens of the United States. The federal agency was created as much by the people of the southern States, for the protection and benefit of themselves and their property, as it was by the people of the northern States. It is the government of the whole, because it is the government of each of the States, and not the government of each, because it is the government of the whole. Each adopted it by itself and for itself. Hence, in their federative character, slavery is a legal institution of the people of the United States; and it follows, as a consequence that, upon federative territory, property in slaves is a legal tenure.

If the United States cannot rightfully so discriminate as to exclude a citizen of one of the States, with his slaves, from territory of the United States, nor deprive him of his rightful property in them, neither can it indirectly do so, either by delegating such authority to an agent—for the act of the agent is that of that of the principal; nor by acquiescence in an usurped authority over the subject by its agent: for acquiescence, when there is power to prevent, is adoption. But, on the contrary, the United States government is bound, by an active exertion of its authority, to protect and maintain the rights of all citizens, of legality inhabiting a territory for the exercise of jurisdiction having been confided to the general government, no other power can interfere for the purpose. There is no legitimate authority within the limits of the territory, except as derived from the United States, and constituted, as Congress is, the trustee in possession, it must guaranty the just rights of all interested; and can only fulfil this obligation, or guaranty, by an active suppression of whatever may threaten injury to those rights. If, then, a citizen of a State has a right to go upon the territory with his slaves, the United States is bound to guaranty to him the security of such his property, against all interference while within the limits of the territory; and to prohibit by its mandates, and prevent by the public force, any such interference from any quarter.

But aside of all other arguments, the general principles of right are sufficient to the resolution of the question. The States are united as equals, and the citizens of the United States are associated as equals. From this it follows, that both as States and as citizens, equality in the advantages as well as burdens of the common property is to be observed. In all civil societies—

"A pact to use the words of Puffendorf, think I, which is such in either excessive, or at least useful sense between the society and the members, by which the society engageth to give him a just share and proportion of the goods which it acquires as a commonwealth; and the member pursueth that he will bear his proper and equal part of those burdens which conduce to the preservation of the society, considered as such."

Mr. DICKINSON.—What does Puffendorf say about the United States?

Mr. YULEE.—Vattel, (p. 110,) speaking of common property, describes it as being—

"Common to all the citizens who take a certain rate of it each according to his necessities, or according to the laws which regulate their use."

And, after stating that "the same rules hold good" as to corporate property with respect to the members of the corporation; and to public property with respect to the members of the corporation; and to public property with respect to the whole nation, says. (p. 114:)

"All the members of a corporation have an equal right to the use of a common property. But, respecting the means of enjoying it, the body of the corporation may make such regulations as they think proper, provided those regulations be such as is consistent with that EQUALITY which ought to be preserved in a communion of property. Thus, a corporation may determine the use of a common forest or pasture, either allowing it to all the members according to their wants, or allowing to each an equal share; but they have not a right to exclude any one of the number, or to make a distinction to his disadvantage, by assigning him a less share than that of the others."

Nothing could be more happily expressive of the rights of the people of the United States in respect to the common property in its territories. It was as equals that the States confederated, and justice requires that their equality should be regarded in the whole administration of the federal authority. If the States are to be regarded as equals, then what the same author (Vattel, p. 149) says with respect to independent States, well applies to their relations:

"None can naturally lay claim to any superior prerogative, for whatever privileges any one of them derives from freedom and sovereignty, the others equally derive the same from the same source."

If we may borrow an illustration from the ordinary case of joint or common property among individuals, it will be admitted by all, that while all the joint owners are bound to equal contribution, so all are alike entitled to equal advantages in its use. I need not enlarge upon the importance of justice in the conduct of governments. It is the basis of all society, and without it order, and all the other virtues of social and political life, would soon depart. Its observance is more important even with nations than individuals, and above all should it be an attribute of associate and confederate nations, or united States. No voluntary association can long endure which is not ruled by justice.

Before proceeding to another point in the argument, I will notice, in passing, an objection that may be hastily made by some, to the absolute dependence I have shown to exist on the part of the inhabitants of a territory towards its sovereign. It may be supposed that I regard inhabitants of our territories to be merely vassals or subjects. By no means. I consider that the citizen of a State of the Union who goes upon territory belonging to the United States, goes there as a citizen of the State of which he is a member, and does not lose that relation to his State while resident in the territory, nor until he becomes a member of a new State, by the organization of the inhabitants of the territory into a sovereign community, under the sanction of the United States. It is in that character that he continues to be entitled to the guardianship of his State, and the protection of the United States, in all his just rights, including those of property. As regards inhabitants whose allegiance is acquired with the territory, it may be more difficult to define their precise relation. Let, it suffice, that I, for one, am averse to any acquisitions which bring with them any large body of inhabitants not prepared for early organization into sovereign communities.

Mr. DICKINSON.—If the Senator please, I desire to ascertain his views more fully, by propounding one or two questions.

Mr. YULEE.—Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON.—First. Suppose Canada should be annexed to the United States without any change in her laws; would the institution of slavery exist there without legislation?

Mr. YULEE.—If Canada was acquired as territory, any citizen of a State of this Union could go upon it with his family and property, slaves as well as other, and would be entitled to reside there, securely, under the guarantees of the constitution, while it continued to be a part of the territory belonging to the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON.—One further question. Can Congress, or any other legislative body, exercise any authority or control over the subject, so long as the territory annexed remains a Territory?

Mr. YULEE.—Neither Congress nor any other legislative body would have any authority to pass a law by which the property of a citizen, going rightfully upon such territory, could be divested—no matter whether such property consisted in slaves or anything else. But Congress would be bound, by its duty as the common agent of the people of the States of the Union, to pass all laws necessary to protect him in the undisturbed tenure of such his property. I propose now to consider whether the circumstance that there are inhabitants living upon territory at the date of its acquisition, can alter the results of my preceding argument as to the rights of the people of the United States, with respect to its enjoyment. Is the territory acquired by conquest or purchase any the less a common property of the United States, because there are inhabitants of a foreign origin upon it? Certainly not, as all must concede. Then surely it must be subject to all the rules which apply to a common property as between the owners. Do the inhabitants of foreign origin living upon such territory possess inherently any larger rights than the free citizens of the United States who go upon it? The answer must be, no; for if the right of the sovereign to govern in his territory is absolute, it is absolute as respects all persons who live upon it, without regard to origin. There can be no power or jurisdiction in the territory of a nation independent of its sovereignty.

But let us consider the subject first with reference to the laws and custom of nations, and next with reference to the Constitution of the United States Government.

1. Upon the conquest or purchase of territory, the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the nation losing the territory ceases, and that of the acquiring power simultaneously succeeds. Civil laws, all rules for the government or conduct of civil societies, have force, as laws, only because they express the sovereign and supreme will of the State. When the sovereignty ceases, its will being no longer supreme, the laws which emanated from it necessarily cease of their force. Upon the withdrawal, therefore, of the authority of the former sovereign, the pre-existing institutions and laws instantly expire; for the fountain which gave them vigor and vitality is cut off.

To render the proposition more plain, I will present it in another form. The laws of a nation are confined to the limits of its territorial jurisdiction. When it parts with the jurisdiction of any portion of its domain, the whole body of its laws necessarily retire to the limits of the territory to which its jurisdiction becomes contracted by the cession.

By the political law of nations, then, there would be no laws remaining in force in the territory thus dissevered, and it would remain without government until a code was enacted by the new sovereign. To suppose otherwise, would be to suppose that a nation could extend its laws beyond the limits of its own jurisdiction, and into the jurisdiction of another nation; which would be an absurdity in terms as in principle.

But inasmuch as a period might intervene between the withdrawal of one code of laws and the prescription of another by the new sovereign, the custom has grown up among nations, from a regard for the interests of humanity, and to prevent a total dissolution of social order, of leaving in force, in such cases, those necessary regulations which protect the natural rights of the inhabitants, and preserve order in their social relations. But these regulations rest for their force not upon the enactment of the former sovereign, but upon the assent, which custom presumes, of the new sovereign. The municipal regulations thus allowed to prevail temporarily, are, in the very nature of the custom, limited to the precise necessities of the case, and operate only to govern the relations of the persons thus transferred, between each other, until a new code is provided. They cannot prevail as a law of government for the territory thus acquired; nor can any municipal regulations remain in force which are inconsistent with the prerogative and rights of the new sovereign, or which abridge or embarrass his title to the use of his new acquisition. Of this nature would be any regulation which confiscated or extinguished the property of a citizen of the new sovereignty who came upon the territory to enjoy, of right, its use. The rights of property of the inhabitants remain sacred; but no law of the old government can rightfully remain in force which disturbs the tenure of property in a member of the new sovereignty; for this would be inconsistent with the sovereign right of use.

It is with these limitations we are to receive the doctrine that the municipal laws of a ceded territory remain in force. Any other view of the subject would, as I apprehend, be at war with the whole theory of sovereignty and jurisdiction.

2. It is under and by authority of the constitution that Congress holds the jurisdiction and exercises the government of territories belonging to the United States. This jurisdiction and authority are necessarily exclusive, as I have heretofore shown.

Now then, the ancient laws, municipal or other, can only remain in force, in newly acquired territory, by virtue of an expressed or presumed assent of Congress; but no such assent can be presumed in regard to laws which are incompatible with the rights of the people of the States of the Union under the constitution; for Congress is the creature of the people of the several States, and the constitution is the rule of action they have prescribed to it.

We are now prepared for the more distinct inquiry whether, because slavery was abolished by an ancient edict among the inhabitants of territory newly acquired by the United States, that edict would continue its operation so as to effect the tenure of one of the people of the United States carrying his slave upon it?

I readily concede, that although by the change of jurisdiction the force of the ancient edict would cease, slaves once emancipated by its operation would not be remitted to slavery; for this would be only extinguishing one law of the lapsed sovereignty to revive an older one, which had recognized the slave as property. The inhabitants, whether black or white, freemen or peones, would preserve their respective relations and social condition, as existing at the moment of transfer, so far as might be compatible with the general fundamental policy and laws of the United States.

On the other hand, it must be conceded by every one, that no municipal law could remain in force which would diminish the sovereign authority, or embarrass the use of the territory to its new owner. This is too clear to admit of denial.

Now, let us suppose, first, that the States of this Union were all separate, and that Texas, as an independent community, acquired the territory; of course it would become a part of the domain of Texas. Could any law remain in force in the new territory, after it was covered by the jurisdiction of Texas, which was contrary to her established laws of property? Could the Texan community, the owners, as they would be, of the territory, be excluded from its use, by virtue of any previous ordinance of its ancient sovereign, abolishing slavery? Every one will respond to this, assuredly not. Now, add to the people of Texas those of the other fourteen slaveholding States as united purchasers with her: would not the result be the same? Add, then, the people of the fifteen northern States: would their accession as joint owners alter the just rights of the others? If so, the government of the United States may be considered as a government of and for the North, and not of and for the whole people of the Union.

Again: The Catholic religion is established in Mexico, and Protestantism is excluded by law: would that law or regulation remain in force in territory we may at any time acquire from Mexico? Certainly not; for Congress being restrained by the constitution from making any laws inconsistent with "the free exercise" of religion, as soon as jurisdiction of the United States attached, all laws creating distinctions between citizens of different religions would at once expire. Why? Because such laws would be contrary to a fundamental principle of the federative compact. And clearly, for the same reason, all laws which would create inequality or discrimination between the citizens of the United States in any other respect, would expire; for equality of rights in the citizens of the Union is, in like manner, a fundamental principle of the federative compact. But if the doctrine that all municipal laws remained in force until repealed, was correct, then the Mexican restriction upon the freedom of religion would continue permanently in force; for Congress could not repeal it, being prohibited by the constitution from "making any law respecting an establishment of religion." And on the supposition that the Senator was correct in his opinion, that the inhabitants of the territory, and the right of legislation, it would be continued in force so long as the population acquired with the territory maintained the ascendancy. Nay, the restriction might be continued even after the establishment of a State government; for the State would have the right to create a religious establishment; and, in the event of our incorporating any densely-populated part of Mexico, such would assuredly be the consequence.

It will be observed that I have treated laws recognizing or abolishing property in slaves as municipal, simply. It may well be doubted whether, under any system of government, laws of this description, from their deep bearing upon the social and civil relations, are not entitled to be regarded as fundamental in their nature, and appropriately pertaining to the class as political laws.

But, with reference to our system of government, if I am not mistaken, there can be no doubt. I have endeavored to show, in a preceding part of my argument, that the territory of the United States being federative property, must be held in subserviency to the equal political right of all the parts of the Union to benefit from it; and that property in slaves, being recognized in a large portion of the Union, is therefore to be regarded a part of the political system of the United States in their federative relation. If I am correct in this, the equal right to the use of territory, and the right to hold slave property in federative territory, are political rights under the federative compact, and are thus a part of the fundamental political law under the constitution. It would follow, then, that all ancient laws, in territories acquired by the United States, which might disturb a citizen of the government in his right to an equal use of it, and to the secure tenure of his slave property while upon it, would be extinguished, because in conflict with the political system of the new sovereign; for it is universally admitted, that the laws of a political bearing, or as they are denominated, political laws, would cease of their force upon a change of sovereignty. Congress could pass no law which conflicted with the political system of the Union—a fortiori, Mexico can transmit no laws for our territories which are of that nature.

The conclusion I reach seems to be sustained by sufficient reasons. No law or regulation can remain in force or be enacted in any territory belonging to the United States which is incompatible with the rights of the people of the United States under the constitution, no matter whether such territory be acquired with or without inhabitants.

Mr. DICKINSON.—As the Senator from Florida denies the doctrine of self-government asserted by the resolutions which I had the honor to introduce, and seems to insist that the people of a territory have no sovereign rights, it will doubtless afford him pleasure to correct the doctrine whenever asserted. He has, thus far, treated it as a northern heresy. He now beg he will turn his attention for a moment, to some expressions of opinion originating where the Senator can take no exception to the venue. I will first ask him to consider and refute an able and elaborate article in the October number of the Southern Quarterly Review, published at Charleston, South Carolina, upon the subject of territorial government of the United States; reviewing, among others, a speech delivered at the last session of Congress by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) upon this question. The writer treats deep research as well as profound thought, and evinces a thorough knowledge of the subject of which he treats. From this article, treating the subject at length, the following is a brief extract:

"If the new State, then in her sovereign capacity, exercises the right, and rights, it is because it is asserted to be so. We are not compelled to Congress to say that we have no authority in the constitution which declares in terms that the majority of an inchoate State shall vest Congress, and we, to be converted a kind of sitting sovereign. Where then did the sovereign power reside? It was a State. It will be admitted, that it is the universal principle, that sovereignty resides in the people of a State, where not [illegible] the exercise of the [illegible] and not in the Congress of the United States."

The editor of the Review approves this doctrine in a note, and holds the following language:

"It is not necessary, however, to determine on the subject. Sovereignty must be somewhere. The existing States having disposed with their rights, it is possible that it is not in the United States, for they take only a right to be exercised according to certain terms. They can make a temporary or provisional government—no more. Where then is the sovereignty—all the powers exercised, and attributes belonging to every people? We answer, where it originally was, and where it must be, according to our theory of popular government, in the people of the territory, nation, or state."

I will now call the attention of the Senator to an able and learned speech of the Hon. Thomas H. Bayly, of Virginia, in the House of Representatives, at the last session, upon the subject of territorial government, where the principle of territorial government is strongly enforced. I append the following, an extract:

"I have great doubts about our power to establish for the territories even temporary governments; and these doubts are strengthened by the proceeding of the convention which framed the constitution. On the 13th of August, Mr. Madison submitted, in order to be referred to the committee of detail, among others, the following powers as proper to be added to those of the general legislature:

"To dispose of the unappropriated lands of the United States.

"To institute temporary governments for the new States arising therein."

"The first branch of this proposition was virtually adopted. What became of the second? It shared the fate of the proposition to confer upon Congress the power to grant charters of incorporation, to establish a university, and to construct canals, &c. The convention refused to confer the power contained in it. In the only territories which we then possessed, a temporary government already existed, and the convention was willing to leave it to the people of the territory themselves to make such alterations as might become necessary. I am very much inclined to the opinion that the only legitimate authority which the territorial governments possessed is derived, not from the legislation of Congress, but the adoption and the acquiescence by the people of the territories in it. We have performed the part of another Locke, and prepared constitutions in which the people of the territories have acquiesced; but they have derived their sanction from the governing, and not the governed. To the Congress, and not to the power of legislation is a very different thing. Legislation is action itself—constitutions contain the forms of action. And so far from the practice of the government having sanctioned the power of legislation over the territories, now sought to be exerted, in the power and better days of the republic, it was decidedly forbidden away."

"The attempt by the old Congress to legislate for the territories was always considered by sound republicans as a usurpation of power; and after the adoption of the present constitution, it was never deliberately attempted in the purer and better days of the republic."

"In the law creating Michigan into a separate territorial government, there was no attempt at territorial legislation; nor was there in the case of Illinois, or of Missouri. In the case of Wisconsin there was; and the conditions and restrictions of the ordinance of 1787 were neglected. But it was done in a careless and ambiguous phraseology which caused it to pass unnoticed. It was not attempted in the case of Iowa; nor in the bill of the last session relative to the Oregon territory, until the 6th article of the ordinance of 1787 was ingrafted on it, upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr WINTHROP. On the contrary, in most of these acts, all legislative power, except such as relates to the disposal of the public lands, is recognized as existing in the territorial legislature."

* * * * * * * *

"But it has been asked, why do most of these laws organizing territorial governments require that they be passed by the territorial legislature shall be submitted to Congress, and do not declare that they shall be null if disapproved? and they, if this does not prohibit by reserving the power of legislation? On the contrary, these provisions but recognize a sort of congressional veto, which exists, nothing, in a standing affirmative, but put it in the power of Congress to use it or let it alone, and leave things as they were. The object is evident. It is to enable Congress to arrest territorial legislation relative to the public lands, the exclusive right of legislation in reference to which is reserved to Congress. And it is believed that there is no instance where Congress has interposed, except in cases where the territorial legislatures have attempted to pass laws affecting the public lands."

Georgia, at a Democratic State Convention recently held at Milledgeville, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the people of the South do not ask of Congress to establish the institution of slavery in any of the territory of the United States, but they claim, as a right, that the inhabitants of each territory shall be left free to regulate for themselves, whether the institution of slavery shall or shall not form a part of their social system.

The resolutions which I had the honor to introduce have been sustained by the democratic portion of the public press in almost every State of the Union, South as well as North—including the State of Florida; and in Virginia, Louisiana, and numerous other States have been adopted word for word and by name, as asserting the true constitutional principle upon the subject of territorial government. The Senator from Florida will doubtless explain why it is that this, to his conception, dangerous and heretical doctrine should be so extensively tolerated and asserted at the South as well as North?

Mr. YULEE.—The Senator calls my attention to the resolutions of a democratic convention of Georgia, and to the opinions of a distinguished member of the other House from Virginia, and of a writer in the Southern Review, with a view of showing that the doctrine of a right in the inhabitants of territory of the United States to act upon the subject of slavery was recognized in the South. The Georgia resolutions, to which he referred, will not sustain the object with which he referred to them; for I find that they expressly declare, "It is the constitutional right of every citizen to remove and settle with his property in any of the territories of the United States." But I will beg leave to present, as the best evidence of the position of the South upon the subject, the resolutions of several of the State legislatures, passed in every instance by unanimous votes.

For this purpose, I will read one of the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, which is in the following language:

"2. Resolved, unanimously, That, under no circumstances will the body recognize as binding any enactment by the Federal Government which has for its object the prohibition of slavery in any territory to be acquired either by conquest or treaty, holding it to be the natural and indefeasible right of each and every citizen of every State of this Confederacy to reside with his property, of whatever description, in any territory which may be acquired by the arms of the United States, or yielded by treaty with any foreign power."

A resolution of the Georgia Legislature, as follows:

"2. Be it further resolved by the authority aforesaid, That any territory acquired or to be acquired by the arms of the United States, or by treaty with a foreign power, becomes the common property of the several States composing this Confederacy; and whilst it so continues, it is the right of each citizen, of each and every State, to reside with his property of every description within such territory."

A resolution of the Alabama Legislature:

"2. Be it further resolved, That under no circumstances will the body recognize as binding any enactment of the Federal Government, which has for its object the prohibition or slavery in any territory to be acquired either by conquest or treaty, holding it to be the natural and indefeasible right of each citizen of each and every State of the Confederacy to reside with his property of every description, in any territory which may be acquired by the arms of the United States, or yielded by treaty with any foreign power."

These resolutions present, as I hold, the true position of the great body of the South; and, upon this position, I stand with them.

Mr. FOOTE here requested to be allowed to read an amendment, which he stated it was the purpose of Mr. DICKINSON to accept as an addition to his second resolution, and which he stated was prepared and agreed upon some time since, and which was in the following words:

"In subscription to the federal constitution, and reserved rights of the States and people."

Mr. YULEE.—I am obliged to the Senator for the information. He was so good as to show me the amendment yesterday. But, while I recognize in it a good spirit, and a disposition to make the constitution to which they will conform, I must frankly say, it does not meet the issue. The effect of the amendment would be only to declare that the local legislature must legislate under the constitution, leaving wholly undetermined the material point, what are the rights of the people of the southern States under the constitution, in respect to the use of the territory?

Before I take my seat, I desire to say, that if, in discussing this subject, I have directed my remarks principally to a reply to the argument of the Senator from New York (Mr. DICKINSON,) it has not been because of any desire to embark in a controversial debate with him. But differing from the views of which he stood forth as the exponent upon this floor, I felt it my duty to present counter resolutions to those he had proposed; and, in supporting my position, I have been obliged to review his doctrines with such strictness of scrutiny, as the occasion seemed to me to require. I am sure that, in the course of my remarks, I have designed to say nothing inconsistent with the friendly feelings I take pleasure in cultivating towards him, nor with the thanks I owe him and his friends, for throwing the weight of their great influence against the mischievous spirit of Abolitionism and Wilmotism.

Sir, it has seemed to me a duty of patriotism to offer my humble views, unimportant as they may be, to the consideration of the Senate. The question has seemed to me vital to the Union. It strikes at the equality of the States; and when that equality is subverted, those who are the subject of the degradation, and yet abide in the Union, must be content to abide in it as serfs, not as freemen. An eminent political philosopher, whose writings I have before had occasion to quote in the course of this argument, says truly, that the weaker States in a confederacy are reduced to the condition of dependant provinces, whenever "they allow any lasting PREFERENCE OF PREROGATIVE to those that are stronger, and engage themselves in UNEQUAL ALLIANCES."

Senators, I shall be saying only what our proud sister States of the North will heartily respond to, when I declare that no American State, which holds in proper esteem her birthright of Liberty, can endure any Union which is not a confederacy of equals.

THANKS TO GENERAL SCOTT.

The VICE PRESIDENT.—The first special order is the joint resolution from the House of Representatives expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott, and the troops under his command, for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I move that further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BREESE.—Mr. President: I never rise in this presence upon the most ordinary occasion, either to explain or defend a measure purely local in its character, without some embarrassment; and that feeling is greatly increased, as you may well suppose, when questions of vital importance to the nation are under discussion, calling forth, as those have, connected with this bill, the best efforts of the most distinguished members of this body. Nothing, sir, but an overwhelming sense of the duty I owe to the State which has honored me so much, and whose patriotism has been so signally exhibited from the very commencement of this war, and whose people take the deepest interest in its progress and success, could have broken the silence I had imposed upon myself, so far as the mere object of the bill itself is concerned. It is upon those great topics, which throw the bill quite into the shade, that I wish to express my opinions fully and without reserve—premising however, that they are my own individual opinions, for which neither the administration, nor any member of it, nor the party with which I act, are in the slightest degree responsible. They have been formed after much careful deliberation and anxious inquiry, and with a desire solely to arrive at correct conclusions; and if they are unsound, or of wicked and dangerous tendency, or impracticable, they will find no echo in the public heart, and influence in no degree the public judgment. My State, sir, has a right to this expression from me to enable it to judge if I properly sustain here the important relation their partiality has created between us, and if I fully meet all the responsibilities which it imposes upon me. I have said, sir, that the people of that great and patriotic State take the most lively interest in this war and in all the questions connected with it, and look with confidence and hope to some grand achievement as its final result. From its inception, on the first call to arms to repel the aggressive act of Mexico, and to punish her for her injustice and her wanton invasion of our territory, the people there, with one heart and one mind, were found on the side of their country, the only strife among them being a generous rivalry as to who could best serve it in the hour of its need.—Eight thousand of its choicest chivalry offered themselves at the call, of whom four thousand were accepted who repaired at once to the field, with an alacrity never before manifested, and in the campaign which followed, covered themselves with undying glory.

It was my fortune, sir, to be addressing the Senate at the last session, on the three million bill, on the very day of the hard fought battle of Buena Vista, when my thoughts, as they had often done before, turned to those noble spirits, my neighbors and my friends, who had left all the fond endearments of home—severing those dear family ties they knew so well how to appreciate—to do battle for their country in a foreign land, inspired only by the fervor of a generous patriotism, when I was prompted thus to speak of them:

"They have proved, by the sufferings they have endured by disease, and by performing the most wonderful marches in modern time—advancing forty miles in a day—living on one ear of corn at night with half rations—and showing by their discipline and prompt obedience to orders, that they can be relied upon in any and every emergency; and though it has been denied them to participate in the perils of the battle field, they have given the strongest assurances, that in it, they would not fail to reap a full harvest of glory."

That prophecy, sir, was at that very moment fact—at that very hour they were gathering glory at the cannon's mouth, and so long as Buena Vista shall be a familiar word—so long as the mountains there, in whose sight they fought and fell, shall lift their summits to the sky—so long will the valorous deeds of the gallant

Illinoisans be remembered and rehearsed. At Cerro Gordo, too, sir, they exhibited like evidences of gallantry, exalting by their deeds, not only the character of their State, but of the whole country, to which they had so signally manifested their devotion. These troops, sir, were of the best blood of the State, composed of gentlemen of character at home, each one of whom, in battle, felt as if he had not only the character of his country to sustain, but his own individual character, and that made them then, as they will be ever, invincible. And, sir, so far as the immediate object of this bill is concerned, and in answer to the remark, that the troops cannot be raised by it in any reasonable time, I should not fear to pledge myself that on its being known that it had become a law, one-half of the whole number can be there instantly raised, of the same material and under the same inspiration. The people of that State, sir, are fully impressed with the justice of this war, and the denunciations indulged in here and elsewhere, against the Executive as its author, will have no effect upon them to turn them to peace, or to oppose the government in any of its measures to carry it on vigorously in the very heart of the enemy's country, and they are not to be appalled at the unfortunate results which, in the opinion of some Senators, may flow from it, nor can they be made to think they will be so dreadful as depicted. I had hoped, Mr. President, from indications which I thought I saw when this bill was first reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, that it would receive the general assent of this body, and that those denunciations to which we have listened so long, would have been reserved for some more favorable occasion, when the progress of no great public measure would be impeded by them, and a better opportunity afforded for the most unlimited discussion and the widest range of debate; but in this I have been disappointed, and the hazard of further delay, I must endeavor to repel these assaults, and place the administration, and those who support it, right before the country, and furnish a justification for their and our conduct. Senators need not think this war is unpopular; in this they deceive themselves; every successful war is popular; and bold declarations that it is unjust and unconstitutionally commenced, will not satisfy those who are to pass upon our conduct. The people, sir, will not be deluded by such declarations—they will require of those who make them, to sustain them by facts, by reasoning, and by fair argument; and I call upon Senators on the other side of the chamber to demonstrate, if they can, with all their legal acumen, acknowledged ability, and power of investigation, why it is that the war is unjust and unconstitutionally commenced? Will they reply that it was by the removal of our troops to the bank of the Rio Grande? —that such removal was an act of war, and being ordered by the President, he acted therein in a manner not warranted by the constitution? This they have done, and the allegation involves, necessarily, the consideration of our right to be there with our troops, and the question of boundary, and if it has been established, as I think it has been, that the river was the true and only boundary of Texas, and that Mexico invaded that State to recover it to the Sabine, the right to have our forces there cannot be controverted. And here, sir, it will be necessary, in some degree, in discussing this point, to travel over ground heretofore occupied by others; and without derogating from the arguments of others on this point, I must be permitted to say, that the argument of my honorable colleague (Mr. DOUGLAS,) was most clear and convincing. He has shed such a flood of light upon it—has so brilliantly illuminated it —that none can any longer be in error, or go astray, except from mere design and wanton perversity. I accord with him, sir, fully in all its views on that point; and to show, sir, that it is not a sudden opinion and hastily formed, I beg leave to quote a few passages from the speech I had the honor to deliver in June, 1844, on the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) pending the treaty of annexation. After stating the principal facts connected with the history of Mexico and Texas, I said:

> In 1824 Santa Anna, then a victorious general pharisaing the sentiment of republicanism, assisted in the overthrow of the monarchy, encouraged, or rather took advantage of, the then popular and military sentiment, and, with many others, was elevated to the presidency. Under this form of government, and during the year 1835, and in many a hard fought conflict the Texans were victorious. At the moment of their most triumphant success, he struck at the very principle on which, it is asserted that they had recourse to arms in defence of the republican principles of the federal constitution of 1824. If all this is worth anything to the Mexican confederacy, it is equally so to the Texan; and if the one is justified in the overthrow of the federal principles and appealing to arms in defence of the confederacy, pledged their aid to each of them as would resist the military despotism then being established within their borders. No other State but Texas dared to resist; and, in the case of Texas, the people, not the government, commenced the struggle, and, in the end, it was successful. A new constitution of the people soon succeeded. At Bexar, in March, 1836, an assault upon the country was made, and the Alamo, under the lead of Travis, was gallantly defended by a handful of men under the command of the brave Travis, Bowie, Crockett and Bonham, who were all put to death. Thus ended the first campaign, and the second and third campaigns, commenced and finished soon after, in the defeat of all the armies and organized resistance rendered unavailing, and closed the [illegible] of independence and a constitution to be submitted to the people for their approval, and in fifty days thereafter—on the 21st of April, on the banks of the San Jacinto—proved their ability to maintain it, and rewrote it in characters of blood."

I then said, sir, that,

> "The second government of opposite principles Mexico has set up and to subjugate Texas. Against [illegible] the commencement of all which [illegible] has been upon the ground that [illegible] and [illegible] of Texas [illegible] of Mexico? Has England a right to subjugate [illegible] because [illegible] Texas [illegible] Mexico has a right to commence an unjust war of aggression upon a peaceable neighbor, for the purpose of subjecting such a one to its power, for the mere purpose of conquest? It is in violation of the law of God, and of those great principles of Justice he has established.
> Texas was never a party to the present federal government of Mexico. She was a party to her federative system, but not to her central despotism, and owes to it no fealty. Her history, as already recited, proves this; and the conclusion is irresistible, that being in that position towards Mexico, she has a right to maintain it if she can, and every engaged therein [illegible] and abettors, should receive, as they would deserve, the execrations of the world."

And, Mr. President, I entertain these opinions now, and I assert that the whole history of the relations of Texas with Mexico show that the former was never a party to any other system of government, as a component part of the latter, than as a member of the federal republican system of 1824. She resisted successfully the sway of Iturbide in 1823, which she had a perfect right to do; and so would any one of the States of this Union possess this right, under similar circumstances. I will take Maine as an instance, as that is a frontier State, and newly admitted into the union of States on a federative system. How did she join it, and on what principles? That she was a sovereign and independent State, with a republican form of government, uniting her fortunes with the other States, with the same forms of government. Now suppose, sir—but it is hardly a supposable case—that all the rest of the States of the confederacy, except Maine, should agree to abolish the federative system and their republican forms of government, and establish a monarchy, or a despotism, would they, united, have the right to coerce Maine, by force of arms, to do the same thing—to abolish her forms, and subject her to the control of a system of government radically different from the one she had joined? No, sir, no. Maine would have a perfect right to declare and maintain her independence, if she could; and a war waged to subjugate her, would be a war waged in wrong. No Senator will deny this.

Well, sir, this was the position of Texas, and, as I have said, she re-wrote her declaration of independence on the bank of the San Jacinto, on the 21st of April, 1836, in characters of blood; and as we point to the fourth of July, 1776, as the first year of our independence, and to the triumphant Yorktown as confirming it, so can Texas point to the second of March, 1836, and to the victory of San Jacinto, as like memorable eras in her history.

The independence of Texas, Mr. President, we all know, was manifested by adopting a constitution and a name, as applicable to that division of the earth's surface composing the Republic of Texas. Her Congress met under this constitution, and among the acts passed by it, is one of the 19th December, 1836, declaring the boundaries of the republic, as one of the independent nations of the earth, which was, upon the west, the west bank of the Rio Grande, from its mouth to its source; and this, in conformity with the treaty, pact, or agreement, made with the head of the Mexican government—the usurper Santa Anna—immediately after the battle of San Jacinto. This act of Congress was a public act, and as such must be presumed to have been in the knowledge of our government, in 1837, when the independence of Texas was acknowledged, and diplomatic relations entered into with her. It gave to us, and to the world, notice of the extent of that republic—of the extent of that portion of an independent sovereignty called Texas. But it is said, sir, that one nation cannot make a boundary for herself. As a general remark, it may be sustained by facts, as coterminous nations usually establish their boundaries by treaty; but cannot a nation enlarge its boundaries, or prescribe a boundary for itself, without the consent of another coterminous nation? Suppose France, engaged in a defensive war with the neighboring powers, should carry her victorious arms to the Elbe, and, by a decree, incorporate the conquered countries within her dominion, and declare the Elbe, and not the Alps and the Rhine, her boundary, and could maintain it, would she not have a right to do so? So of Maine, sir, if she was separated from the confederacy by the revolutionary acts of her sister States, remaining an independent State, capable of forming such relations with the nations of the earth as their interests required, she protecting and sustaining herself, should she be invaded from the adjacent British provinces, and was able to drive her foe beyond the river St. John, and maintain her sovereignty and jurisdiction up to that river—declare it a part of her territory, and the leading nations of the world, who make the law of the world, should treat with her as an independent State, with that boundary—would not the right of Maine to that enlargement of territory and extension of boundary be a perfect right? If otherwise, I would ask why?

England, France, Holland, and Belgium, two of them certainly, the leading powers of the world, also acknowledged the independence of Texas with these defined limits, as a republic—as a nation of the earth capable by its position of making war, concluding peace, and clothed with all the attributes of an independent sovereignty. I place much more stress upon these acts of recognition by the great powers of the world than others seem to do, and I must confess, sir, they have had a controlling influence on my mind in forming my opinion. They declare, in effect, that the division of the earth called the republic of Texas with certain prescribed limits, is an independent power of the earth, and entitled to all the immunities of nations, of which the right to a boundary is one. Suppose, sir, this government, France or England had, after acknowledging the independence of Texas, entered into a treaty of alliance with her, offensive and defensive, would not we, and they, be required to defend her, up to the boundary she claimed, against any invasion from Mexico? Clearly, sir, this would be the extent of the obligation under such a treaty. If this be so, then was our duty more imperative, after we had allured her to our embrace—had prevailed on her to embark her fortunes with ours—to transfer her lone star gleaming in solitary splendor to our field of azure—to sink her nationality in our own—to yield her proud position as an independent nation to become a subordinate State—to defend her against all aggression with the best blood of our people; to the last cent in our treasury; and with the whole might of the nation. We were bound, most religiously bound, to defend Texas in her entirety, and it was for that purpose, and with no other view our troops were ordered to take their position on the western limits of that State. An invasion was threatened. War had been denounced both before and after the annexation. Have Senators forgotten our efforts made in the fall of 1845, and in all sincerity and good faith to prevent this resort to arms? Did we not before that, assure Mexico, that in what we had done by incorporating Texas into the Union, we intended no unkindness to her—that we could not but consider Texas an independent nation, and the power of Mexico over it gone forever, and did we not propose an amicable adjustment of the matter, and seek to heal the wound inflicted upon her pride? And how were these our declarations, and this our attempt at adjustment by sending a minister to them on their promise to receive him, treated by that power? We all know, sir, and it is useless to speak of them. Our minister was rejected—Mexico even refused to talk with him—refused to hear our propositions; and still persisted in her determination to repossess herself of Texas by arms, she never alleging at any time any other claim to Texas than the claim to the Sabine, and taking no exception to the position of our troops within that territory, for it will be recollected that preparatory to receiving our minister, she only requested that our naval force should be withdrawn from her coast, lest it might appear if she negotiated at all, it would be considered she did so under a menace. She never desired that the army should be removed.

If, sir, the right to Texas was a doubtful one, what was the duty of Mexico under such circumstances? Certainly to hear what we had to say about it—to listen to propositions of settlement, to negotiate, if possible; for there are but two ways of settling such disputes: negotiation and arms—and as Mexico has chosen the latter, I, for one, am determined she shall feel our might, and while we have her in our power compel her to yield up the fullest measure of indemnity for all her past transgressions and enormities, and make no accommodation with her until this is done.

Sir, in my view of the duty of nations disputing about a doubtful right, we would have been perfectly justified by declaring war against Mexico on her refusal to receive our minister; for, sir, it is incumbent on the contesting nation to negotiate, and to submit to an honorable compromise. If a nation will not do this, the other party to the contest has a right to resort to arms to compel an adjustment of the question, and though war does not decide the right, yet a victory usually puts it in the power of the successful party to enforce a compliance with the demand—at least, this is so understood among civilized nations.

Sir, the annexation of Texas was decided on by the people with their eyes open—in view of the threats of Mexico that she would declare war—and they were willing to have war rather than lose Texas; and the effort is vain, worse than useless, to attempt to make them believe that it is an unjust war or a war of aggression on our part. They have too much sense for this. No, sir, they are fully convinced of its justice, and it is, therefore, popular; and no declamation can drive them from the position they have taken to support it with zeal and energy. In view of the facts and reasons presented, no doubt can remain that the war was brought on by the act of Mexico, and so declared by an almost unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress on the 13th of May, 1846, by the law of that date in response to the message of the Executive unfolding its causes, and ushered to the world in the usual mode by the proclamation of the President.

Although, practically, war had been commenced on the 24th of April, 1846, by the attack of Mexico on a detachment of our troops, and again on the 8th and 9th of May, and existed on those days as perfectly as the hostilities of a foreign power can cause it to exist—they not being predatory incursions, made without authority or without apparent cause, and with a view to plunder—but undertaken in pursuance of previous official notifications to our government, that war should follow the annexation of Texas, which Mexico regarded as a revolted province, and to which her right had not been at all invalidated by the act of annexation, yet, so far as we were concerned—so far as our relations, nationally and individually, were involved, the war had its constitutional existence on the passage of the act of the 13th of May, 1846. That act changed our relations from peace to war—recognized the practical fact, that the act of Mexico had produced it—and we gave it our sanction, and published our acknowledgment of it to the world in the usual mode. The phraseology of the act declaring it, is nearly identical with that of the 18th of June, 1812, as Senators may see who will examine. Both proceeded from messages of the President detailing the causes, and both were announced to the world by proclamations; and, yielding to no one in my sense of the justice of the war of 1812 with Great Britain, I am constrained to say, sir, that the justice of this loses nothing by the comparison, and as that war was denounced as "Jim Madison's war," as unjust, and aggressive, so is this denounced as Mr. Polk's war, and with equal boldness its injustice proclaimed. The causes of the war of 1812 have been alluded to by the Senator of Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD;) they were good causes, and such as should have prompted the nation, with one heart, to rise up and defend its rights; and as that had, so will this have, a glorious issue. But, sir, our then enemy had not invaded our territory, had murdered none of our citizens, though they had forcibly impressed them in their naval service and flagrantly invaded our neutral rights. To bring on this war and to add to the injury inflicted upon us by the robbery and murder of our citizens, Mexico invaded the soil of one of our sister States, threatening to subjugate it, defying alike our power and our right. Mexico commenced the war for conquest, avowedly to conquer Texas, of which she alleged she had been unjustly despoiled by us; and as she had repeatedly declared she would do, she sought by force to recover it, and the whole of it, to the Sabine. She sought conquest—sought to rob us of one of the brightest gems in our national coronet—and though the issue could not be doubtful, yet the attempt was an indignity, adding insult to former injuries, and should have been met and repulsed, as it has been, by the power of the nation, and merited chastisement inflicted. Are Senators tell me for what purpose the Mexican army was on the bank of the Rio Grande, if it was not to carry out the oft repeated threat to recover Texas by force? It was for no other purpose, and its leader embraced the first favorable opportunity to make the invasion, and it has never been disavowed by the government. Sir, as to the justice of this war, in view of all these things, it loses nothing in comparison with that of 1812; and that war was denounced in terms equally violent and unmeasured with this. The party at that day arrayed against it when it was declared, was eager to get the nation into it years before Congress acted. Every effort was made to influence the minds of the people against Great Britain, and appeals of the most inflammatory character, accompanied by attacks upon the administration, of the want of spirit and patriotism, were constantly made; and they asserted that it was so tame and spiritless that it "could not be kicked into a war." As early as 1806, a leading federal print of that day, declared that "the disputes between this country and England, so long attended with rigor on her part, and injury on ours, will not admit of much longer vain complaints and harsh recriminations. They must terminate shortly in the silence of war or peace." And again in the same year it declared, "they [the democrats in Congress] dare not resist all aggressions alike, and assume the part of spirited impartiality, as a magnanimous policy requires. If war is called for by the insulted honor of the country; if the cup of conciliation is drained to the dregs, as they declare it to be, let the war be declared; let an embargo be laid; adequate funds provided; the strong arm of defence nerved and extended; and a powerful navy ordered. In these measures the whole country, from Georgia to Maine, convinced of their propriety, will be united."

These extracts are from the Boston Centinel, then the leading federal paper of the Union.

A letter from Washington, of the same year, says: "Fear, prejudice, or some other dastardly principle, is continually crossing the path of our rulers, and the loud call of our country, its commerce and spoiled merchants, for energetic purposes, is unheard or disregarded. My fears are that the President's messages will only be supported by windy debates, or pen and ink reports."

Although the "Centinel" had proposed an embargo, yet when it was laid in 1807, it said, "the embargo which the government has just laid is of a new and alarming nature. War, great as the evil is, has less terror, and will produce less misery, than an embargo on such principles."

When—forbearance ceasing to be a virtue—war was declared, the Senate of Massachusetts resolved that "it was founded in falsehood, declared without necessity, and its real object was extent of territory by unjust conquests, and to aid the late tyrant of Europe in his view of aggrandizement."

And the pulpit, where politics should not enter, became also a theatre in which its ministers sought to inflame the public mind against the administration of their country, and place it in the wrong, in the sight of their powerful enemy and the world.

One of them, highly distinguished by his position as the Rector of the Trinity church in Boston, in a discourse delivered in July, 1812, said, "This is a war unexampled in the history of the world; wantonly proclaimed on the most frivolous and groundless pretenses against a nation from whose friendship we might derive the most signal advantages, and from whose hostility we have reason to dread the most tremendous losses." Again, "Every provocation has been offered to Great Britain on our part, and our resentment has risen in proportion as she has shown a conciliatory spirit."

And then up his pious fervor he exhorts his hearers thus: "Let no consideration whatever, my brethren, deter you at all times, and in all places, from execrating the present war. It is a war unjust, foolish, and ruinous." And, "as Mr. Madison has declared the war, let Mr. Madison carry it on."

And, not to be outdone in the hostility here exhibited, another eminent divine, at Medford, the Rev. Dr. Osgood, endeavored to prevent his countrymen from enlisting in the service, and from loaning money to the government, to carry on the war. Here is what he says:

"If at the command of a weak or wicked ruler, they undertake an unjust war, each man who volunteers his services in the cause, or loans his money for its support, or by his conversation, his writings, or any other mode of influence, encourages its promotion, that man is an accomplice in the wickedness, and his conscience with the blackest crimes, brings the guilt of blood upon his soul, and in the sight of God and his law, is a MURDERER."

Another one, a reverend doctor also, gave his hearers, if there were any that justified the war, this consolation: "Let every man who sanctions this war by his suffrage or influence, remember that he is laboring to cover himself and his country with blood. The blood of the slain will cry from the ground against him." "And he asks "how will the supporters of this anti-christian warfare endure their sentence; endure their own reflections; endure the fire that forever burns—the worm which never dies—the lasciviousness of heaven—while the smoke of their torments ascends forever and ever."

The press too, sir, that mighty engine, operating with such wonderful power on the public mind, in the very midst of the war, when loans were necessary to carry it on, and our honor and our all at issue, was engaged in most unholy and unpatriotic efforts to embarrass the government by attempting to detect capitalists from loaning their money; and I fear, sir, similar attempts may be made now, but I hope not.

Here are two extracts from the leading federal and anti-war papers of that day:

"We [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ...

All of us, I believe sir, were willing in 1846, and expected, that the war would be carried into the heart of Mexico. I recollect well, sir, a remark of the distinguished Senator of North Carolina, (Mr. MANGUM;) who has not spoken to this bill, that if he could be satisfied that the war did exist—if there should be no disavowal on the part of the Mexican government, of the act of crossing the Rio Grande and attacking our troops, he would vote, not only ten thousand, but fifty, or a hundred thousand men, and if necessary, proceed to the plaza of the city of Mexico, and there dictate a peace. I believe it was well understood, then, sir, at least such is the inference I draw from the remarks of that honorable Senator, that crossing the Rio Gande by Mexican troops, would be an invasion of our territory, and that we must not only repel it, but carry the war with sufficient array, into the enemy's country, and this Senator expressed a most cheerful willingness, to give the government all the means, both of men and money, requisite for such a prosecution of the war, and at the last session, the same patriotic spirit was manifested for the supplies were then granted with very little opposition, only three I believe voting against the bill to raise an additional military force, and but two against the loan bill. And why Senators should now refuse to support a measure like this, to reinforce the army, I am at a loss to conceive; nor can I reconcile it with the vote they have already given on an amendment proposed to it.

Mr. MANGUM.—The honorable Senator refers to certain remarks which I am reported to have made, introductory to my vote upon the bill recognizing the existence of the war, and certainly an erroneous inference has been drawn from those remarks, or else I did not understand myself. The question was raised, whether we should cross the Rio Grande for the purpose of chastising our enemy; well, I never doubted, that in the case of aggression on their part, it was entirely proper for us to pursue them even to the heart of their country, but an inference is not to be drawn from this, that I contemplated any thing like conquest. This, I have been utterly opposed to, as my recorded votes will show. At the time when we were called upon to recognize the existence of the war, we had heard of a collision having taken place, but we knew not how it originated, the documents were not before us to be read, and we were driven to a vote at once, and were obliged to vote in the dark, but on that occasion, I did not doubt that we had a right to cross the Rio Grande, in order to chastise an aggression, that was my meaning, and if my remarks are correctly reported, they meant that and no more than that, and therefore, I repel the inference that I was desirous or willing to go into a career of conquest.

Mr. BREESE.—I will read, sir, an extract from the remarks, of the honorable Senator, as reported in the Congressional Globe:

"He and his friends are ready to grant whatever men and money were requisite in half an hour. And before the men raised could arrive at their destination, the requisite sum would have been afforded to defray them intelligently, and on authentic evidence, whether a state of war did, or did not exist. If it did, then Mr. M. stood be unwilling to restrain the action of our forces to the far bank of the Rio del Norte. If we were actually at war, then he was under the impression that our forces ought to cross the river, and that we should not stop till we had dictated peace at the capital of the Mexican empire. Let the fact be clearly ascertained, and then he was prepared to vote, not fifty thousand men only, but a hundred or a hundred and fifty thousand, if the Executive came to Congress and demanded that amount. He was ready to place the whole force of the country at his disposal, and that he should be enabled to conquer peace in the heart of the Mexican empire."

The Senator does not deny that he is correctly reported, and I could not, of course, know what particular views the honorable Senator then entertained, any further than I can gather them from these remarks; but what are we to conclude was to be done by such a force as he was willing to vote, unless it was to overrun Mexico and conquer it, and in that way "conquer peace."

Mr. MANGUM.—I meant any force that might be necessary to chastise the enemy, and to dictate a peace.

Mr. BREESE.—But why chastise the enemy when they had done us no wrong? If the Rio Grande was not the boundary of Texas, but belonged to Mexico then their troops perpetrated no wrong in crossing it; and it would be an outrage on our part to raise a force of one hundred thousand men to chastise Mexico for this, and carry our arms to her central city and there dictate a peace. But, sir, I cannot reconcile the opposition of Senators to this bill, on another ground. They have insisted, every one of them who has spoken to it, that our force in Mexico is amply sufficient for all legitimate purposes, and minute calculations have been made to prove it; yet, at the same time, they vote under the eyes and noes on the amendment of the honorable Senator of Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) to give the President power to call for the services of thirty thousand volunteers, three times as many men as this bill proposes. No doubt, sir, there is good reason for this, and it may not be at all inconsistent. This vote was given before the passions had become excited by the collision of debate; and I doubt not, sir, the Senators who voted for the amendment, voted in good faith, and with a determination to grant reinforcements, lest only strife seeming to be then, which was the best description of force.

Mr. President, one thing is very certain that we are in the midst of one of the most remarkable wars ever waged since the creation of the world, in every step of which, we, the victorious party, have held out the olive branch to the enemy; and yet Senators say, not only on that side of the chamber, but on this, that we can have peace whenever we will it. The Senator of Connecticut, (Mr. NILES,) declared this to be his belief, but failed, in my judgment, to bring a single fact in support of it. Do the facts and circumstances developed in the progress of this war show that peace—an honorable peace—is within our control? And does he or any other Senator doubt the sincerity of the President, and of his friends, when they say that they are desirous of peace on honorable terms, bringing with it indemnity and security?

Mr. NILES.—The idea is correct in part, and wrong in part. I did not say it was in the power of this government to make peace. I said it was in the power of this government, and which they ought to exercise, at the proper time, to put an end to hostilities.

Mr. BREESE.—Well, sir, that seems to me to be very much the same thing. Putting an end to hostilities on both sides—for otherwise there could be no end—and peace results as a necessary consequence; and therefore it follows, that it is in the power of our government, according to that Senator, to make a peace. But it was distinctly avowed by the Senator of New Jersey, (Mr. MILLER,) that it was in our power to make a peace at any time. Why, sir, we could not, with all our efforts, prevent war—we sent a minister to discuss the matters in difference between us, but he could not be heard—he was spurned, and the very thought of the thing produced a revolution, and a deposition of the then President. After our most brilliant victories, when our conquering army was at the gates of the capital, we had a commissioner with it, with full powers to make a peace, who was met by commissioners on the part of Mexico, and what was the result? Could we have done, ought we to have done more than we have? I put it to the Senator, and to others on his side of the chamber, to say if they would have concluded a peace on the basis proposed by Mexico? Would they have accepted the Mexican propositions, any one of them? Would they, for the sake of peace, disparage their country? Do Senators recollect the Mexican propositions of the 6th of September last? What do they say to the twelfth and fourteenth articles? If I understood the honorable Senator of Maryland, not now in his seat, (Mr. PEARCE,) he would have accepted them, but I never would, and I doubt very much if there is a respectable number of the opposition who would. Do Senators remember the twelfth article, requiring a guarantee from us, and that guarantee Great Britain, that we would not, at any time hereafter, no matter how necessary it might be for our security or welfare, annex any contiguous territory? And that, as provided in the fourteenth article, we should indemnify Mexico for all the injury our army had inflicted? And with the further stipulation, and mentioned for the first time in the history of this controversy in Mexico, that the Nueces should be the boundary?

Now, in all sincerity I put it to Senators, would they consent to dismember Texas? Would they acknowledge a line as a boundary to which Mexico had never made claim? Recollect that her pretensions to Texas were, and always have been, to the Sabine. Would any of them agree that we should so degrade ourselves and our country, as to give the guarantee of Great Britain, that we would not annex to our confederacy any contiguous territory for all time to come? and above all, that we should indemnify Mexico for all the injuries she has received from her own aggressive acts? Let the Senator stand forth and avow it? If Senators on the other side are sincere however, they must agree to the last proposition, for if the war is unjust as they asseverate it is, we are bound to make full reparation to Mexico. They are then bound, if they are sincere, and who can doubt their sincerity, to go before the people of the United States on this, as one of the issues at the coming fall election. They assert the war is unjust; if it is, must you not on the restoration of peace, make full reparation? Is not this a well established principle of public law? Do not Grotius and Vattel and all other publicists, recognize this principle? and is it not a correct one? If our opponents are sincere in the belief so often expressed here, that the war is unjust, they must, in their effort to obtain the government, carry it out to its consequences. They must inscribe it on their banner for the approaching campaign, and as they give its folds to the winds, with what enthusiasm and delight will it be cheered by the people as its inscriptions meet their eye! On the one side, "General Taylor—the People's candidate—the Hero of Palo Alto, Resaca, Monterey and Buena Vista." On the other, "Justice to Mexico—$200,000,000 as indemnity to her!" And, sir, if unfortunately they do get into power and negotiate for peace, how can they escape the demands which Mexico will make for indemnity, based, as they would be, on their own admissions that the war was unjust to her?

Mr. President, at the outset of this war, and in its first year, it was distinctly avowed by the Executive, and reiterated by his friends, that as it was brought upon us by Mexico, he had no other desire in waging it, than an honorable peace, including indemnity for the past injuries we had sustained at her hands, and such security against future aggressions, as Mexico might be enabled to give. And is it unreasonable, sir, that as the war is protracted by Mexico, she refusing all offers of accommodation, that our demands should rise in proportion? In my own opinion, in the view I have taken of this matter, we would not be doing justice to our own country, by a show of too much lenity to Mexico, and that sheer justice would demand from her, full indemnity also for the expenses of this war; and in her peculiar position, she not being able to provide any other indemnity, that the cession of the sovereignty and jurisdiction over a part of her territory, should be insisted upon as a sine qua non; for I believe with the President, that the doctrine of no territory, which was broached here at the last session, and found so many advocates, is the doctrine of no indemnity. In territory only can Mexico make reparation for the past, and afford security for her future good behavior, and although we are strong as a nation, yet like the strong man, it is not strange we should desire security against the attack of lurking, cowardly assassins. Yet, sir, it seems to be doubted by some, whether the President is willing to accept a treaty ceding New Mexico and California as a full equivalent for indemnity, and as affording that security he demands. I suppose, though I do not know it from him, that he would accept such a treaty, if he thought the government of Mexico was so established as to give reasonable assurance of its stability. Now, as the question for the consideration is, as peace is admitted to be our true policy; but on what terms this shall end, there is, and there must be, great difference of opinion. Our policy, sir, is, emphatically, peace with all nations, but with none at the sacrifice of our national honor, the dearest possession of a nation. We have never, sir, since the birth of our nation, given occasion for war, not even with the barbarous tribes upon our borders. It is our pride to be able to say, that our whole history may be explored, and no single act of national injustice can be found upon its page—no blot of that kind upon our national escutcheon. We, sir, would have never disturbed our peaceful relations with Mexico, by any act of our own; she has brought the war upon herself, under a delusion that one of our sister States belonged to her; and resolving to possess it by force of arms, and refusing to hear our minister upon the matters in dispute, sought to end them by the sword; and as she has appealed to that dread arbiter, she must abide its fortune. But war, sir, it is said, is so full of evil, that it ought to be terminated at the earliest moment, some Senators believing that the glory we have gained by it, is sufficient indemnity for all our wrongs, and others deprecating any further advance of our army, as likely to bring about the result alluded to in the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and which he deprecates so much. It is true, sir, war is an evil—a great evil, but it has also its advantages, and though the land may be, for a time, crushed by the armed heel, it is but preparing it for the reception of that seed whose fruit is commerce, science, the arts, and the highest and purest forms of civilization. Alexander, in opening Persia and India by his sword, to the commerce of Greece, founded more cities than he conquered; and the world's whole history since, shows, most clearly, that its permanent benefits far outweigh its transitory evils. The roads traced by the soldiery are soon followed by the merchant, greatly facilitating the commerce of ideas—favoring the spread of new inventions, and in the end will fraternize the whole human race. It is one of the great instruments of God's providence, by which to accomplish such grand results; and can any Senator doubt that this most remarkable war, will not greatly redound to the advantage of Mexico, securing to her in the end, every blessing we so abundantly enjoy?

It has been a war waged thus far, not against the people of Mexico, but emphatically, against the army alone, with a view only to its destruction, and upon principles of the most enlightened humanity. Not one single act of oppression or injustice, has been committed by us—our path, as we have strode from victory to victory, has not been lighted by the flames of their dwellings, their defenceless women and children given to the sword, nor their cities sacked, nor churches defiled, nor fields laid waste. Though we have been terrible to the combatant, we have been generous to him when vanquished, never forgetting, in the midst of the excitement, that the fairest chaplet victory wears, is that which mercy twines. These, sir, is what make it a most extraordinary war, and the faithful historian, as he writes its varied and stirring events, will dwell with peculiar pleasure and pride on this, its bright and most distinguishing feature. So humane and generous has been our conduct, that the people of Mexico, those who have most suffered by the oppression of the military, hail us, regard our armies, rather as benefactors, than as enemies, and if accounts can be relied on, are utterly opposed to their withdrawal. This has been the fruit of our policy adopted at the outset, for early in June, 1846, our general in command, issued a proclamation, prepared at the War Department here, in which the people of Mexico were assured that the war should not be waged against such of them as remained neutral, but against the army, and the arbitrary rulers. They were reminded, that their government was in the hands of tyrants and usurpers who had abolished the State governments, overthrown the federal constitution, deprived their people of the right of suffrage, destroyed the liberty of the press, despoiled them of their arms, and reduced them to a state of absolute dependence upon the power of a military dictator. They were reminded also, that the army and rulers extorted from them, by grievous taxation, by forced loans, and military seizures, the money which sustained the usurper in power, and were told that we came to obtain reparation for the repeated wrongs and injuries, those rulers had done to us—that we came to obtain indemnity for the past, and security for the future, and to overthrow the tyrants who had destroyed their liberties, but to make no war upon the people of Mexico, nor upon any form of government, they might choose to select for themselves. They were promised, too, that their religion, their altars, and churches, the property of their churches, and citizens, the emblems of their faith, and its ministers, should be protected and remain inviolate. They were assured that we came among them as friends, and as pledge was given to them, that whilst we were compelled to treat as enemies, and overthrow, those tyrants, who, whilst they had wronged and insulted us, had deprived them of their liberties, the people themselves, who remained neutral during the contest, should be protected against them by our army.

Now, sir, upon the proposition to withdraw the force we now have there, instead of augmenting it, either with or without a treaty, must not these pledges to the Mexican people be regarded? We know the effect they have had upon them—we know that the better portion of them have offered no resistance to our advance—that they have supplied provisions to our troops and guides, and means of transportation, and some have accepted office from our military governors; in short, they have extended to us every assistance in their power. Would it then be just to them to withdraw our protection from them—suffer their tyrants and oppressors again to return to power, and they become, as they certainly would, a sacrifice to their friendship for us? But, Senators say, it would be magnanimous to withdraw—to prosecute the war no further, as Mexico lies prostrate at our feet, without the power of further resistance.

I think, sir, that neither the honorable Senator of Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) in the very able speech he delivered, and who gave it as his advice that we should make the best peace we could, and flee the country, nor the distinguished Senator of South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) in his proposition to leave the central parts of Mexico, and retire to an indemnity line, could have recollected these pledges, or duly considered the obligations we are under arising out of them. It seems to me, it would be the height of injustice to leave these people, whom we have allured to our support, a prey to those tyrants who must succeed our power, and whose revenge can only be satiated by the blood of those our absence will leave defenceless. We owe that protection to them we have promised, and any treaty we may make with that government, should contain a stipulation for it, as nothing short of this would be just.

As I remarked on another occasion, sir, retiring to a line, in the event of a refusal to treat or in any event, would not end the war—it would make it interminable, be quite as expensive as a more vigorous policy, and be the very course the military rulers of Mexico would most desire we should adopt, for it necessarily returns them in power, and more than all, it would be an invitation to any European power, (and it is thought one or more of them have designs of this nature,) to take possession of that part we abandon, involving us perhaps, at some future time, in a bloody and destructive war with them. Our withdrawal would be a proclamation to them, that in assuming our line, we abandon all claim to any part of Mexico south of it, and they would not, I suppose think, sir, to profit by our folly. But, sir, what prospect is there of a treaty? Have we any certain knowledge of the existence of any government in Mexico, possessing such a share of public confidence and so organized as to make one that will be observed? As at present advised, with the knowledge I have, of the condition of affairs there, I should place but little value upon any treaty that might be patched up, and I would regard it as a most unfortunate event, if one was entered into, which should stipulate as a concurrent act, for the withdrawal of our troops from the interior and the city. Sir, the whole history of that country admonishes us to be cautious in our intercourse with it, and to run no hazard which we have the power to avoid. Sir, if a President could be deposed merely for consenting to receive a minister from this government preparatory to a treaty, what may we not expect will be the fate of him, who shall make a treaty at all favorable to us, and our protection withdrawn? It is not necessary to be told by the military chieftains and the clergy, a pronunciamento will follow—then the grito—then the march to the capital, and the reins of government forcibly assumed. The functionaries who have negotiated the treaty, will become fugitives from their country, and scenes of butchery and violence in quick succession, and with aggravated horror, will be again enacted.

I do not believe, sir, that any good could result, but much evil, from any treaty we might now be able to make. I have no confidence that it would be observed a day, and if not, the work we have accomplished, would have to be renewed, more blood spilt and more treasure expended, to restore us to the favorable position we now occupy. Any authority now existing in Mexico is but the bubble of the moment, which the first breath of popular clamour will suddenly destroy.

There is, sir, another difficulty in the way, which deserves some notice. There is a strong party in Mexico, called the puros or republicans, who are determined, if my information is correct, that there shall be no peace with us if they can prevent it, and they are active, intelligent, and united. They see in this war, the approaching realization of their fondest hopes—the enjoyment of that liberty of thought, speech, and the press, for which they have so long struggled, and which can only be secured by our dominion. For this blessing they are ready and anxious to surrender their nationality—to merge it in our own, and thus relieve themselves from oppression, from tyrannical exactions, from plunder, and from all those accumulated ills their miserable government of misrule has enforced and encouraged. They see, in our advance, the dawnings of a brighter day for them and their children, and in glad anticipation behold our azure studded with their stars. They see no refuge but in our free institutions, no shield but our power, and desire no nationality but that which an union with us will give them. This party, sir, may submit for a time, but will not agree, and if they obtain power, true to their original design, they will become embroiled with us to effectuate it. They have always been, and are now, the most clamorous for war, and will oppose any accommodation, which withdraws our army; for its continuance there they believe, and I believe will produce the result they desire. And this, sir, is the opinion of the distinguished Senator of South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN,) as I gather from his speech on the resolutions he has introduced, and discussed with such great ability. He deprecates a line of policy which shall result in conquering Mexico, with a view to incorporate it into this Union or to hold it as a province, and maintains that it would not only be inconsistent with the avowed objects for which the war has been prosecuted—but a departure from the settled policy of the government; in conflict with its character and genius, and in the end subversive of our free and popular institutions.

The avowed objects of the war which we declared to exist by the act of Mexico, was to obtain redress of wrongs, a permanent and honorable peace, and indemnity for the past and security for the future; and, if they cannot be obtained in any other way than by the conquest of Mexico, and incorporating it into the Union or holding it as a province, such a result would be in harmony with those objects. Nor would it be contrary to the spirit and genius of our government, nor against its settled policy to conquer, in a defensive war, any country and annex it, which might be thought, from its contiguity, to be necessary to our own safety. The power "to declare war," carries with it all its consequences, of which territorial conquest is one, and our policy in 1812, was to conquer Canada, and if we had been successful, after having made the most strenuous efforts to that end, and on the return of peace, it had been relinquished to us, no doubt it would have been annexed to us, and I think the day is not distant when that event shall transpire. How the annexation of Mexico to our union, would tend to subvert our free institutions, I cannot discover. The argument of the Senator on that point has failed to convince me. I have taken a different view of the people of that country, and I think I see in them attributes and elements quite susceptible, by proper appliances, of high improvement. Could they be brought under the happy influences of such a government as our own, having all their rights, civil and religious, protected, what might we not hope from them? The Indian population numbering about four millions, are reputed to be very gentle and quiet in their dispositions, apt to learn, and willing to improve, and if not possessed of all the manlier virtues, have at least those which fully ensure their cheerful acquiescence to our control, and rapid advancement under it. Take the population as a whole, and there is not a finer people on the globe, or one more capable of advancement in the arts and sciences, and of assuming all the forms of the highest civilization. They came out of their revolution with a reputation only excelled by our own, and with the same advantages we have possessed, who can say they would not now rival us in all that contributes to national renown? But the Senator says, no instance can be found of any race, save the Caucasian, which has established and enjoyed self-government and free institutions; but he does not say no other race can be prepared for it. All other races have always been oppressed—are generally ignorant—have no just appreciation of liberty, and are for the most part uncivilized. I do not suppose, sir, the Mexicans are at this time fitted for an equal union with us; and much is to be done before they will be. By the infusion of our own population among them, and they are now there in great numbers, according to the Senator of Delaware, (Mr. CLAYTON,) together with emigrants from Europe, who will not be slow to avail themselves of the unsurpassed advantages such a country enjoys, a gradual change in their manners, customs, and language, will ensue. Education will be diffused among the masses—speech, the press, and religion will be free, and high opinions of themselves speedily generated; and considering the rapidity of past events, the aids to knowledge and for its rapid spread which the world now possess, the period of their pupilage will be of short duration. Sir, it has been alike our pride and boast, that our institutions were better calculated to elevate the masses, than any others which have yet existed; and we feel it to be true, and it cannot be that it is the decree of Heaven, that none but the white race shall enjoy them. It has been the abiding hope of the philanthropist, that in God's good time all nations should enjoy them, and the down trodden millions of both hemispheres be exalted by their agency. There is nothing, sir, in the history of that beautiful country, or in the character of its people, to discourage the belief that they can, in a very short time, be brought to a condition qualifying them for admission into this great American family, adorning and strengthening it by a commingling and full development of all those grand and mighty elements they possess, and thus fulfil her own and our happy destiny. And, sir, it is the fervent wish and hope of her most eminent citizens and patriots, that this war may accelerate it—and if "coming events cast their shadows before," may it not be regarded as its certain precursor? In my musings upon this subject, Mr. President, I have been cheered by the hope that if I did not, my children would live to see that day when our institutions shall extend over the whole of this portion of our continent, all to be bound by one common ligament, and all to run one common career of honor, happiness and renown. And, sir, why should we be alarmed at this contemplation? History, it is said, admonishes us that extension of dominion by territorial acquisition proved the downfall of the ancient republics; but, sir, were they fashioned like ours? Were they not, from their very nature, incapable of extension? And is there no difference of condition between us and them? They had not the press, nor the compass, nor the steam engine, none of those great instrumentalities which wielded by freemen, are to revolutionize the world. They worshipped liberty and sacrificed to her as to an idol. We regard her as an active, moving spirit, penetrating all the avenues of life, and cheering and stimulating man in his progress. Sir, our liberty can be preserved only by progress. Being stationary we stagnate, and in that condition the flame will expire. It is by action alone—by ceaseless, constant action—we can preserve it. Let us expand to our true and proper dimensions, and our liberty will be eternal; for, in the process, it will increase in strength, and the flame grow brighter whilst it lights a more extensive field. Does any Senator believe our attachment to liberty would have been any stronger than it is now, or that we would have been more powerful and happy, had our confederacy been confined within the Atlantic coast and the range of the Alleganies? Would any one of them, willingly, restore to their former owners, Louisiana, Florida and Texas, or surrender either without a deathly struggle? I apprehend not. Our history shows thus far, that there is no danger in our extension. Our form of government is peculiarly fitted for this—it has a peculiar aptitude for expansion, a principle which no other government ever did possess, and it is one of its great excellencies. Will any Senator deny that the new States have contributed new vigor to our system, and increased strength to our circle? Have any symptoms of disaffection to the Union been observed in any of them? Has any spirit of insubordination or of restlessness under the ties which bind them, ever been manifested by any of them? No, sir, it is not in them, where man enjoys the largest liberty, only restrained by laws he makes himself, that emeutes, riots and rebellions occur, but it is among a crowded population, in pent up masses, easily excited by collision, with no extended field of action to arouse their energies, and no attainable objects before them to guide them aright.

Let but Congress—the general government for all the States—confine itself to its own proper functions, each State exercising its own undoubted powers, within its own limits, managing its own legitimate concerns, in its own way, without the unauthorized interference of Congress, no reason can be given why our Union should not be co-extensive with this portion of the American continent. We want no rival republics here, for they may become inimical, rendering it necessary to maintain standing armies to defend against their aggressions. If all was united in one harmonious whole, such defences would not be required.

By the agency of steam operating upon the boat—the rail road car and the press, combined with that great American invention—the greatest of the age and of the world—the magnetic telegraph, which can literally almost, we will be more compact, and in more constant and harmonious intercourse than the old thirteen States were, at the period of the adoption of our constitution. With the seat of the common or general government at some central point, with railroads and telegraphs radiating from it, as from the centre of a circle to its circumference, and with the press as free as the air of heaven, it matters not how large the number of States may be.

But it is said, sir, this war is bringing the nation into debt, and the farther we advance, the more will it be augmented, and the greater burden do we throw upon those who come after us. To be sure, sir, all wars create debts. The expenses of a war are not expected to be borne by the ordinary revenues of peace, but by borrowing money, and if we cannot replace it in our generation, the one which succeeds us must do so. Arguments of this kind are equally strong against every effort at national defence, and if yielded to, will place our nation at the mercy of its foes. If we do create a large debt of one hundred millions, over and above our revenues, for posterity to pay, we will leave them increased means with which to pay it. What is such a debt to us, or to them? If the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury are correct, and I believe they are, and the present tariff is not interfered with, we will have in less than ten years, quite fifty millions of dollars annually, from duties alone, to say nothing of the receipts from the public lands, the receipts from which, this fiscal year, will fully equal his expectations, and if a proper graduation and pre-emption law is enacted, will be greatly augmented. Reducing, after the war, our expences to twenty or twenty-five millions annually, we may have a large sinking fund, by which, in less than ten years, the whole debt will be paid off. Our credit was never in a better condition than it now is, and promises to continue to be. Our six per cent stocks are above par, and if we enter the market for more money, we will find the loanable capital so far from being exhausted, at our command in abundance. The debt of the last war amounting to more than a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, was soon discharged, without affecting injuriously any of the great interests of the country; and so will this be.

In this view, sir, the acquisition of Mexico, with its unparrallel powers of production, yielding every article of luxury and necessity, save one, that ministers to the wants or pride of man—whose revenues can be made, under wholesome laws, and with proper management, to produce annually, one hundred millions of dollars, and with mineral wealth from which the world now draws a great part of its supply, and those resources to be further developed by our enterprize and skill, what can we not expect, when time shall have performed upon her its gentle yet potent and effective office?

As I believe, sir, there are but two alternatives, either to flee the country, or to hold on to our acquisitions, the result of which may be the final absorption of Mexico, I have not hesitated to declare for the latter, being well satisfied that great ultimate good to us, to her and to humanity, is to flow from it.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN,) has said, sir, that Mexico is to us, as a dead body, and is anxious to cut the cord that binds us to the corpse. Sir, I prefer taking her to our side, and imparting to her some of our own vitality, and with her fair proportions and most beautiful developements, by its magic influence, she will start again into life and being. If she be dead—if the light is out—we have "the Promethean heat that can that light relume."

Having made, sir, these desultory remarks, I will now conclude by thanking the Senate for their patient and polite attention.

Mr. UPHAM took the floor with a view of addressing the Senate to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after sometime spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FOOTE presented the credentials of the Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, elected a Senator of the United States, from the State of Mississippi, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of the Hon. JESSE SPEIGHT; which were read.

Mr. DAVIS having taken the oath prescribed by law, resumed his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed two enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

PETITIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Mary Cassin, widow of a deceased naval officer, praying a renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Wheeling, praying certain amendments to the act of July 7th, 1838, to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled by steam; and moved its reference to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WESTCOTT observed that at an early day of the session he had introduced a resolution which was adopted by the Senate, requesting the Commissioner of Patents to obtain information and report it to Congress as to the explosions of steam boilers, with a view to further legislation to prevent them; and he would suggest that this memorial be also referred to the Commissioner, who would probably report in a few days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that if there was any prospect of an immediate report on the subject he had no objection to the reference suggested by the Senator from Florida. He was somewhat desirous, however, that the subject should be placed in the hands of some committee of the Senate in order that it might receive the action of the body during the present session if practicable. In his opinion the laws on the subject required some amendment. It was a matter of deep interest to the people on the western waters.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, remarked that in his judgment the appropriate reference would be to the Committee on Commerce. Early in the session a resolution was referred to that committee, who were instructed to make inquiries whether any further legislation was necessary for the protection of life on board steam vessels. That resolution had been for some time in the hands of the committee. The subject had been submitted to investigation, and, as he had been informed, many facts had been accumulated by that committee in relation to it. They were at present maturing a report; and had it under consideration, whether it would not be expedient to submit a bill making further provisions for the safety of passengers and others navigating steamers and other vessels. He had, himself, in his possession, some important communications on the subject, which he did not deem it necessary to pass through the Senate, but should lay them before the committee. He thought that this memorial had better take that direction. The report of the Commissioner of Patents, which would doubtless be interesting and valuable, could also be referred to the committee having charge of the whole subject.

Mr. WESTCOTT inquired whether the Senator was not mistaken in supposing that this subject had been placed in charge of the Committee of Commerce of the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS replied that it had been referred to that Committee under a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT then said that he had no objection to the reference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD also acquiescing, the reference to the Committee on Commerce was ordered.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial of Robert Mills, respecting a new route to the Pacific Ocean, with a plan for the transportation of despatches to Astoria in fifteen days; which was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of Polly Taylor, widow of a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying a grant to the State of Illinois, of the right of way over, and a donation of public land for constructing a railroad to connect the waters of the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the Northern Lakes; which, (a bill having been reported for that object,) were laid upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, submitted a document in relation to the pay and emoluments of Military Storekeepers in the army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted documents relating to the claim of the heirs of John T. Douglass, deceased, assignee of John E. Metcalf and others, to the right of pre-emption to certain lands in Indiana; which, with the documents on the files of the Senate, relating thereto, were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of inhabitants of Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for abolishing slavery throughout the United States; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, the petition of James Harley, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the mode of casting chilled rollers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BAGBY presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, praying that an equivalent in land scrip or money may be granted to that State for such of the school lands within her limits as may be ascertained to be unfit for cultivation; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of T. L. Smith, praying an amendment of the constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President; which was laid upon the table.

HOUDON'S BUST OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. DIX submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a marble bust of Washington, by Houdon, now in possession of Mr. George Gibbs.

LIGHT-HOUSES IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for the erection of a light house on Proctor's Shell Bank, and also for the erection of a light-house on Ship Island, in the State of Louisiana.

THE PEA PATCH CASE.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That a thousand extra copies of the report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, in reply to the Senate's resolution of the 17th ultimo, relative to the site of Fort Delaware, be printed for the use of the Senate.

UNITED STATES' COURTS IN MICHIGAN.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. FELCH asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning the courts of the United States in and for the district of Michigan; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Company, and others; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Clark, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill granting a pension to John Clark.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Silas Waterman, reported it without amendment

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorials of Adelaide Snyder and Henriette Pensoneau, heirs of Jean F. Perry, deceased; John Bleakeley, William Bleakeley, Nicholas Radiger and Juliana Bleakeley, heirs of Josiah Bleakeley; James L. D. Morrison, John M. Morri son and R. F. Morrison, heirs of Robert Morrison, deceased; and of the heirs of Nicholas Jarrot, deceased, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of Jean F. Perry, Josiah Bleakeley, Nicholas Jarrot, and Robert Morrison.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of William Woodbridge and Henry Chipman, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to provide compensation to William Woodbridge and Henry Chipman, for services in adjusting titles to land in Michigan, and for other purposes.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Develin, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Davenport, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL STAFF.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made yesterday by Mr. BADGER, to reconsider the vote upon the passage of the bill for an increase of the medical staff of the army, for a limited time.

Mr. BADGER explained that this bill had been reported by the Military Committee and passed under an erroneous impression.—Every member of the committee was now satisfied that the bill ought not to pass.

The motion to reconsider having been agreed to, the question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the bill be postponed indefinitely.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal, was read the second time.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. UPHAM.—Mr. President: I do not know, sir, that I shall be able, in the humble part I am about to take in this debate, to impart any thing of interest or freshness to the subject, or to bring any new contribution of facts to bear upon the questions I propose to discuss. Almost every topic connected with, or growing out of the existing war with Mexico, has been alluded to and ably commented upon by honorable Senators who have preceeded me on the floor. But, sir, exhausted as the subject is, I cannot content myself with a silent vote on the question.

Believing, as I do, that under existing laws our force in Mexico can be increased to nearly sixty-five thousand men, and that the more vigorous prosecution of the war for the purposes now avowed, would be dishonorable to the country, I shall be compelled to record my vote against this bill. But I shall do it, sir, with no view to embarrass the Executive in his efforts for an honorable peace; but to prevent the forcible dismemberment of a weak, distracted sister republic, and to preserve untarnished the fair fame of the country, which I prize infinitely higher than any territorial acquisitions we can make, or any glory we can win, by the success of our arms. The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in his eloquent remarks the other day in support of this bill, expressed a desire that it might pass without opposition, and that the discussion, which he was aware would arise upon the war policy of the administration, and which he had no desire to avoid, might be had upon some other measure hereafter to come before the Senate. This bill, he thought, was safe and common ground, upon which we could all meet and act together. Sir, safe as the honorable Senator may think the ground to be on which he stands, I can not occupy it with him, because, in my judgment, it is dangerous ground.

This bill is the first of a series of measures which, if carried out to the full extent of executive recommendation, must bring our free institutions into great peril, and, I fear, in the end, overthrow them. The recommended increase of the army from sixty-five thousand to nearly ninety-five thousand men, to be engaged in the conquest of foreign states and provinces, is a proposition too startling for me to support. Here, sir, I must pause, and here I must stand until I am well convinced that this measure is necessary to vindicate the rights and maintain the honor of the country.

The cry is onward; and onward, at all hazards, the administration seems determined to go until the whole Mexican republic falls beneath our conquering arms. We preach the doctrine of non-interference in the affairs of other nations, and still raise armies to invade and conquer a neighboring republic. We proclaim the great principle of self-government and the right of every people to form their own institutions, and at the same time we send our conquering armies to force upon a distant and reluctant people, forms of government which they have not the capacity to maintain, and to which they are utterly opposed. We condemn the dismemberment of Saxony, the annexation of the republic of Genoa to the kingdom of Sardinia, and the absorption of Venice by Austria, and still we go on with the work of dismemberment and annexation ourselves. We denounce Russia, Prussia, and Austria for the dismemberment of Poland, and at the same time we are attempting to dismember a sister republic; and if she refuses to submit to our demands, the absorption of her whole territory, the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs says, may be the penalty she will be compelled to pay for her obstinacy.

Mexico, sir, is in our power—she lies quivering and bleeding at our feet—we can destroy her nationality and blot her name from the map of nations—but such an act of injustice, violence, and outrage would bring down upon our heads the just indignation of all Christendom, and brand us as a nation of robbers.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am quite sure that the Senator has no desire to misrepresent any Senator on this side of the chamber. Certainly he has not heard either the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, or any other Senator on this side, give expression to the opinion that it might become politic to absorb the whole of Mexico. The absorption of Mexico has been uniformly spoken of by us as a thing to be deprecated, but from which, if forced upon us, we were to educe all the good that was possible.

Mr. UPHAM.—I have no desire to misrepresent any Senator, but I understood the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in alluding to this subject, to say, that it might be necessary in order to bring the war to an honorable close, to absorb the whole of Mexico. However, I have his remarks before me and will read them. In the debate on the instructions to Gen. Scott to occupy the republic of Mexico, the Senator said:

"I repeat what I believe said, that the single Mexican obstinate rejection of reasonable terms, may, the government have resolved, compel us to make, the great lesson of peace, and to achieve for us [illegible]. What we would have accepted last year, and many of us would now, the proud conquest, we may well refuse now; and what we would accept now, we may well refuse in a few months. And how much the present sentiment of the country may change, even in two years hence, all the world may wonder at, but I do not pretend to foresee. We may have to grasp the great question of [illegible] to the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Kentucky, and even the citizens of Mexico to our aid. Those are events which cannot be [illegible] to pass, and which Mexico may be preparing for herself."

Mr. CASS.—I have again and again been called upon to state the purport of the remarks to which the honorable Senator alludes, and I do hope that it will not be necessary to enter into any explanation with regard to them hereafter. I am confident that the Senator does not intentionally mistake my views; but I will repeat that all along I have deprecated the absorption of the whole of Mexico, but, as the Senator from Mississippi has correctly said, I added that if forced upon us, we must make the most of it. At the time when the honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) introduced his resolutions, I stated distinctly that if Mexico protracted this war, the public opinion of the country might manifest a desire for the annexation of the whole of that country. But I never expressed any opinion in favor of such a result; but on the contrary, deprecated it as a thing to be feared and avoided.

Mr. UPHAM.—The position, then, that the Senator has assumed, is that such might be the condition of things, such might be the obstinacy of Mexico in refusing to yield to our demands that we might be compelled to prosecute the war to such extremity as would lead to the destruction of her nationality, and the absorption of her whole territory by the United States. And, sir, notwithstanding that this result is deprecated, and, I have no doubt, sincerely, and that it is acknowledged that this is not a desirable state of things, still, in my humble judgment, the tendency of the measures recommended by the President, if carried out to the full extent, must inevitably result in the absorption of the whole country, and I think I can see in the signs of the times enough to alarm the country in reference to this subject. Such a policy has been more than dimly shadowed forth in the resolutions introduced by the honorable Senators from New York and Indiana. The former suggested to the country the propriety and expediency of strengthening our commercial relations by the annexation of contiguous territory. The latter avowed the constitutional power and authority of our government to hold and govern Mexico as a dependent province. Sir, I have seen it avowed in the proceedings of public meetings, in the speeches of our military officers who have won glory and renown upon the battle fields of Mexico, and who have returned because there are no more laurels to be gained, and have undertaken to indoctrinate the people of this nation that it is our duty or destiny to carry into Mexico our free institutions, and that this war ought to be prosecuted until her government is overthrown and a more liberal government established, to be sustained by the power of our arms. What? Are we, then, to become a nation of propagandists? Why, sir, some gentlemen have even gone so far as to denounce every man who raises his voice against the prosecution of a war for the purpose of forcing upon Mexico a government of which she does not approve, as traitors to their country! Such is the sentiment expressed in the speech of Colonel Morgan which I have before me.

"As Christians," says he, "we are bound to protect the Mexicans from the bad intentions of their rulers." "And," he adds, "all who will advocate the withholding of supplies, or withdrawing our armies, disguise their sentiments however they may, under whatever artful plea they choose, are traitors at heart."

Yes, sir, every man, every citizen, every member of Congress who believes it to be his duty to raise his voice against the further prosecution of the war for the purpose now avowed by the administration, is denounced by this orator as a "traitor at heart," and unworthy of the confidence of the people. I also have in my possession a speech of Captain Stockton advocating the same principle that the army shall not be withdrawn until the overthrow of the Mexican government and the establishment of a government there upon liberal principles be accomplished. He holds the following language:

"I would insist, if the war were to be prolonged for fifty years, until each man's enemy should be found dead on each of our hearts, till we possess, I would insist that the blessings of civil and religious liberty should be guaranteed to Mexico."

I believe that the sentiments advanced by Colonel Morgan and Captain Stockton, so far from meeting with disapprobation on the occasions on which they were expressed, elicited the most unequivocal marks of favor. Those gentlemen, indeed, seem to have been preparing the minds of the people for the unqualified admission of the doctrine that it is the duty of the government to extend itself over the whole American continent. At the supper given to Colonel Morgan, the following toasts were received with the greatest enthusiasm:

"The Star of the United States Government. To meet shadow the whole of North America, therefore we may as well begin with Mexico."

"The American Continent. An Almighty hand has rolled the barrier of the ocean around it, to make it one republic.

"No part up to it but contracts our powers,
"But the whole boundless continent is ours."

"The Isthmus of Panama. The next to take place in the extension of freedom's area."

Now, sir, these significant indications strongly impress upon my mind the conviction, however much the result may be deprecated, that great efforts are making to convince the people that it is the destiny of our government to extend its jurisdiction over the entire continent. An ocean-bound republic is spoken of with apparent seriousness. Let it not be said that these indications are to be lightly regarded. They proclaim, in language not to be mistaken, the interpretation which masses of the people have put upon the policy which the government seems to have adopted. And, sir, if this perilous career of conquest on which we have enterrd, is not to be arrested till our arms have subjugated the whole American continent, it is surely time that the country understood it. It is time that the voice of warning should arouse the people to a full sense of impending danger.

Our government was not constructed with a view to wars of aggression and conquest. The armies contemplated by the constitution are armies of defence, and not of aggression—armies to defend our own territority, not to invade the territory of other nations. The unlimited power to raise and support armies, conferred upon Congress by the constitution, was looked upon with great jealousy by the people. It was assailed in the State conventions and elsewhere, with great zeal and pertinacity, as dangerous to liberty, and subversive of the State governments. It was said, the power being unlimited, that Congress might keep large armies constantly on foot, and thus exhaust the resources of the country; and that we might be compelled to live under a government of military force. To these suggestions it was replied, that the power was necessary, and that to be of any value, it must be unlimited; that the power was exclusively confined to the legislative body, to the representatives of the States, to the people of the States, and that it would be safe in their hands; that the power was necessary, because we were surrounded by the colonies and dependencies of powerful foreign governments, whose maritime powers might furnish them with the means of annoyance, and mischief, and invasion; that it was necessary to protect our frontiers against the Indians, and to man our forts and garrisons in different parts of the country. Here, too, you have the reasons for which the power "to raise and support armies" was deemed necessary. The conquest of foreign States and provinces was never dreampt of by the framers of the constitution. But the wisdom of the past, with the "progressive democracy" of the present day, is folly; and, indeed, so rapid has been the advancement beyond that old-fashioned democracy which prevailed in the better days of the republic, that calls have been actually made for conventions of the people to reconstruct the government. And to carry out these splendid schemes of national aggrandizement, it has been found necessary to wage war against the freedom of speech and the press—a war infinitely more dangerous to the liberties of the people than a war of conquest. The message of December, 1846, contains the declaration of war against free discussion, and I beg leave to read it:

"The war has been, (says the President,) represented as unjust and unnecessary, and one of aggression, on our part, upon a weak and injured enemy. Such erroneous views, though entertained by few, have been widely circulated not only at home, but have been spread throughout Mexico and the whole world. A more effectual means could not have been devised to encourage the enemy and protract the war than to advocate and adhere to their cause, and thus give them aid and comfort."

Here, sir, is a bold, and I was about to say, shameless attempt on the part of the Executive to stifle all inquiry into the origin, necessity, justice, and purposes of this war. All who dare call in question the power of the President to wage war, and to prosecute it for the purposes of conquest and plunder, are denounced as traitors to their country. And all who doubt the necessity of the war and think it could, and should, have been avoided, are held up as adhering to, and advocating the cause of the enemy. These denunciations, sir, coming from that high source, should not be suffered to pass unnoticed and uncondemned. The framers of the constitution, regarding free discussion the great safeguard of liberty, declared, in the first article of amendments, that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." This right of free discussion belongs to the people, and no power on earth should be permitted to abridge or impair it. It is the great power that overturns despotisms and builds up republics—it shakes tyrants from their thrones and confers the blessings of liberty upon oppressed millions of our race—it kindled the fire of our own revolution and made us a free and independent nation—and it is the best security we can have for the preservation of our liberties. It was Sheridan, I believe, who, in speaking in the House of Commons on the power of the press to avert the encroachments of the Ministry, exclaimed in one of his loftiest strains of eloquence:

"Give them a corrupt House of Lords, give them a venal House of Commons, give them a packed Jury, give them a truckling Court, give them laws unlimited in power, and I will defy them to encroach a hair's breadth upon the liberties of England."

If the freedom of the press was so essential in the protection of British liberty, it must be regarded as infinitely more important to the security of a government like ours, founded upon and deriving its support from enlightened public opinion. But, to pass on; gentlemen have searched for precedents for this war, and the Senator from Illinois imagines that he has discovered one in the war of 1812. "That war," he says, "was declared in the same form and almost in the same language as the present." Sir, did President Madison announce to the country that war existed between the United States and Great Britain? Or, did he inform Congress that long existing difficulties between the two countries remained unsettled? that he had exhausted all his power in making pacific efforts; and that he was unable to bring the controversy to a close; and that it was for Congress to decide whether or not an appeal to arms should be made in order to vindicate our honor and sustain our rights? Hear his language:

"We behold, in fine, on the side of Great Britain, a state of war against the United States, and on the side of the United States, a state of peace toward Great Britain. Whether the United States shall continue passive under these progressive usurpations and these accumulating wrongs; or, opposing force to force in defence of their national rights, shall commit our just cause into the hands of the Almighty disposer of events, avoiding all connexions which might entangle it in the contest or views of other Powers, and preserving a constant readiness to concur in an honorable establishment of peace and friendship, is a solemn question, which the constitution wisely confides to the legislative department of the government. In recommending it to their early deliberations, I am happy in the assurance that the decision will be worthy the enlightened and patriotic councils of a virtuous, a free, and a powerful nation."

Upon this message Congress announced to the country, by its legislative act, that a state of war existed between the two governments. How was it with the existing war? What was the character of the message received 11th May, 1846? Did it set forth the wrongs perpetrated by Mexico; that the President had exerted all the powers conferred on him by the constitution to affect a pacific adjustment without success; and that it was a question for Congress to decide upon the further steps to be taken to vindicate the rights and maintain the honor of the country? No, sir! The first announcement to the country of the existence of the war was by Executive message. How, sir, I ask, could war exist between a foreign government and the United States without the knowledge and consent of the war-making power? Had the President any authority to declare war? No, sir, that power is vested exclusively in Congress. How then can there be any analogy between the two wars—that of 1812 having been declared according to the form of the constitution, whilst the present war was waged by the Executive in open violation of the constitution. But the Senator says the war of 1812 met with violent opposition from the pulpit and the press, and he has given us specimens of the fulminations of the one, and the rantings of the other. For what purpose were these extracts read? Were they designed to instruct Senators in the discharge of their functions, or were they intended to operate on public opinion—to excite prejudices in the minds of the people against all who felt it to be their duty to oppose the policy recommended by the administration for the further prosecution of this war with a view to the dismemberment of a sister republic? If this war cannot be sustained upon its merits—if it be necessary to sustain the policy of its further prosecution by such a course of argument as that adopted by the Senator from Illinois, I think the sooner it is brought to a close the better it will be for the honor of all concerned. Most of the opposition to the war of 1812, grew out of the particular policy recommended for its prosecution. An increase of the army had been recommended for the invasion of Canada, and it was objected that the war ought to be a maratime war; that we should build up a navy, man it, and prepare ourselves to meet the enemy upon the ocean, where the injuries had been received, which we had armed ourselves to redress. Whoever looks at the debates upon appropriation bills for the support of the war of 1812 will find that most of the opposition was based upon the ground, that the naval power should be augmented to meet the enemy on the ocean, instead of increasing the army for the invasion of Canada. But to pass to another point. I stated in the outset that under existing laws our force in Mexico could be increased to nearly 65,000 men. Now, sir, is this true? The honorable Senator from Mississippi the other day said, that he did not so understand it. To settle this question I will refer to the report of the Secretary of War.

He says the twenty-five regiments of the regular army, as distinguished from volunteer force, when filled to the limit fixed by law, would be 28,814, exclusive of officers; but the actual strength, he says, is now about 21,533: it will, therefore, require 7,381 enlisted men to complete the regular military establishment.—There are now in the service, engaged for the war, says the Secretary, twenty-three regiments of volunteers, seven battalions, and thirty-three companies not organized into regiments or battalions; but the rank and file of all these, the Secretary thinks, do not exceed 20,000 men; and to give these serving for the war their complete organization, will require an addition of about 12,500 men.

The force in Mexico at this time, including the regiments from Michigan, and the two battalions now on the way, is 45,700. In addition to this number, the Executive, under existing laws, has the power to enlist upwards of 7,000 regulars, and to call into the field 12,500 volunteers, to serve during the war—making in all 65,200. If the 5,000 seamen and marines, also engaged in the war, be added, we then have a numerical force—naval and military—of 70,200 men. If we add to this force the troops proposed by this bill, 10,000 regulars, we shall have an army in Mexico of upwards of 80,000; and if the volunteer bill is to pass, we shall have a force of upwards of 100,000; and that, too, after the country has been virtually conquered by less than one-fourth of that number.

Sir, I can see no necessity for the force contemplated by this bill. When the regiments of the line, and the volunteer regiments, are filled up, we shall have a force amply sufficient to prosecute the war "with increased energy and power, in the vital parts of the enemy's country"—and this is all the President desires.

The Secretary of War says,

"Our future operations in Mexico must be conducted in one of the three following modes. First, to take and hold an indemnity line, to provide from all places on that line now occupied in advance of it, and every line of all successive operations beyond that line. Second, to overrun the whole country, and hold all the principal places in it by permanent garrisons; and, THIRD, to retain what we now possess, open a line of communication into the interior, and extend our operations to other important places, as our means and the progress of advantage shall indicate, keeping a disposable force always ready, within approachable limits, to annoy the enemy, to seize supplies, enforce contributions, and frustrate his efforts to collect means and assemble troops for the purpose of protracting the war."

The Secretary, after discussing the comparative merits of these modes of conducting the war, comes to the conclusion that the third mode is preferable, and adopts it. Now, sir, what force is necessary to carry it out? I have examined this question with some care, and I cannot resist the conclusion that the force now authorized by law is sufficient. This conviction has been forced upon my mind by the success which has hitherto attended our arms, and by the despatch of General Scott, under date of September 18th, 1847. General Taylor, at the battle of Palo Alto, with a force of 2 300, defeated a Mexican army of 6,000. At Resaca de la Palma, with a force of only 1,700, he defeated 6,500 Mexicans. At Monterey, with 6,645 men, he stormed and took the strong fortresses of the city, and compelled the surrender of a Mexican army 10,000 strong. And at Buena Vista, with 4,759 regulars and volunteers, he defeated Santa Anna at the head of 20,000 well armed Mexicans. Gen. Scott, at the head of 11,000 men, compelled the surrender of Vera Cruz and the strong castle by which it was defended. At Cerro Gordo, with an army of 8,500, he met and defeated a Mexican army of 12,500. At Contreras, San Antonia, and Churubusco, with 8,497 men, he defeated a Mexican force of 32,000. And with 7,190 men, he entered and took the city of Mexico, defended by an army of 35,000 Mexicans. Now, sir, it seems to me, after these brilliant victories, with a force 25,000 less than we can now put into the field, that the force proposed by this bill is unnecessary. But, sir, what says Gen. Scott, in his despatch of the 18th of September, 1847? He says, with the force en route and 4,000 more soon to follow, that he can hold the city of Mexico with a garrison of 7,500 men, against any external attack, or combined with an internal insurrection, and have an ample surplus force to occupy Puebla, Perote, Jalapa, the National Bridge, the Paso de Obios, Santa Fee, and Vera Cruz; and, as a modification of this plan, he says that, with a total of 30,000 men, the principal mining districts of the country may also be occupied, and a secure transit given to gold and silver bullion which, paying the customary duties, would cover a considerable part of the expenses of occupation. But this is not all, sir; Gen. Scott further suggests that to augment the army to 50,000, would enable it to occupy all the state capitals and principal cities—to drive guerrillas and robbing parties from the great highway of trade—to seize into our hands all the revenues of the country, and to keep the central government in motion and alarm until constrained to sue for peace. Does the President desire to accomplish more than General Scott says can be accomplished by a force of 50,000? If he does, what is it? Is it to annihilate the sovereignty of Mexico and make her a dependent province of the United States? Such a purpose has been denied by his friends on this floor. What then can be desired by the passage of this bill but the patronage it will confer upon the President? It will give him an opportunity to appoint five or six hundred officers to be engaged in recruiting soldiers for the next presidential campaign.—The measure is not wanted for an increase of soldiers in Mexico, but for an increase of officers at home. The rank and file of the army can be increased 20,000 without this bill, but there can be no increase of officers unless it passes. Fill up the regular and volunteer regiments now in the field, and, after that is done, if more men are necessary for the prosecution of the war, ask for them, and I presume they will be granted.

But, sir, I will leave this branch of the subject, and pass on to show that the character and objects of the war have changed; and that its further prosecution, for the purposes now avowed, would be dishonorable to the country.

When Texas was annexed to the United States its western boundary was left an open question, to be settled by negotiation between the Mexican government and ours. The President, in his message of May 11th, 1846, informed Congress that a strong desire to regulate and adjust our boundary and other causes of difference with Mexico, on fair and equitable principles, induced him, in September, 1845, to seek the re-opening of diplomatic relations between the two countries; that the Mexican government, in October following, agreed to receive a minister from the United States invested with full powers to settle and adjust all matters in difference between the two governments; that an envoy from the United States repaired to Mexico with full powers to adjust every existing difference; and that the Mexican government had not only refused to receive him or listen to his propositions, but, after a long continued series of menaces, had invaded our territory, and shed the blood of our fellow-citizens on our own soil. This message was accompanied by about one hundred and fifty pages of manuscript documents. The usual motion to print the documents was made, but it was voted down by Senators on the other side of the chamber. A call for the reading was then made, but that also was refused, and the bill of the 13th May, 1846, was passed by a vote of forty-two to two votes. The unanimity with which this bill was passed, has been frequently referred to as evidence to show that Congress was almost unanimously of the opinion that Mexico commenced the war. The President, in his last annual message, referred to it for that purpose. He says, in substance, that Congress, by the act of the 13th May, 1846, declared, with great unanimity, that "by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States: there being but two negative votes in the Senate and fourteen in the House of Representatives." Now, sir, I propose to present to the Senate and the country all the facts connected with the passage of that bill. The bill originated in the House of Representatives. On the 27th of January, 1846, Mr. Haralson, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States, under certain circumstances therein mentioned, to accept the services of volunteers, and for other purposes. On the 11th of May, Mr. Brinkerhoff moved to amend the bill by inserting a new section with a preamble, in the words following: "whereas, by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States." The amendment was carried by a vote of 123 yeas to 67 nays; and on the same day the bill passed the House by a vote of 174 to 14. So it appears that 67 members of the House voted against the preamble to the bill.

Well, sir, what is the history of this bill in the Senate? On the 12th of May, it came up for consideration, and Mr. Huntington, then a Senator from Connecticut, but since deceased, moved to amend it by striking out the preamble: and the journal shows that the motion failed by a vote of 18 yeas to 28 nays—all the Senators on this side of the chamber, with the exception of three, voted in the affirmative. A motion was then made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) to take a vote upon the preamble alone, but the chair ruled that it could not be separated from the bill, and the motion was decided out of order. The bill was then passed to a vote and passed—yeas 40, nays 2. Mr. Berrien, Mr. Evans, Mr. Huntington, and Mr. Calhoun declining to vote, and eleven Senators on this side of the chamber voting yea with a protest against the preamble to the bill. This, sir, is a concise history of the progress of the bill through the two Houses of Congress.

Now, I ask in all candor, what excuse can the President render to the country for asserting in his message, that both branches of Congress, with great unanimity, declared that the war existed by the act of Mexico, there being but fourteen negative votes in the House of Representatives and two in the Senate? Sir, the journal of the House shows 67 negative votes, and the journal of the Senate shows 18, making in the whole 85.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. UPHAM.—Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON.—At the time the bill passed this Senate, those of us who voted for its passage after our failure in the effort to strike out the preamble as the Senator from Vermont has stated, put to the gentlemen on the other side, the excessive hardship of calling upon us to vote for a bill, the object of which was to send supplies for the army, with a preamble containing a statement of a matter of fact of which we had not evidence before us. We repeatedly demanded the separation of the two propositions, but the separation was refused, the President of the Senate deciding that we had no right to call for a division of the question. Then we insisted upon it that we should have the right to vote upon the bill protesting against the preamble. And the Senator from Missouri now in my eye will recollect perfectly that he said on that occasion that such would be our right; and such was the understanding, that if we gave our votes in favor of the bill we were to be regarded as voting for the supplies, but not in favor of the preamble. This is the simple fact of the case, and that such was the understanding is well known. A Senator now deceased, (Mr. SPEIGHT) distinctly, and over and over again said that such was the understanding with regard to our vote. It is a gross misconception then to suppose that we voted for the preamble or ever meant to vote for it. I hope this statement will be sufficient to prevent any injustice being done us upon this subject in all future time.

Mr. UPHAM.—I thank the honorable Senator for the additional information he has given upon the subject—the country should have the whole truth in regard to the matter. Appeals were frequently made to Senators on the other side of the chamber, to strike out the preamble to the bill, as no evidence of its truth had been exhibited, and take a unanimous vote for the supplies; but they refused to do it. We must vote for the bill as it was, they said, or take the responsibility of voting against it. General Taylor had been ordered to the left bank of the Rio Grande with a small force, and hosts were entertained, that he would be unable to sustain himself without reinforcements, and the bill was passed for his relief. No intimation was made by the Executive, that the war had been waged with a view to the permanent acquisition of Mexican territory by conquest. The message declared it to be a war of defence, and not of aggression. "Mexico," says the message, "has passed the boundary of the United States, has invaded our territory, and shed American blood upon the American soil." To enable the President to repel this invasion, and "to prosecute the war to a speedy and successful termination;" I voted for the bill of the 13th May, 1846. Well, sir, what said the President in regard to the war, in his message of December, 1846? How has the case—

"The war has not been waged by a view to conquest; but has been commenced by Mexico, attacked and driven into the enemy's country, and will be vigorously prosecuted there, until we have obtained an honorable peace."

Here, sir, conquest, "with a view to permanent occupancy of Mexican territory," is disavowed. The war had been carried into Mexico, to cripple her power, and compel her to make an honorable peace. Again, sir, the President, in his message of August 4th, 1846, says—

"Equal justice to Mexico, as well as honorable to both parties, as I was originally instructed by this citizen was I have ceased it may still again be extended to the same benefits to Mexico. Should the government of that republic accept the offer, in the same candid spirit by which it was dictated, negotiation will speedily commence for the conclusion of a treaty."

A peace honorable to both parties was the object desired. "The chief difficulty to be anticipated in the negociation," says the President—

"Is the adjustment of the boundary between the parties, but a line which shall be more satisfactory and convenient to both, and such as neither will hereafter have cause to dispute. Thus the best mode of ensuring perpetual peace, an good neighborhood between the two republics. Should the Mexican government, in order to accomplish the object in view, propose any cession of territory to the United States, we ought to pay them a fair equivalent, a just and honorable price, and not compel Mexico, by force to the cession of the war."

The boundary question was the matter in difference between the two countries—and should the Mexican government, for the purpose of establishing a line convenient for both parties, be willing to cede a portion of her territory to the United States, we ought to pay a fair equivalent for it. No cession of territory was to be required without the free consent of the Mexican government. But this is not all, sir; the President asked for an appropriation of $3, 000,000, to enable him to advance a portion of the consideration money for any cession of territory the Mexican government might be willing to make. The character and objects of the war having been thus announced to Congress and the country, I, with most of the Senators on this side of the chamber, at the last session of Congress, voted men and money for its prosecution. And, sir, to show that our votes were given with no view to the acquisition of Mexican territory by conquest. I refer to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Georgia, (Mr. BERRIEN,) to Senate bill, No. 105, "making Appropriations for bringing the existing war with Mexico to a speedy and honorable conclusion," commonly called the three million bill.

The following are the words of the amendment:

"I do not believe that it is necessary to declare the actual and meaning of Congress upon this occasion; but that it is proper that the world should not be possessed of the fact, that not only with each other, but with the government of that republic, as well as with all other governments, our intentions are honest. That the government, ever desirous to maintain and preserve peaceful and friendly relations with all nations, and particularly with the neighboring republic of Mexico, will always be ready to conclude an honorable treaty whenever the proper authority on the part of Mexico shall manifest a desire to terminate the present unhappy conflict, and restore the friendly relations which so long existed between the United States and Mexico. That it is especially desirable, in order to terminate and restore those amicable relations, which ought always to exist between two neighboring republics, that the boundary of the States of Texas should be definitively agreed upon by treaty between the republic of Mexico, for the prompt and efficient prosecution of the war, and for the restoration of peace."

On the question, "shall this amendment be adopted?" it was determined in the negative, by a vote of yeas, twenty-four—nays, twenty-nine—every Senator on this side of the chamber, with the exception of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, voting in the affirmative. Here, sir, is the recorded opinion of the whigs of the Senate, that this war ought not to be prosecuted with a view to the acquisition, by conquest, of any portion of Mexican territory.

And here too is the recorded opinion of the democracy of the Senate, in direct opposition to that expressed by the whigs. The issue is fairly joined—and to the country I am perfectly willing to submit the decision of the question. I have shown, I think, sir, by evidence which Senators on the other side of the chamber are not at liberty to dispute, that, up to the close of the last session of Congress, the acquisition by conquest, of Mexican territory was disavowed by the Executive. What, sir, is the character of the war now? for what purpose is it to be prosecuted "with increased energy and power in the more vital parts of the enemies country?" it is, sir, to compel Mexico to cede to the United States nearly one half of her republic—more than 700,000 square miles of her territory, and more than three hundred thousand of her people. This cession of territory is demanded, it is said, because Mexico has protracted the war by obstinately refusing to receive the olive branch when offered by our government. Mexico, it is true, agreed to receive a commissioner to adjust the question of boundary between the two governments, but the President sent a resident minister, and she rejected him—expressing however at the same time her willingness to receive him in the character of commissioner. But, sir, did she reject the olive branch when offered by commissioner Trist at the gates of her capital? No, sir, she received it crimsoned as it was with the blood of her slaughtered women and children. And what were the terms of peace offered by our government? They were first, the Rio Grande for our western boundary; second, the cession to the United States of New Mexico and the two Californias; and third, a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. And in consideration of these demands, if conceded, we proposed first, to renounce all claims for the expenses of the war; second, to assume and pay the claims of our citizens on the Mexican government (supposed to be about $3,000, 000,) and third, to pay Mexico such additional sum in money as the territory ceded might be worth over and above our claims upon her government. The sum offered by Mr. Trist is stated to have been from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars—and that, too, after our demand had been reduced to the ultimatum of the President. Well, sir, what was the reply of the Mexican government to our demands? It was, in the language of the Mexican commissioners to Mr. Trist, that

"The cession, as was understood solely on account of the territory of the State of Texas, respecting which the North American republic presents as its title the act of the said State by which it was annexed to the North American confederation, after having proclaimed its independence of Mexico. The Mexican republic offering as we have intimated upon excellent to consent, for a proper indemnification, to pretensions of the government at Washington to the territory of Texas, the cause of the war has disappeared, and the war itself ought to cease, since there is no war without a cause. To the other territories mentioned in the 6th article of your excellency's draught, no right has in question been asserted by the republic of North America, nor do we believe it possible for it to assert any, consequently, it could not be acquired then only by the right of conquest, or by the title which will result from the cession or sale which Mexico might now make. But as we are persuaded, that the republic of Washington will not make [illegible] nor will hold in abhorrence the [illegible] of [illegible] and as, on the other hand, it would be a new thing, and contrary to every idea of justice, to make war upon a people for no other reason than because it refused to sell territory which its owners might to buy, we expect from the justice of the government and people of North America, that the ample modification which we have to propose to the cession of territory contemplated in the 6th article will not be a motive to persist in a war which the worthy General of the North American troops has justly styled unnatural."

In regard to the Rio Grande as the western boundary of the State of Texas, and the cession of Lower California, the commissioners say:

"That Mexico cannot cede the belt which lies between the left bank of the Bravo Rio Grande and the right of the Nueces. The reason entertained for this point alone the full certainty that such territory never belonged to the State of Texas, nor can it hereafter belong to the great valley in the abstract which it constitution. It is, because that tract, together with the Bravo, [Rio Grande] forms the natural frontier of Mexico, both in a military and commercial sense, and the frontier of no State ought to be changed, unless States should consent to abandon its frontier. But, in order to remove all cause of trouble hereafter, the government of Mexico engages not to found new settlements, nor establish colonies in the space between the two rivers, so that to maintain perpetual and unmolested quietude, it may occupy an equal space on both republics. That Lower California, which would be of little advantage to the republic of North America, offers great embarrassments to Mexico considering the position of that peninsula, opposite our coast of Sonora, from which it is separated by the waters of the gulf of Cortes. Your Excellency has appreciated our remarks on this point, and we have been gratified to see that you have yielded to them. The preservation of Lower California would be enough to make it indispensable to keep a port of Upper California, for, otherwise, that peninsular would be without any communication by land with the rest of the republic, which is always a great embarrassment, especially for a power like Mexico, which is not maritime."

As to the cession of New Mexico the language of the Mexican Minister is,

"We can not yield New Mexico, whose inhabitants have manifested their will to make a part of the Mexican family with more enthusiasm than any other of the republic. Those among Mexicans, abandoned to their fate by our administration—without protection—so many times, even from the invasions of the savages—have been the Mexicans most truly patriotic; because, forgetting their domestic complaints, they have only agreed that they are and wish to be of the family; especially when finding themselves already many times to the vengeance of their invader, which has been excited against them, and thus incurred and discovered their plans, they have again consoled themselves. Mexicans—can a government so small as all mankind—ask? Never! And if perish by that, the nationality of the rest of the republic, we will all perish together.

And as to the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, the commissioners say "That some years since the government of the republic granted to a private contractor a privilege, with reference to the object, which was connected with the services of the government, to Europe, subjects of whose public Mexico cannot dispose."

These are the reasons, sir, assigned by the Mexican government for rejecting the terms of peace offered by Mr. Trist, and, in the present posture of affairs, without a word of comment, I submit them to the Senate and the country.

But Mexico did not here throw away the olive branch and seize the sword. No, sir, she offered her project of a treaty, by which she proposed first, to yield Texas proper to the United States; second, to maintain the desert country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande in its uninhabited state as a national frontier; and third, to cede to the United States more than one half of Upper California, including the port and bay of San Francisco. The territory she proposed to cede comprises about 200,000 square miles, or an area larger than all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. This proposition was rejected by our commissioners, and hostilities were renewed. "The boundary of the Rio Grande," says the President,

"And the cession to the United States of New Mexico and Upper California, constituted an ultimatum which our commissioner was, under no circumstances, to yield."

Mr. Trist, therefore, was bound to reject the terms of peace offered by Mexico.

"The terms of a treaty proposed by the Mexican commissioners," says the President "were wholly inadmissible. They presented to us, Mexico were the victorious and not the vanquished party. It contained no provision for the payment by Mexico of the just claims of our citizens."

Is this, sir, a just, true, and impartial representation of the terms of peace proposed by Mexico? Did she take the stand of a victorious party, and claim concessions from us? Did she refuse to make provision for the payment of the just claims of our citizens? What consideration, sir, was she to receive for the two hundred thousand square miles of territory she proposed to cede to the United States, but a discharge from those claims? I am not prepared to estimate the value of the territory Mexico proposed to cede to the United States. It may have been insufficient to pay the just claims of our citizens upon that government; but the port and bay of San Francisco alone, I know, have been considered of great value to the United States.

It does, however, appear from the message, that the cession of territory demanded by our commissioner, was of greater value than a fair equivalent for our just demands; for he "was authorized to stipulate for the payment of such additional pecuniary consideration as was deemed reasonable."

Now, sir, I propound to Senators on the other side of the chamber this question: Was it just and honorable to demand of Mexico, with a victorious army thundering at the gates of her capital, a cession of territory of greater value than a fair equivalent for our just demands? This is an important question, and I hope it will be answered before the debate closes.

But, sir, the war is now raging, and to show the purpose for which its more vigorous prosecution is recommended and desired, I refer to the last annual message of the President. He says that "[illegible] recommended the United States will attempted to be made in America [illegible] been enacted, and the precious blood of many of our gallant fellow-citizens shed on the battle-fields of the war. This accumulation of injuries admitted of no atonement on the part of Mexico, nothing but war, and the most vigorous prosecution of war, could bring about a speedy and honorable peace.

"The rejection of the terms which we had offered in advance, and the adoption of a line of conduct on the part of Mexico which proved that she was not to be conciliated by forbearance, having failed to satisfy the military aspirations of her people, and having failed, by the operations of our arms, to compel them to accept peace on such terms as they were willing to grant, it became necessary to take a stronger position, and one which would enable us to conquer a peace. We accordingly took possession of the Mexican custom-houses on the coast, which were the principal sources of revenue to the Mexican government, and which furnished the means of supporting their military establishments. Large bodies of troops were then put in motion to take possession of other portions of the country, and to conquer and hold them as indemnity for the future expenses of the war, and for the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens. Accordingly, the Mexican provinces of New Mexico and California fell into our possession; that we should press forward our military operations, and keep constantly increasing the force in the enemy's country, so as to practicable, obtain the future expense of the war.

"If the government of Mexico acceded to the equitable and liberal terms proposed in the annual message, it would have been understood that Mexico having declined to make a peace on such terms as the United States could honorably accept, the United States, the national honor, no less than the public interests, requires that the war should be prosecuted with increased energy and power, until our just demands are obtained. In the meantime, it was proper that we should adopt such measures as would indemnify ourselves, by appropriating permanently, a portion of her territory. Until then the commencement of the war, New Mexico and the California were taken possession of by our forces. Our military and naval commanders were ordered to conquer and hold them, subject to be disposed of by a treaty of peace.

"These provinces are now in our undisputed occupation, and have been so for many months; all resistance on the part of Mexico having ceased with the last battle. I am satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico. Should Congress concur with me in this opinion, and that they should be retained by the United States as indemnity for the expenses of the war, and for the satisfaction of the claims of the United States should not at once be extended over them. To wait for a treaty of peace, such as we are willing to make, by which our relations toward them would not be established. In the mean time, Mexico would not be [illegible] to adopt such measures to indemnify ourselves, by appropriating permanently, a portion of her territory. Until then the commencement of the war, New Mexico and the California were taken possession of by our forces. Our military and naval commanders were ordered to conquer and hold them, subject to be disposed of by a treaty of peace.

Our military and naval commanders were ordered to conquer and hold them, subject to be disposed of by a treaty of peace.

"Had the Mexican government acceded to the equitable and liberal terms proposed last April," a cession of about one half of her republic would have satisfied the President; but her rejection of our terms, and the large expenditures of blood and treasure, occasioned by the renewal of hostilities, "must," he says, influence the terms of peace which it may be deemed proper hereafter to accept." How much he intends hereafter to claim, he has not condescended to inform us. New Mexico and the Californias, he says, are in our possession, and ought never to be surrendered to Mexico.

The other Mexican provinces in our possession are to be held as a means of coercing Mexico to accede to our terms of peace. Well, sir, what are our terms of peace? What does the President desire to coerce Mexico to do? Why, sir, to sell us fifteen or twenty millions of dollars worth of her territory. This is the plain English of the whole matter, and, in my judgment, it is a proceeding dishonorable to the country, and I will wash my hands of all participation in it. If we must take Mexican territory to pay the claims of our citizens upon that government, let us be contented with a cession sufficient for that purpose. Mexico is under no obligation to sell us her territory, and the war ought not to be continued for a single hour longer than is necessary to compel the measure has been recommended by the administration, and the honorable Senator from Arkansas. (Mr. SEVIER,) says, that is sufficient for him. It is not sufficient for me. I must act on my own responsibility, and not on the responsibility of the Executive. I must be satisfied that the measure is necessary to vindicate the rights and sustain the honor of the country, before I can support it.

Again, sir, it has been more than intimated by honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber, who have participated in this debate, that the only test of true patriotism and real love of country is a cordial support of all the measures recommended by the administration for the further prosecution of this war; and that opposition to them is opposition to the country, and taking sides with the enemy. Sir, I claim to be as patriotic, and as ready to stand by the country, in peace and in war, as Senators over the way. But it is one thing to stand by the country, and quite a different thing to stand by the administration. In standing by the country, I find myself compelled to oppose the measures recommended by the administration, because, in my judgment, if carried out, they would prove ruinous to the country. But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois, (Mr. DOUGLAS,) said he was surprised to hear this war and the recommendations of the President for its vigorous prosecution denounced, "especially from those Senators who voted for all the war measures of the last session and the preceding one." The war measures, sir, for which we have heretofore voted, were recommended, the President informed us, with no view to the acquisition of Mexican territory by conquest—a just and honorable peace, and not the forcible dismemberment of the Mexican republic, was the purpose avowed for the prosecution of the war. But, sir, the war, since the last session of Congress, has assumed a new character. Its more vigorous prosecution is now recommended for a new object, and one that we have never approved, but uniformly condemned. We have never voted men nor money for such a war as the President now avows this to be. The war for which we voted supplies was a war "waged with no view to conquest."

The honorable Senator, therefore, ought to feel no surprise at the stand we take against this bill.

But, sir, I will leave this subject and pass to a brief review of the measures which occasioned the war, viz: the annexation of Texas, and the order of the 13th of January, 1846, for the march of the army from Corpus Christi to the left bank of the Rio Grande. For these two measures the democratic party and the President are responsible. And I therefore charge upon them this war, and all the blood and treasure it has cost the country. The annexation of Texas was a strictly party measure. It was a scheme devised by the democracy of the South to prevent the abolition of slavery in Texas; and when first announced, it met with no favor from the democracy of the north. It was denounced with great violence, and in language somewhat offensive, by the party press, and in the conventions of the people. The Globe, the leading democratic press in this city, was opposed to the opposition, and it was continued up to the meeting of the democratic convention in Baltimore in May, 1844. Now, sir, as the honorable Senator from Illinois thought it his duty to convey through the Senate to the country the denunciations of a portion of the clergy and the press against the war of 1812, I will follow his example, and present to the country the denunciations of the northern democracy against the annexation of Texas, when the scheme was first announced to the country. But I shall do it with no view to cast reproach upon the people of Texas, but to show that with the northern democracy, obligations to country are sometimes overcome by obligations to party.

On the 20th of November, 1843, the Dover Gazette, N. H., a democratic paper, in an article against annexation, spoke of Texas in the following language:

"Texas is now a worse state than it is now—the most wicked, vile, God-abandoned place of which we have any knowledge—its history would make the savage blush with shame. * * * Yet there are some who desire to effect an union between Texas and this country, as if we had not enough guilt and crime already upon our hands. * * * [illegible] that we should have any connection with Texas. Heaven save us from such a connection!"

The New Hampshire Nashua Gazette (democratic paper) of November 9, 1843, in speaking of the annexation of Texas said:

"We hope, and sincerely trust there will be no trackling on the part of our northern representatives, when this mighty project shall come up before them in all its questionable shapes."

The New Hampshire Patriot (democratic paper) of November 23, 1843, speaking of annexation said:

"Be the President and his cabinet what they may, the attempt to throw this question into Congress at this time is [illegible] but we trust that the democrats have good sense enough to avoid being distracted by the acts of the enemy."

The Dover Gazette, New Hampshire, in the fall of 1843, in an article against the admission of Texas, among other things, said:

"The admission of Texas into the Union would be a public disgrace, and disgrace to us in the eyes of all the civilized world. It would array against us the moral influence of all Christendom, and draw upon us the just retribution of an offended God."

At a democratic convention held at Readfield, Maine, in the summer of 1843, to nominate a candidate for Congress for the 3d Congressional District, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the impolicy and inexpediency of the annexation of Texas to the United States, appear insurmountable objections to its admission into the Union; and that the silly representation of federal presses that the democratic party are in alliance with the slave power of the South, in a systematic design to effect the admission of Texas, is entirely unsupported by any facts, or by the slightest indications in any quarter, giving such a supposition the appearance of truth; and is, therefore, a wilful and deliberate fabrication of the federal party for base and partisan purposes."

Here, Mr. President, we have the views of the patriotic democracy of the 3d Congressional District in Maine upon the subject of Texas annexation. The charge that the democratic party were in favor of the measure, is declared to be a wilful falsehood, uttered by the federal party for base and partisan purposes. But, sir, this hostility to annexation was not confined to the 3d Congressional District in Maine, the democracy of the whole State opposed it by strong resolutions passed in the House of Representatives in the winter of 1843.

Here, sir, are the resolutions of the democratic Legislature of Massachusetts passed in 1843:

"Resolved, That under no circumstances whatever, can the people of Massachusetts regard the proposition to admit Texas into the Union, in any other light than as dangerous to its continuance in peace, in prosperity, and to the enjoyment of those blessings which it is the object of a free government to secure.

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts in the Congress of the United States, be requested to oppose such acts or measures as may tend to prevent—the adoption of the proposition referred to.

"Resolved, That it is expedient the governor be requested to transmit one copy of these resolutions to the executive of each of the United States, and a like copy to each Senator and Representative in Congress from Massachusetts.

The democracy of Massachusetts regarded the admission of Texas into the Union as dangerous to its perpetuity, and under no circumstances whatever, could they consent to it.

Ex-President Van Buren in a letter to Mr. Hammett, under date of April 20, 1844, opposed annexation, because, in his judgment, it would involve us in a war with Mexico.

And the Washington Globe of the first of May, 1844, contains the following editorial article:

"We concur with Mr. Van Buren fully and cordially in this view, and say it is the only wise, honorable, and practicable course. Mexico and Texas are now at war the armistice admitted, a circumstance of which we were not apprised when we wrote our first article on the subject, and to adopt the Texans as our citizens at this time, is to make ourselves a party to the war, and to take upon ourselves the business of its conclusion, either by negotiation or by arms. It requires no declaration of war from Mexico to involve us. From the moment we admit Texas, we make her a territory of the Union; and it would be unlawful and punishable in her to treat with Mexico or to fight alone with Mexico. The United States alone could not be so fight; and thus, from the day of the admission of the treaty, the United States and Mexico would be at war; commerce between them would cease, and they would remain at war, and commerce remain broken up, until the negotiation or the arms of the United States terminated the disputed war. This is the consequence, and these are the means."

"We have been looking a little further into the public half-documents which accompany the treaty, and every step amazes more and more. We find that Lord Aberdeen and the British minister here utterly deny the Duff Green story, sent from London in August last, of the designs of England upon Texas, which is now the foundation of the whole proceeding. We believe it is easily be proved that the whole scheme of getting up the Re-Texas question, precisely as that question now is, existed long before Duff Green furnished that pretext, and that all this story of British interference, now put forth as the pretext for the moment, has been invented since the movement was originated."—Globe, May 7, 1844.

"If the general government should take this step, in violation of the treaty with Mexico, would their character of our country be left to our pockets the same noble and honorable abhorrence which was handed down to us by Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson?

"We do not believe the great mass of our countrymen are willing to sacrifice the honor, the renown, and the real glory of this country for any earthly acquisition. If, then, Texas be annexed, by a common proclamation, the existence of a war between her and Mexico, if the government of the United States has, by a mere official dictum merely, changed a full knowledge that the cession of territory from Texas and Mexico, how can the President and Senate of the United States, without sacrificing the honor of the country, adopt this war with Mexico, in the face of our treaty of peace with that nation. Globe, May 15, 1844.

Here, sir, we have not only a full endorsement of Mr. Van Buren's views against annexation, but a strong argument showing that Mexico and Texas were at war, and that the adoption of the measure would make us a party to the war, and compel us to bring it to a conclusion, either by negotiation or by arms. Well, sir, as the southern democracy anticipated, the "firebrand" was thrown into Congress. On the 22d of April, 1844, President Tyler transmitted to the Senate, for ratification, a treaty annexing the republic of Texas to the United States. And what was its fate? Why, sir, it was rejected by a vote of 16 yeas to 35 nays. Every democratic Senator from the north, with the exception of Mr. Woodbury, from New Hampshire, voted against it. The rejection of the treaty, however, was but a temporary defeat of the measure. The Baltimore Convention, assembled for the purpose of nominating democratic candidates for President and Vice President, took the foreign relations of the country in charge, and resolved upon the re-annexation of Texas and the re-occupation of Oregon. How, Mr. President, was this resolution received by the northern democracy? New York rebelled at once. The leaders of the party came out in a circular denouncing it as an unauthorized interpolation into the democratic creed, and refused to sustain it. Mr. Van Buren, their favorite candidate for the Presidency, had been rejected by the convention for his opposition to annexation, and Mr. Polk, known to be friendly to the measure, had received the nomination. In this condition of things, it was a work of some difficulty to reconcile the democracy of New York to the nominees of the convention. But difficult as the task seemed, it was at length accomplished. The honorable Silas Wright, who was a member of the Senate in 1844, and had voted against the treaty of annexation, and who was known to be strongly opposed to the measure, was nominated as a candidate for governor. This nomination reconciled the democracy to vote for Mr. Polk, provided no democratic member of Congress should be elected who was not pledged against annexation. The news of this arrangement of family difficulties in New York was soon conveyed to the New England democracy. Mr. Wright's nomination, it was said, would secure New York to Mr. Polk, and New England must come in and sustain the party. Opposition to annexation must be given the go away, and in a few weeks the whole democratic party wheeled into the ranks and gave their support to the nominees of the convention.

Now, sir, to keep up the party character of the measure, I will go back to the resolution of annexation. In the winter of 1845, after the election of Mr. Polk, a joint resolution was introduced into the House of Representatives for the annexation of Texas to the United States, and on the same day I believe, a resolution for the same purpose was introduced into the Senate. On the 25th of January, the test vote was taken on the resolution in the House of Representatives, and it was passed—Yeas, 113. Nays, 106. every whig in the House, with the exception of three from Tennessee, two from Georgia, and one from Alabama, voting in the negative.

The House resolution came to the Senate, and the honorable Senator from Alabama, (Mr. BAGBY,) among others, made an able speech against it. He denied the constitutional power of Congress, acting upon the House resolution, to admit the Resolution—that power he maintained, belonged exclusively to another branch of the government, viz: the treaty making power. After this avowal of the Senator from Alabama, that he could not support the resolution as it came from the House, Mr. WALKER, then a Senator from Mississippi, moved an amendment conferring upon the President the power to withhold the resolution, if, in his judgment and discretion, he should deem it most advisable, and to negotiate with the republic of Texas for her admission into the Union. The amendment was adopted. A motion was then made, by a Senator on this side of the chamber, to strike out the first and second sections of the resolution and confine the President to negotiation alone for the acquisition of the country. This motion was opposed and defeated—the Senator from Alabama voting with the majority. The resolution was then passed by a vote of 27 Yeas, to 25 Nays, every democratic Senator voting in the affirmative, and every whig Senator, with the exception of Mr. HENDERSON from Mississippi, Mr. JOHNSON from Louisiana, and Mr. MERRICK from Maryland, voting in the negative.

Mr. BAGBY.—I do not suppose for a moment that the Senator intends to do me the slightest injustice in reference to what I said then or at any time. What I then said was—and I repeat it now—that I never would vote for the resolutions as they came from the House of Representatives, but that I would vote for the proposition as amended by the Senate. I disclaimed the idea of its being indispensably necessary to annex Texas by treaty, but said it might be done by treaty, or compact, and cited the compact between the United States and Georgia in 1802 as a case in point.

Mr. UPHAM.—The Senator opposed the resolution as it came from the House.

Mr. BAGBY.—Decidedly.

Mr. UPHAM.—No consideration could induce me to misrepresent the honorable Senator in any speech he has made, or any vote he has given upon this question. I alluded to the speech and votes of the Senator for the purpose of showing that the first and second sections of the resolution presented to the republic of Texas never had a majority of the Senate in their favor.

The democratic Senators from the North who voted against annexation in 1844, voted for it in 1845. Now, what happened in the nine months that elapsed between the rejection of the treaty and the passage of the resolution, to change their views upon the subject? Were the objections urged against the measure less formidable in 1844 than they were in 1845? Was annexation less objectionable to the democracy of the North after it became a party measure than it was before it assumed a party character? These are questions worthy of consideration, and on some convenient occasion I hope they will be answered.

The resolution of annexation having passed both houses of Congress, President Tyler, on the 1st of March, 1845, approved it; and the next day he sent off his messenger with directions to submit the first and second sections of the resolution to the republic of Texas, as an overture for her admission as a State into our Union. In this condition of affairs, President Tyler retired and the new administration came into power; and what, in was the influence of the new President? It was to declare his approval of the resolution for the annexation of Texas, and to urge the country that, in his opinion, our title to the Oregon country was clear, clear and unquestionable." But, sir, it has been said by Senators, on the other side of the chamber, that President Polk is in nowise responsible for the manner of annexation. The Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. TURNEY,) in his speech the other day, said that annexation took place under the Tyler administration; that President Polk had no connection with it in power over it. But Mr. Tyler, in the last hours of his administration, adopted the mode of annexation, and thereby deprived the new administration of the power to withhold the resolution and negotiate for the acquisition of the country.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator is laboring under a great mistake in this matter. Mr. Polk had as much to do in selecting the mode of annexation as Mr. Tyler. He not only approved of the proceedings of President Tyler, but directed our charge d'affaires in Texas to present the first and second sections of the resolution to that republic for her acceptance.

The message of December 2, 1845, will settle this question. The President says:

"In pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress, the minister of the United States, my predecessor, on the third day of March, 1845, elected to submit the first and second sections of that resolution to the republic of Texas, for her acceptance or rejection by a formal decree. Should she reject, the proposition was to be at an end, and no further action had been proposed; and accordingly two days out of the three allowed by the resolution for the acceptance of that republic."

Here, Mr. President, is a full approval of all the proceedings of Mr. Tyler, touching the manner of annexation. The first and second sections of the resolutions were presented to Texas for her acceptance, under instructions from President Polk, given seven days after Mr. Tyler's term of office had expired. Mr. Polk was not bound by the proceedings of his predecessor. He had full power to withhold the resolution, and proceed by negotiation, if he preferred that mode of acquisition.

But, Mr. President, it is time to leave this branch of the subject, and pass to the order of the 13th of January, 1846, for the march of the army from Corpus Christi to the left bank of the Rio Grande. This order, in my judgment, was an act of Executive usurpation, and the immediate cause of the war. If our army had remained at Corpus Christi, the acquisition of Texas would, to use the language of the President—

"Have been a fruitless contest. No great force would have been required to produce the result. The sword would have had no part in the victory."

The resolution of annexation declares—

"That Congress doth consent, that the territory properly included within and rightfully belonging to the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments."

It appears on the face of the resolutions, that a portion of the territory claimed by the Republic of Texas was in dispute, and might not properly belong to her, and that her right to the disputed territory was a question to be settled by this government and Mexico. The republic of Texas had, by her act of Congress, passed in December, 1836, declared the Rio Grande, from its mouth to its source, to be her southwestern boundary; but she had not at that time, nor at the time the resolution of annexation was passed, possession of any portion of the country west of the Nueces, except a small settlement on the western bank of that river. The whole territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, as I shall show before I resume my seat, with the exception of the small settlement mentioned, was in possession of Mexico, and claimed as a part of her republic. Now, sir, what was the duty of the President in regard to this matter? What are his powers in the adjustment of international controversies? They are pacific; not belligerent. His instrumentalities are diplomatic agents; not armies and navies. He makes contracts and treaties with foreign governments; but he has no authority without the consent of Congress, to call on the military power of the country to enforce their performance. He is, it is true, commander-in-chief of the army and navy, but he has no authority to employ them against a foreign nation for any purpose whatever, without the order of Congress. The whole war-making power is, by the constitution, lodged in Congress. And Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing the condition of the country from peace to war. This was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, as expressed to Congress in his confidential message of December 9, 1805, in regard to a question of disputed boundary between the United States and Spain, growing out of our Louisiana purchase.

"'Any measure,' says Mr. Jefferson, 'of hostile character,' says Mr. Jefferson, 'our minister ended the conference, without having been able to obtain redemnity for spoliations of any description, or any satisfaction as to the boundaries of Louisiana, other than a declaration that we had no claims beyond those of the Iberville.' * * * *

"Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided."

This, Mr. President, is sound constitutional doctrine, and if Mr. Polk had followed in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, this war would have been avoided. It was the duty of the President to settle this question of disputed boundary with Mexico by negotiation if he could, but if his efforts failed, it was equally his duty to inform Congress of the fact, and await their authority for marching the army on to the disputed territory. Congress was in session, and could have been consulted without the least inconvenience.

The ground I assume is, that the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande being disputable, and most of it in possession of Mexico, the President had no right to take forceable possession of it even if it rightfully belonged to the State of Texas, without authority from Congress. We have had many questions of disputed boundary with foreign nations, and no administration, except the present, ever thought of taking forceable possession of the disputed territory. Our northeastern boundary was in dispute from the peace of 1783 to 1842, and no attempt was made by any of our Presidents to take possession, by force, of the territory we claimed. But, Mr. President, various pretences have been set up to justify the march of our army to the left bank of the Rio Grande. The honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in his elaborate speech upon this question said, that the United States had received the republic of Texas into the Union without antecedently defining her boundaries, and under a constitution including the disputed territory; and, therefore, they were bound to defend it. Sir, the constitution of Texas formed after the passage of the resolution of annexation, and under which she was admitted as a State of the Union, did not define her southwestern boundary—that was left an open question to be settled by negotiation between the United States and Mexico. Again, Mr. President, the honorable Senator said that Mexico had mustered an army on the Rio Grande with the declared object of invading Texas, and recovering the whole to her own sovereignty, and that we had a clear, undeniable right to meet her there and strike the first blow. But I understood the Senator to admit, that our right to meet her there and strike the blow could be justified only upon the principle of self-defence. If we were in no danger of a blow from Mexico—if she had no force collected for the invasion of Texas, then our march into the disputed territory was an unjustifiable act of hostility. Now, sir, where is the evidence that Mexico had mustered an army on the Rio Grande with the declared object of invading and conquering Texas? Did the President say anything of the kind in his message of the 11th of May, 1846, informing Congress that he had ordered the army to the left bank of the Rio Grande? No, he assigned no such reason for the order. He said in that message that our force remained at Corpus Christi until after he had received such information from Mexico as rendered it probable, if not certain, that the Mexican government would refuse to receive our Envoy. Our army, then, was ordered to occupy the left bank of the Rio Grande, because the President apprehended that Mexico would reject our Envoy. Now, Mr. President, to show that Mexico had mustered no army on the Rio Grande with a view to the invasion of Texas, and that the President knew it when he issued the order of the 13th May, 1846, I call the attention of the Senate and the country, to Gen. Taylor's correspondence with the War Department while he remained at Corpus Christi.

In a despatch to the War Department, dated Corpus Christi, August 20th, 1845, Gen. Taylor says that—

"Occasional trader arrive occasionally from the Rio Grande, but have no news of importance. They represent that there are no regular troops on that river except at Matamoras, and do not seem to be aware of any preparations for a descent from the side of the river."

On the 6th of September, 1845, in another despatch, he says—

"I have the honor to report that a confidential agent, &c. &c. and one dressed as a Matamoras, has returned, and reports that no extraordinary preparations are going for ward there, that the garrison does not seem to have been increased, and that even on subjects of opinion there will be no declaration of war."

Again, in another despatch of September 14th, 1845, Gen. Taylor says:

"We have no news of interest from the frontier. Arista, at the last accounts, was at Mier, but without any force more so there, as yet, any concentration of troops on the river."

In a despatch under date of October 11th, 1845, he says that—

"Recent arrivals from the Rio Grande bring no news or information of a different aspect from that which I reported in my last. The same report in regard to any preparations relative to the pacific disposition of the border people on both sides of the river are confirmed."

And in another despatch under date of January 7, 1846, he says:

"We have many arrivals from Matamoras and other points on the river, but they bring no intelligence of interest. A recent scout of volunteers from San Antonio struck the river near Presidio, Rio Grande, and the commander reports every thing quiet in that quarter."

Who, Mr. President, with this evidence before him, can say that General Taylor, on the 13th of January, 1846, was ordered to the Rio Grande to meet and repel a Mexican army there collected for the invasion of Texas? On the 7th of January, only six days before the order was issued, General Taylor informed the President that every thing was quiet in that quarter. But, sir, the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] has attempted to justify the order on another ground. He says it was issued on the recommendation and at the request of General Taylor. If this were true it would be no justification for the President. The expediency of such a measure was a question for Congress to settle. General Taylor had nothing to do with it. But, Mr. President, the order was not ordered to the Rio Grande on the recommendation of General Taylor. All he said upon the subject is contained in his letter to the War Department, under date of October 4th, 1845, more than three months before he received orders to leave Corpus Christi. In that letter he says:

"It will be recollected that the instructions of June the 15th, issued by Mr Bancroft, then Secretary of War, to me, left me to decide and act upon a meeting Rio Grande, such a course as will connect with the health of the troops, and will be best adapted to repel invasion," &c.

After assigning the reasons which induced him to concentrate his force at Corpus Christi, he proceeds as follows:

"It is with great deference that I make any suggestion on topics which have become matter of delicate negotiation, but if our government in settling the question of boundary, makes the line of the Rio Grande an ultimatum I cannot help fearing settlement will be greatly facilitated and he would by occupying positions at once at one or two suitable points on or quite near that river. Our strength and state of preparation would be displayed in a manner it would be not to."

If our government had determined at all events to make the Rio Grande the western boundary of Texas, the sooner we let Mexico know it the better. This is the sum and substance of all General Taylor said upon the subject. His suggestion was based upon the ground, that the line of the Rio Grande was our ultimatum.

Mr. President, there must have been at the bottom of this movement something more than a desire to settle upon just and honorable terms the western boundary of Texas; and I will endeavor to show what it was. Our government was aware that the annexation of Texas would give offence to Mexico, and an effort was made to reconcile her to the measure. On the 19th of April, 1844, Mr. Calhoun, the Secretary of State, directed Mr. Green, our Charge d'Affaires in Mexico, to inform that government that a treaty for the annexation of Texas to the United States had been signed by the Plenipotentiaries of the two governments, and would be sent to the Senate, without delay, for its approval. In making this fact known Mr. Green was directed to give the Mexican government the strongest assurance that, in adopting the measure, we were actuated by no feeling of disrespect or indifference to the honor or dignity of Mexico; and that the step was forced upon the United States in self-defence, in consequence of the policy adopted by Great Britain in reference to the abolition of Slavery in Texas. Mr. Green was further enjoined to assure the Mexican government that it was our desire to settle all questions between the two countries which might grow out of the treaty, or any other cause, on the most liberal terms, including that of boundary. On the 23d of May Mr. Green gave the Mexican government notice of the treaty and strong assurance that the question of boundary would be settled on the most liberal terms.

On the 10th of September, 1844, Mr. Calhoun, as Secretary of State, directed Mr. Shannon, our Minister in Mexico, to renew to the Mexican government the declaration made by our Charge d'Affaires, that if annexation should be consummated the United States would be prepared to adjust all questions growing out of it, including that of boundary, on the most liberal terms.

Well, Mr. President, after having given these strong assurances to Mexico in regard to the question of boundary, we passed the resolution annexing Texas to the United States, and it was approved on the 1st of March, 1845.

On the 15th of June 1845, about three months after the passage of the resolution, and five months before Texas accepted our proposition of annexation, the President ordered General Taylor to the left bank of the Rio Grande to protect what, in the event of annexation, was to be our western border. Yes, Mr. President, before annexation was consummated, the administration, notwithstanding the strong assurances given to Mexico that the question of boundary would be settled upon the most liberal terms, had determined that the Rio Grande should be the western boundary of Texas. Was this acting in good faith towards Mexico? Was it calculated to allay her opposition and reconcile her to annexation? No, sir, it was calculated to increase her hostility to the measure, and widen the breach between the two governments.

Mr SEVIER.—The order of the 15th of June was, that Gen. Taylor should remain on the Sabine.

Mr. UPHAM.—I have it in my hand and will read it.

The acting Secretary of War, in his orders to General Taylor under date of June 15th, 1845, says:

"The point of your ultimate destination is the western frontier of Texas, where you will select and occupy such position on the Rio Grande Del Norte, such encampment with the health of the troops, will be best adapted to repel invasion, and to protect what in the event of annexation, will be our western border."

Here, sir, is the declaration of the President by his Secretary of War, in the event of annexation, that the Rio Grande will be our western border. I was therefore correct in the assertion that the administration had determined, before annexation was consummated, to force upon Mexico the boundary of the Rio Grande. And, Mr. President, if time would permit, I could show by the correspondence of the War Department with our Military and Naval Officers in Mexico, that the Executive, after he had yielded to Great Britain 5° 40′ of territory in Oregon, to which he had declared our title "clear and unquestionable," turned his attention to Mexico with a fixed determination to wrest from her by the sword, New Mexico and Upper California. On the 3d of June, 1846, the Secretary of War in his despatch to General Kearney, says:

"It has been decided by the President to be of the greatest importance in the present war with Mexico, to take the earliest possession of Upper California. An expedition with that view, is hereby ordered, and you are destined to command it."

In a despatch to Col. Stevenson under date of September 11th, 1846, the Secretary says "the Military occupation of California is the main object in view." In another despatch to Commodore Sloat, commanding our Naval forces in the Pacific Ocean, under date of July 12th, 1846, he says:

"The object of the United States, under its rights as a belligerent nation, to possess itself, at all, of Upper California."

Commodore Sloat in his general order of July 7th, 1846, says "It is not only our duty to take California, but to preserve it afterwards as a part of the United States, at all hazards." In regard to New Mexico, General Kearny in his letter to the Department of War, under date of August 24th, 1846, says:

"On the 22d I issued a proclamation, claiming the whole of New Mexico, with its then boundaries, as a territory of the United States of America, and taking it under our protection. It is the wish and intention of the United States, Texas General protection. It is the wish and intention of the United States, Texas General protection. It is the wish and intention of the United States, Texas General

"3d. The right of the people on both sides of the Rio Grande to trade with each other unmolested, in accordance with the established usages of nations, and such regulations as may be established by the two governments."

Mr. RUSK said he had lived in Texas for fifteen years, and never heard of such agreement, and he asked when and where the paper was signed, its date, and who signed it.

Mr. UPHAM—I cannot give the date of the agreement nor the names of the persons who signed it. I have only the three first articles as I found them in the newspaper of the day.

Mr. RUSK said that no agreement was ever made with Canales, or any body, of the kind alluded to. Canales was considered there a public highway robber. He had often attempted to raise insurrection in Texas, as also did other Mexican officers, but he always kept on the other side of the Rio Grande.

Mr. UPHAM—This agreement makes up a part of the history of Texan independence, and I have never before heard its truth called in question. It has been the rounds of the newspapers, and it was read in the other end of the capital in debate last winter in presence, I presume, of the members from Texas, and not, to my knowledge, denied.

Mr. RUSK said if it was a part of the history of Texan independence, it had never reached Texas.

Mr. UPHAM—If the agreement is a forgery it ought not to prejudice the claim of Texas to territory west of the Nueces; but if it is a genuine instrument, it goes very far to show that she had abandoned all claim west of that river.

But to pass on. Gen. Taylor's account of his march from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande shows that the country was in possession of Mexico. At the Arroyo Colorado he was met by a party of irregular cavalry (Canalizos,) who informed him that crossing the river would be considered an act of hostility; and that they had express orders to fire upon him if he attempted it. He, however, crossed the river without molestation and proceeded on his way. When within ten miles of Point Isabel he discovered a party on his right flank bearing a white flag. It turned out to be a deputation from the northern district of Tamaulipas, with a formal protest against his occupation of the country. When he approached Point Isabel the inhabitants set fire to their buildings and fled to Matamoras for protection. When he reached the Rio Grande he was summoned to withdraw his force and fall back beyond the Nueces—that is, into Texas. It was Mexican, and not Texan territory that he was desired to abandon.

Again, Mr. President, an officer in General Taylor's army, in a letter to the New York Spirit of the Times, dated Camp Opposite Matamoras, April 19th, 1846, says:

"Our flag floats in the midst of a population who look on the present occupation of their country as the actual work of the sword of the invader. We are [illegible] hours."

Another officer, in a letter to the Albany Atlas, dated at the Camp Before Matamoras, says:

"We are the people until Spaniards. The country is unmolested except those near the Rio Grande, all kept out on a petty show population, and every person we have spoken to prefers our [illegible] Mexican Government."

The testimony of these officers, sir, needs no comment. It shows beyond all doubt that the country was in the quiet and peaceable possession of Mexico when General Taylor invaded it. Mr. President, I will go farther and show that the United States have regarded and treated the left bank of the Rio Grande as Mexican territory. On the 3d of March, 1845, two days after the approval of the resolution of annexation by the President, Congress passed an act declaring—

"That a collection district, which has been created and the duties [illegible] on the Rio Grande, be extended [illegible] to Camargo in Mexico, on [illegible] in New Mexico."

Here, sir, is a positive law of Congress, from which there is no escaping, touching Santa Fe in New Mexico—regulating commerce with her as with other foreign nations, and granting the principle of drawback. Santa Fe, it should be remembered, is on the east bank of the Rio Grande. But this, sir, is not the only instance in which the United States have treated the left bank of the Rio Grande as Mexican territory. Our military chiefs, under instructions from the President of the United States, have established a territorial government over the Santa Fe country, thereby recognizing it as Mexican territory. No Senator, I presume, will contend that a territorial government can be established within the jurisdiction of one of the sovereign States of this Union. Now, Mr. President, how are these facts met and answered by Senators on the other side of the chamber? The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] made an able speech the other day to prove the right of Texas to the left bank of the Rio Grande; but, in my judgment, he failed to establish the fact. He contended that Texas never rebelled against the constituted authorities of Mexico; but that a few military leaders, with Santa Anna at their head, conspired and rebelled against the republic of Mexico—seized the reins of government—abolished the federal constitution and state governments, and established a military despotism in their stead;—that Santa Anna reduced to submission all that portion of the republic of Mexico which lies to the south and west of the Rio Grande;—that the people on this side of the Rio Grande took up arms and confined the power of the revolutionary government to the right bank of that river.

Now, sir, suppose all this to be true. How does it prove the right of Texas to the State of Tamaulipas, or any Mexican State on this side of the Rio Grande? If the revolution was confined to the right bank of the Rio Grande, the Mexican States on this side of the river retained their separate existence and original boundaries. But, Mr. President, Santa Anna, it is said, while a prisoner of war in Texas, made a treaty with that government establishing the Rio Grande, from its mouth to its source, as the southwestern boundary of Texas.

Santa Anna made no treaty with Texas while a prisoner of war, or at any other time. On the 12th of May, 1836, while a prisoner of war in Texas, he entered into articles of agreement with Texas by which he bound himself to use his influence with his government to procure a treaty acknowledging the independence of Texas and establishing the Rio Grande as her southwestern boundary. His government, however, repudiated the agreement and refused to make any terms whatever with Texas. In December after this agreement, the Texan Congress passed an act declaring the Rio Grande, from its mouth to its source, to be her western boundary, and that, it is claimed, gave her a right to the country. This act of Congress, sir, gave Texas no right whatever to one foot of territory beyond her ancient limits that she had not conquered from Mexico and subjected to her jurisdiction and laws.

This question was largely discussed in this chamber when the treaty of annexation was before us in 1844, Judge Woodbury, then a Senator from New Hampshire, and now one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in his speech in favor of the ratification of the treaty, said:

"Texas, by a mere law, could acquire no title but what she conquered from Mexico and actually occupied. Hence, though by law no limit was fixed to the claim of Texas, she could hold and convey only what, at or to the utmost, was what she acquired and got into possession."

The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in the course of his able speech against the treaty, introduced the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the incorporation of the left bank of the Rio del Norte (Rio Grande, onto the American Union, by virtue of a treaty with Texas, commencing the Sabine, and running with that stream to the Gulf, and thence westwardly to the Nueces, to Chihuahua, Coahuila and Tamaulipas, would be an act of direct aggression upon Mexico, for which no cause or pretext could be found in the United States."

The Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, then a member of the Senate, but since deceased, in a speech delivered at Watertown, New York, just after he had voted against the treaty, said:

"I felt it my duty to vote against the last section of the treaty for the annexation of Texas. I believed that the treaty, from the boundaries that must be implied from it, embraced a country to which Texas had no claim, never asked, he had never exerted jurisdiction, and which she held no right to cede."

The claim of Texas to the left bank of the Rio Grande derived no strength whatever from her act of Congress. If she had no title before, she had none afterwards. "I wash my hands," said Col. BENTON,

"Of all the attempts to dismember the Mexican Republic, by severing her dominions in New Mexico, Chihuahua, Coahuila and Tamaulipas. The treaty, in all that relates to the boundary of the Rio Grande, is an act of unparalled outrage on Mexico. It is the seizure of two thousand miles of her territory without a word of explanation with her, and by virtue of a treaty with Texas to which she is no party."

After full discussion, the treaty, as I have before said, was rejected by a vote of 35 nays, to 16 yeas.

Mr. President, I have already trespassed too long upon the patience of the Senate, and I will bring my remarks to a close. The career of conquest upon which we have entered, is full of danger and peril to the country. It may bring under our dominion foreign states and provinces, but it will bring with them an ignorant, degraded population, wholly unprepared for the enjoyment of our free and liberal institutions. With the extension of our territorial limits will come an increase of armies and navies, and the building up of a great military power, never contemplated by the framers of the constitution. An increase of Executive patronage will follow, and an ambitious President, selected from the successful commanders of the army, may trample the constitution under foot, and subject the people to the despotism of military rule. If they appeal to the constitution and laws for protection, they will be answered in the language of Cæsar to Metellus—"tit at arms and laws never flourish at the same time." Mr. President, I call on the student of history, and ye have many in this chamber, to point me to a nation, either ancient or modern, that has by its wars of conquest, acquired any enduring glory, or confered any lasting benefits upon its people.

Did Greece gain any enduring fame by the wars of conquest in which she engaged? No, sir, Grecian liberties perished at Chæronea more than two thousand years ago. Rome carried her victorious arms into neighboring provinces, and subjected them to her dominion, but she could not save her republic. Roman liberties were cloven down by Roman armies on the battle field of Philippi more than thirty years before the Christian era.

What has France gained by the wars of invasion and conquest in which she has been engaged? She dethroned kings and established her power in the countries around her. She drenched the continent in blood, in her wars of conquest. And what is her condition now?

She is confined to her ancient limits, and quietly reposing under the reign of her legitimate sovereign. What has Russia gained by her conquest of the Caucassian country? Nothing, sir; she received the submission of the people in 1796, and from that day to this, she has been compelled to keep in the field an army of twenty thousand men to defend and protect it. Mr. President, aggressive war is no part of our mission—we can gain no enduring glory by the conquest of foreign states and provinces. The victories that redound most to our honor are achieved in the workshops and counting houses of the country. We have a broad domain with every variety of soil and climate, and by industry, enterprise, and energy, we can command all the comforts and luxuries of life, and secure for our country the admiration of the world.

Mr. RUSK indicated his intention of addressing the Senate upon the bill to-morrow; and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate herewith a report of the Secretary of War, together with the accompanying report of the Adjutant General, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, calling for information in regard to the order or law by virtue of which certain words "in relation to the promotion of Cadets have been inserted in the Army Register of the United States, page 45, in the year 1845."

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15, 1848.

The message having been read—

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORT FROM THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the causes of the repeated failures of the mail to, and from, New Orleans.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and be printed.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bills:

An act to provide additional quarters near to New Orleans for United States' soldiers and volunteers returned from, or going to, the seat of war in Mexico.

An act to authorize the issuing of a register or enrollment to the schooner Robert Henry.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX, in presenting the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, praying for a return of duties on merchandize destroyed by fire in that city, in July, 1845, said: the memorial stated that by the conflagration referred to, buildings and merchandize to the value of about six millions of dollars had been consumed; that the duties on the merchandize was estimated to exceed six hundred thousand dollars, of which about four hundred thousand dollars were on unbroken packages. It also appeared that many of the merchants on whom these losses fell, immediately ordered fresh importations to supply the place of the merchandize destroyed: so that they had, in fact, paid double duties. Under these circumstances, they prayed that the duties on the merchandize destroyed might be refunded; and he would move to refer the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The reference to the Committee on Finance was ordered.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of Monroe, Maine, praying the establishment of a mail route from Augusta to Bangor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Amaziah Goodwin, a pensioner of the United States, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying the establishment of a mail route from Jasper to Troy, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ADDITIONAL CADETS.

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment, by the President, of ten or more additional cadets at large, in the Military Academy at West Point, and to report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk.

MR. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States has notified the House of Representatives, that he approved and signed, on the 15th inst., the following acts:

An act to authorize the issue of a register to the barque Wilhamet.

An act to confirm the boundary line between Missouri and Arkansas.

An act for the relief of Joseph and Lindley Ward.

SURVEY OF THE MOUTH OF RED RIVER.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill to provide for a survey of the mouth of Red river, in the State of Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

LAND OFFICE IN FLORIDA.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred sundry petitions of citizens of Florida on the subject, reported a bill in relation to the location of the land office, in the Alachua Land District, in Florida, which was read and passed to the second reading.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to regulate the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in certain cases," and for other purposes, with the amendment of the House of Representatives thereto, reported in favor of concurring in the amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said amendment: and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act in amendment of the acts respecting the judicial system of the United States," reported it without amendment.

THANKS TO GENERAL SCOTT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott, and the troops under his command, for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847.

Ordered, That it be passed to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time.

On the question, "Shall this resolution pass?" the yeas and nays had been demaded at a former day by Mr. HALE; and, being ordered, were taken, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Mass., Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dowas, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Johnson, of Ga., Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Sevier, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Upham, Westcott, Yulee—42.

NAYS.—Mr. Hale.—1.

THANKS TO GENERAL TAYLOR.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolutions from the House of Representatives of thanks to Major General Taylor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I rise to inquire whether the resolution is now in a state to admit of amendment. I feel quite strongly that some little modification of the language of the resolution will be an improvement of it. When before the Military Committee some exception was taken to the form of the resolution; but I am one who is not at all scrupulous about the language used on such occasions, when compliment is intended, and so rather than disturb the resolution, we thought it best to report it back to the Senate just as it was sent to us. But upon reconsideration of the matter, I think it proper to move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "indomitable," and "thereby obtaining a victory over the enemy, which, for its signal and brilliant character, is unsurpassed in the military annals of the world."

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, called for a reading of the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The resolution as amended was then read, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I have suggested the amendment which has been just adopted, not from any disposition, of course, at all to stint or diminish the honors to which I think General Taylor and the troops under his command are entitled for the victory of Buena Vista; but because I think that the language to which the resolution is now reduced, expresses in the simplest form and with unquestionable truth, what may be said in reference to that great commander and his army in that achievement. His own character is of that simple cast, sir, which naturally seems to prompt the use of a language congenial to that simplicity in everything that is said of him. When he and the battle of Buena Vista are spoken of, no pompous, gaudy [illegible] clothed. Each stand out before the world in character [illegible] and most kind, in a language that cannot be surpassed in any phraseology which we, sir, may employ.

I am sorry that there is one single negative in this body to giving thanks to our armies for the victories they have won in its service. It is known to you, sir, that I am not amongst those who have approved of this war in its origin and its progress; but I make a distinction between those who might, as I think, have guided public affairs more wisely and with better results, and those whose duty it was to obey our orders and conform themselves to our decrees. Is it possible that any gentleman can desire that the officers of our army shall set in council to revise our acts and determine upon the question of the morality of their obedience to our orders? Your rules and articles of war forbid the possibility of it. Any convocation of military men in camp for the purpose of deliberating upon political questions and deciding them, in prohibited under the severest pains and penalties; and, sir, we would not hear their appeal, no matter how respectful the form in which it might be addressed to us, on any political question. They are our executive officers, and their duty is obedience. Yet, if I understand the objection made here, it is to the effect that they share in the responsibility of our decision; and, although bound by their oaths to obedience—bound by their office to obedience—bound by their office not to interfere with politics, or intermeddle with our decisions, but to obey and execute them, that they are to be responsible for our decrees, and their conduct is not to be measured by the skill and fidelity with which they execute these decrees there is this sort of cavilling—this morality, if you please so to name it—to lead us? A sheriff may next set himself up to consider the judgment which the court has rendered, and to take into scrupulous consideration how far he can consistently execute the process put into his hands under that judgment! Sir, he has as much right to consider, when the execution is put into his hands, the morality and justice of that judgment, as Generals Scott and Taylor, or any of their officers or men, had to consider the justice and propriety of this war. The law and the constitution have marked out definite duties for them to perform, and their merit consists in their faithful and punctual discharge of these duties, and nothing else; and they deserve credit or discredit exactly in proportion to the constancy, courage, and firmness with which they do discharge their executive duties. I can see no end to the mischiefs to result from the doctrine of the gentleman from New Hampshire. According to this doctrine an officer is not only to consider how best he may execute the duty imposed upon him in executing our laws, but he is to sit in counsel and judgment, reviewing our acts of Congress, and determining for himself what to do, and acting accordingly. Will not the honorable Senator from New Hampshire allow your generals and officers to convene together, and mayhap to divide themselves, generals and colonels into one house, like your Senate; and corporals and privates into another, a House of Commons, there to take into consideration the questions of war and peace, and decide as they may think justice and morality require? Will the gentleman allow them to decide for war when we are in favor of peace, or for peace when we are in favor of war? What does the gentleman think of that? If his doctrine be admitted it will be followed by all its consequences, not merely in those to which the gentleman would confine it. The army may as well overrule our decision in favor of peace as that in favor of war. Sir, this is nothing but a spirit of mutiny. There is neither patriotism nor morality in this doctrine; neither in its foundation nor its results. It is a mutiny against morality—a mutiny against all discipline—a mutiny against all government. There must be a head to legislate and direct, an I a body to execute. It is in the Congress of the United States to decide, and it is in the army to obey; and to that honorable duty I am disposed strictly to limit and confine the army. I am wholly opposed to allowing the army to meddle with politics. Your army will be very ready and some of its officers will be very ready to take your places in the work of legislation, and not only to hold the sword in one hand, but to make laws with the other. It is to that, sir, that the doctrine of the gentleman leads; for the moment that you require of your generals to consider and entertain the morality, according to their notions of orders given them, you must, from that moment, leave them at liberty to decide for or against you; and if General Taylor be authorized to consider the morality of this question of peace or war, and to lay down his sword if he pleases, every officer of the army, and every enlisted soldier, has the same right to do so. Can you distinguish between one and the other? No, sir, you cannot. And what sort of a government would you have in that case! It would be the mockery of the world. Yet that is the result to which this refined and original system of ethics would conduct you. Yet that is the pious and extravagant sort of morality, by the aid of whose inflation some minds seem to have ascended above the ordinary and sublunary concerns of mankind, and all those plain rules of government and morality which have regulated the course of human society. These philosophers soar far above all that, and entering the ethereal regions, seem engaged in the search for some celestial sort of guide for their government on earth! I do not say that the gentleman before me goes to that extent of extravagance. He is one for whose talents and ability I entertain all proper respect; but, sir, is not the doctrine for which he contends likely to lead others, with less competency and less discretion to circumscribe its tendencies, into all these excesses? Can any thing but misrule and disorder and extravagance be the consequence? And how much less deluded is such a politician than one of those Millerites who, arraying himself in what he calls his "ascension robes," climbs up a tree in order that he may have a fair flight to heaven! It seems to me to be a political delusion of the same character, scarcely less extravagant, and certainly much more injurious to mankind.

Now, sir, if ever military men deserved credit for the skill and courage and fidelity with which they executed orders, Taylor and Scott are the men who have earned it; and does it now become us, after having made the way, or any of us, after the war has been made by the country, by its constituted authorities—does it become us to set ourselves in the chair of morality and give a sort of professional lecture, teaching our officers and soldiers a lesson of disobedience and mutiny—teaching them that they should receive our decision, reverse it, and breaking their swords, return home breathing out denunciations against their country, for the injustice and immorality of its legislation? Surely not. I know that the objection is urged only against giving thanks, but that amounts to censure. Will you not give them any credit? They have won battles. Many of them have shed their blood—their life's blood. Why are they not to have thanks? In another case, the objector admits, thanks would be properly accorded, but in this case, he denies that they could be justly given. Does not the very ground on which the objection to the honor contemplated to be given to them rests, imply that they have not done their duty so well as they might have done it by not gaining these victories? Can the gentleman, or anybody else here, draw a valid distinction? Suppose they had been defeated in these battles—suppose General Taylor had been vanquished at Buena Vista, would the gentleman then have offered his thanks? He will not thank him for the victory; would he have thanked him for suffering defeat? Suppose the soldiers had refused to obey the orders of General Taylor, saying "We have considered the matter and do not think that this is a just war—we think it has been carried far enough—it ought to have stopped at Monterey?"—would these men, in the estimation of the gentleman, have merited our thanks?

Sir, the evils into which the consequences of this doctrine, if adopted, would lead us, are endless and nameless. I can only say of the doctrine, that it is full of mischief. These men have sustained the honor of their country—they have gained illustrious and distinguished victories against those whom you have declared to be enemies, and against whom you have sent them to fight. It is for that I give them thanks; it is for that the Senate and the country have given their thanks; and I do hope—I can hardly hope—I was about to express the hope—that this resolution may be allowed to pass without a single dissenting voice. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire has already achieved the solitary glory of standing alone. I can myself make no distinction between Taylor and Scott, or their respective armies in regard to these victories; but I cannot but hope that when a gentleman of so much talent and ability as the honorable Senator from New Hampshire shall reconsider more calmly and cooly the opinions under which he has acted, and advocated so eloquently here, he will be disposed to think that it is better to go on in the plain common way in which mankind have gone, and that the reason of mankind has approved for so many years, than strike out into any of these new and devious paths, into which extravagant and over-refined notions of morality may lead.

Mr. HALE.—So pointed allusion has been made to the position which I occupy that it seems due to myself and to the Senate that I should say one word in vindication of the course which I have taken. This is the second occasion on the floor of the Senate, within a few days, on which I have been either complimented or reproached—I can hardly say which—for standing alone. That was the very mission upon which I came. I came here to stand alone, so long as that policy which the government was pursuing was persisted in; and I shall continue to stand alone until different sentiments prevail in this body, or a revolution in public sentiment shall send different representatives upon this floor. That is my position, then, and whether it is an honor or reproach, others may say. It is not for me to say whether it is honorable or dishonorable.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky seems to think that my course, if persisted in, would open Pandora's box and let loose and rampant all manner of evil upon society in the United States. What is the course which I adopted? Has a syllable against the character of either of those officers escaped my lips? Certainly not—not a syllable. When the subject came up, I said that I could not consistently with the convictions which I entertained, record any vote in favor of thanks to those officers. Sir, I may be a fanatic or a Millerite; but I will not be a hypocrite. I will not thank officers for the agency which they have had in producing results which I loathe. No, sir. Whilst disapproving of the whole affair, I confess that I have not discrimination enough—I have not sufficient skill in splitting hairs—to enable me without uneasiness to denounce the war as a war of robbery, as unconstitutional and unjust, as begun by the President, and at the same time thank the agents who have been engaged in carrying out this unjust and unconstitutional war. My fanaticism does not enable me to make such subtle distinctions as that; and all that I said, when I addressed the Senate for a few moments on that day, was that I proposed to vindicate the propriety of my conduct by a reference to history, showing that on a similar occasion, a precedent had been furnished, which

I thought I might safely follow. That precedent was presented in the conduct of those who stood upon the side of justice, truth, liberty and humanity, in the British Parliament, when the gigantic power of that empire was exerted to crush the spirit of liberty here then struggling for existence. Chatham, Fox, Wilkes, Barry, and a host of learned dead then stood up, and with manly and truthful eloquence, denounced the arbitrary acts of power directed against the friends of freedom in this country; and what would we have thought of their sincerity and honesty—what sentence would the moral sense of the world have pronounced upon them, if after they had thus denounced the administration and the war, they had gone to the footstool of power, and bowed down and thanked the agents that had been the tools of this tyranny and oppression? Had those illustrious friends of liberty thus acted at that day, I think, sir, their fame would have appeared in a very different light upon the pages of history. But the honorable Senator has said, that in the course which I have taken, there is neither patriotism nor morality. I beg leave to tell him it is a difference of opinion, merely. Morality is a pretty general term, and may cover a great many transactions about which there is difference of opinion; on that there can certainly be no issue as it is a mere question of opinion.

I ask if the doctrines promulgated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, are not those which should receive the unqualified condemnation of the American Senate, and the American people? What are they? They amount simply to this—that your army is a great machine—a tool, without heart, without head, without reflection—nothing but one great piece of animal mechanism—that the President, standing at the head of the administration, has but to give the word and it operates as he chooses; and that the thanks of the American people are due to that army, irrespective of any considerations connected with the character of the duty which is assigned to it to perform. Suppose your President sends the army to this Senate to enact over the scenes which occurred in England, when Cromwell dissolved the Parliament, telling them that the kingdom of Christ had come and he had no need of such an assembly, would it then be your duty to give thanks to the army, because it had obeyed the bidding of its master? Let me tell the honorable Senator that my reading of history has taught me that there is great danger to be apprehended to any republic from the overshadowing influence of this military fame, which this Senate is about to bolster up by this vote of thanks. Has he forgotten the history of that period of the Roman republic when they elected their emperor in the camp and then came to the Senate for its ratification? What are the American people about to do?—The camp has already elected your emperor—your next President. The decree has not yet been registered, but the thing is done. There, I think, lies the danger. We have, it is true, many aspirants for public favor, but the camp has already made the selection. The forms of the constitution may be preserved this time, but no man knows how much longer they will be retained. But whether that day may be more or less remote than many of us may imagine, when the camp comes here to ask the American Senate to ratify its deed, they never shall have my thanks for any agency in transactions which my judgment condemns. I do not say one word, because it is foreign to my purpose, in regard to the character of those officers. I do not question their skill, their bravery, their judgment. I have not a word to say against them—I have not a single hostile feeling to them in my heart. Regarding them, however, as the agents in transactions of which I wholly disapprove, I cannot thank them, because I cannot separate their instrumentality from the work in which they have been engaged.

Mr. FOOTE.—I was not in my place the other day, when the discussion of these resolutions was in progress, but if I had been, I should have regarded it as unpardonable had I not said something in reference to the sentiments which have formed the subject of the indignant comments of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I am not surprised at the course pursued by the Senator from New Hampshire, nor can any one who heard his language to-day, be surprised. The whole secret of his opposition to the vote of thanks has at last discovered itself. He is afraid that the army may elect a President. He is afraid that the military excitement of the time may be so potent as to thrust some individual into the Presidency who acquired glory in this war; and in consequence of which, that a certain distinguished Senator from New Hampshire nominated for that very office, and who has accepted the nomination, might be excluded. It would be quite improper, then, to blame the Senator from New Hampshire for the course which he has adopted on this occasion. The Senator is quite right. He is acting upon the principle of enlightened selfishness. The whole country will do justice to his motives, and he will descend to posterity as the most magnanimous statesman of modern times! I am happy indeed to hear the magnanimous declaration which escaped the lips of the Senator from Kentucky—I will not say escaped by accident, for it was evident that it was the language of his feelings and his understanding—the same language which is expressed by the intelligence and patriotism of the people in all parts of the Union, whatever faction may have said, in all the accursed forms in which faction has arrayed itself before the country. The Senator from Kentucky has taken the ground boldly that this is a national war—the war of the country—a war made by Congress and sanctioned in all the forms known to the constitution, and that therefore every patriot in the land is bound to sustain it, especially those who are employed in arms for the national defence. It is no Presidential war, then, as some have asserted. It is no war gotten up for unholy and corrupt purposes. It is no unconstitutional war, as some have argued, but it is a war declared by Congress, having every sanction that national legislation can give; a war which every patriot must sustain in its vigorous prosecution up to a glorious termination, and which none but traitors any where can oppose. I speak, of course, within due bounds. I allude not to the course of any Senator. I speak but the language of history when I say, that in no age since civilization began, has there been any name for any man who opposed his country either in thought, word, or deed, when in arms for her own defence, except traitor. That is the name by which the Senator would be known if he dared to act out the sentiments of his heart as manifested in the language which he has uttered to-day. The punishment of treason, in all countries, is death; and he who would act out these sentiments would incur that as his due reward. I doubt whether, in some parts of the country, the process of law would be waited for; and even in some districts of New England, I am inclined to think that a coat of tar and feathers, or, perhaps, a severer infliction of Lynch law would be administered. I am tired and sick of this. I have been sufficiently wearied with it at home, when reading newspaper accounts. I have been nauseated with it here. The whole country is indignant; there is but one voice on the subject, except the small voice that is uttered by an unprincipled faction in New England. I say an "unprincipled faction," because it is a party gotten up for the purpose of bloodshed, delusion and injustice—a party that cries "peace, peace," when the national honor is involved, and the country is armed in its defence—a party that cries out, "let us not shed the blood of the poor Mexicans—they have suffered enough injustice at our hands; let us make indemnity for the wrongs which we have perpetrated upon them!"

I should have been very much astonished if a different course had been adopted by the Senator from New Hampshire. I am not a very diligent reader of abolition newspapers, but looking over one or two lately, I perceived that a person named Garrison had been indulging in denunciations of the Senator from New Hampshire, because in a speech which he had made on this floor, he had expressed some regret at being compelled to assume the character of an Ishmaelite in this body; which by the by was not exactly the fact till now, for though it is true that his hands were against every man, yet nobody noticed him. However, for that declaration, and for the expression of the hope that nothing he had said would be regarded as offensive, the Senator from New Hampshire had been taken to task by Lloyd Garrison, who had denounced him as not being a Liberty man; that he was not worthy of the presidency; and had asserted that his name ought to be stricken from the Liberty ticket. Well, the Senator from New Hampshire having of course domestic business which called him to New England, had gone thither and indulged himself in several gusty harangues in order to retrieve his character, and revive his claims to the Presidency. His course there entirely conciliated the whole abolition party of New England, and with such motives to energetic action, I am not at all surprised that the Senator has returned filled with new zeal and increased animosity against this war; and that he should have made those rhetorical flourishes in which he has so freely displayed himself on this occasion. I should have been very much surprised if he had pursued any other course.

I will not detain the Senate long; but for the purpose of showing that the Senator is a politic, judicious man, and that though not at all ambitious, he may perhaps twenty years hence, making capital so rapidly as he does on this great question, stand a good chance for the Presidency, and using the most efficient means to improve his ultimate popularity. I will call attention to a few passages in a pamphlet which I have seen for the first time this morning. It was sent to me by a gentleman who informs me that it is in extensive circulation in New England, and is producing an extraordinary effect. It seems that it is circulated by another party, who are ambitious of obtaining the Liberty men as allies. I speak by the book when I say that a distinguished Senator from New England, (Mr. WEBSTER,) not now in his seat, did in a place not far from Faneuil Hall some months ago, openly recognize the abolitionists as political brethren, and beseeched them most affectionately to unite with the whig party. I consider, then, that the whig party of New England and the faction controlled by the Senator from New Hampshire, stand on the same platform. Probably no reply will be attempted to what I say. It may be that I will not be deemed worthy of notice by the distinguished Senator over the way, but that will not prevent me from noticing him—courteously and patriotically, I trust—and in such manner as I may think that notice at my hands is demanded. Humble as my abilities may be, I recognize no superior here, so far as the State, which I have in part the honor to represent, is concerned. I am not at all surprised that New England should be visited with this pamphlet at this time, because the distinguished Senator from New England, first in Richmond, in commencing his famous southern tour, undertook to call this war in question, and afterwards when he got back to New England held the same language, and asserted that it had been the settled judgment of all nations that the injustice of the war most materially tarnished the lustre of our arms. Has that been explained? Can it be explained or vindicated? It means what the Senator from New Hampshire has more boldly said, using plainer and more explicit language, but language not more unpatriotic than that to which I have just referred—language which will not be less fiercely condemned by posterity than that uttered on the occasion to which I have alluded, by one of the most celebrated men of the whig party, whose influence has spread itself abroad through all lands, and has a most controlling effect in Mexico at the present time, against his own country. The same sentiment has been again and again expressed by the organ of the whigs in this city—the National Intelligencer. Every whig paper in the country, with a few exceptions, has resolved it: and we all recollect the expression in a certain speech delivered here—to which I allude in no spirit of unkindness—that if the speaker had been a Mexican as he was an American he would have welcomed our armies with bloody hands and hospitable graves. Act that speech was published with their editorial sanction in almost every whig paper in the country. When on my way hither last winter, I saw in Louisville a whig paper, the organ of the party in that city, the Louisville Journal, which eulogized and commended the speech in the warmest and most exalted terms of encomium. Whilst then there are many men in that party—a glorious band, of whom I am glad to recognize the distinguished Senator from Kentucky as the leader, who do respond to the sentiments which he has expressed this morning—patriots in heart and in deed, recognizing the noble sentiment of Roman heroic times, that it is a sweet and glorious thing to die for one's country; whilst a great number of the members of the whig party entertain such sentiments, there are many others who openly, or in their hearts, cherish sentiments similar to those I have described, which they would dare to act out, if the majority of the people would sanction them. Here, then, is the pamphlet written by a member of the party of which the Senator from New Hampshire is the exponent here. It is said that

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

By what name shall I designate the party of which the gentleman from New Hampshire is the representative? Is it the abolition or liberty party? However this may be, it is on the shoulders of that party that he expects to be foisted into the White House. Oh! may Heaven preserve my country from such a calamity as that! I say it with no intention to insult the Senator, but because he holds principles which, if carried out, would make this republic more infamous in the pages of history than any nation that has ever existed. The pamphlet is entitled "Dick Crowningshield, the Assassin, and Zachary Taylor, the Soldier: the difference between them—by Henry C. Wright." It is now circulating in New England under whig sanction, and is written by a member of the liberty party.

Mr. HALE.—Does the gentleman mean to say that the author of that pamphlet is a member of the liberty party?

Mr. FOOTE.—So I understand.

Mr. HALE.—That individual's career in England and this country is well known. He denies the right of all human government whatever, and there is no party which he denounces with more severity and opprobium than the liberty party. The honorable Senator from Mississippi is, therefore, mistaken in supposing that he is a member of that party. It is not so. The honorable Senator asks to what party I belong, and the name of that party. I can tell him in a moment the origin of the movement which has made my name somewhat notorious in New Hampshire in regard to the position which I took about four years since. I was then a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Hampshire. At that time the project of annexation was mooted in the House, and the Richmond Enquirer, then edited by the present editor of the Union, declared that any one expecting any thing from the administration, must not go against that measure. I did not expect any thing from the administration, but I opposed the measure, and in a letter to my constituents I announced my intention to vote against it, assigning the reasons which influenced me in the determination. Thereupon the progressive democracy of New Hampshire came together and denounced me, and an issue was at once made in that State upon the question. That is the origin of the movement, and the Senator is at liberty to give it any name which will best suit his classification. But he is entirely mistaken as regards Mr. Wright, who is no more a member of the liberty party than that Senator is, and probably looks on it with as much loathing as he does.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am very glad to hear that he does. However, the pamphlet has been circulated by the Whigs of New England. The author may then be a Whig.

Mr. HALE.—As I stand alone I have only to take care of myself. The Whigs can take care of themselves.

Mr. FOOTE.—Well, I do not understand the author to be strictly in correspondence with the Senator from New Hampshire, or that they are inhabitants of the same town or county. Indeed, people change their politics so readily now-a-days, that it would be a little unsafe, perhaps, for the Senator to undertake to say what are the present political principles of Mr. Wright, with whom he is ashamed to bear any connection.

Mr. HALE.—No, I am not.

Mr. FOOTE.—Well, then he is the particular friend of the Senator from New Hampshire, and of one thing, I am certain, that in my State such a pamphlet could not be allowed to circulate amongst the whigs for a day. Such language as I am about to read could not be uttered in the State in which I have the honor to reside without hazard of life; nor could it, in my opinion, any where, where a high state of patriotism exists. Well, I will read a few delicious extracts from this pamphlet, and I hope that if it be not a whig document, gentlemen will stop its circulation. The gentleman denies that it is a Liberty document. Who has had it circulated I am not prepared to say, but I think that it is perhaps intended to promote the Senator's claims and those of whig Presidential aspirants generally, always excepting General Taylor.

DICK CROWNINGSHIELD—HIS EMPLOYER—HIS BUSINESS.

Joseph White lived in Salem. He was old and rich. Jacob Knapp lived in the same town. The wretch Knapp was deeply and expectedly interested in the death of Joseph White was considered by them as opposed to their interests. They wanted to destroy it. They called on Dick Crowningshield, a young man living in Salem, who had made himself an infamous character as Wm. Penn Mackay, Avalanche, and other infamous, in substance:—

"Will you enlist against enemy?"

Dick—"What to do?"

Knapp—"We wish to kill Joseph White."

Dick—"Shall hate, he owe you any money?"

Knapp—"No, but I think he would get out of the possession of property which we expect to inherit. We have no resources but to kill him."

Dick—"Shall get in trouble of office getting [illegible] out?"

Knapp—"We know better. Lately [illegible] and we wish to get rid of him?"

Dick—"But would it be right to kill him?"

Knapp—"Can't commit no trouble against him. We will be responsible for the right or wrong of the case. If you enlist, then it you have nothing to do with that question."

Dick—"But suppose I think it murder."

Knapp—"That your conscience [illegible]. If you enlist in our service, we wish you to [illegible] and never [illegible] you [illegible] murder."

Dick—"Where is [illegible]?"

Knapp—"Somewhere [illegible]. We do not wish to kill him for his good, but solely for our own."

Dick—"So, then, I am to enter into the service of you into your service, to kill a man [illegible] you [illegible] your family?"

Knapp—"That's [illegible]. Will you enter?"

Dick—"What shall I get for doing the deed?"

Knapp—"One thousand dollars."

Dick—"Do you wish me to enlist [illegible]?"

Knapp—"Well, we [illegible] you [illegible] and we will discharge you from our service as soon as the deed is done."

Dick—"Well, I am to enter into your service to kill a man to kill one, and have [illegible] for doing the deed. But I am to enter into your service to kill thousands at their bidding and for their benefit. So, I am at your service, and will execute your pleasure upon Joseph White."

They then handed their money to Dick, with a nod and bludgeon. At midnight, he entered the back window with a dark lantern, crept up the front stairs, and entered the sleeping chamber of Joseph White. He was asleep. Dick struck him on his head with a club; then turned down the clothes and stabbed him thirteen times in the region of his heart; then covered him up, left the house, hid the bludgeon under the door-steps of a church, and melled the dagger. Dick and the Knapps were taken up and imprisoned. While awaiting their trial Dick hung himself. The Knapps were tried, condemned and hung.

What would you call Dick Crowningshield? A HIRED ASSASSIN, is the answer, and all will insist that this is the only phrase in the English language that can truly designate his fearful and position. What would you call the Knapps? The main guilt and prime movers in the deed. THE EMPLOYERS OF A HIRED ASSASSIN. The relation between Crowningshield and the Knapps was that of a hired Assassin to his employers. The community would not endure the presence of the employers or the employed among them, and they put them all to death.

ZACHARY TAYLOR—HIS EMPLOYERS—HIS BUSINESS.

There is a town in Mexico called Monterey. It contains say 20,000 inhabitants, more or less. They never injured the people of the United States, even in thought. Yet they even have supposed that the possession and use of gold and of sugar-cane. They wish to destroy the town of Monterey. So, those who compose the United States, through their agents, the recruiting officers, go forth to enlist men into their service. They meet Zachary Taylor, and ask him, in substance:—

"Will you enlist into our service?"

Zachary—"What do you want me to do?"

People.—"We wish you to kill the people of Monterey."

Zachary—"What have they done?"

People.—"O, nothing, only their existence is opposed to our interests."

Zach—"They are, then, innocent of all evil intentions and actions towards you?"

People—"Yes, they never injured us, and never intended to injure us."

Zach.—"Why then do you ask me to kill them?"

People.—"Simply and solely because they are in our way, and there is no other method to get rid of them."

Zach.—"Would it be right to kill them?"

People.—"That is our affair, not yours. We wish you to enlist to do our bidding, and kill whom we wish, RIGHT OR WRONG."

Zach.—"But suppose I knew them to be innocent, can I kill them?"

People—"Yes, if we bid you."

Zach—"But suppose I believe that to kill them would be MURDER, and I do it?"

People.—"Then if we bid you to kill them. We wish to enlist none into our service, as soldiers, who are not willing to act in the great God that they will kill any and all whom we bid them kill even though they believe it would be murder."

Zach.—"How many do you wish me to kill?"

People.—"No particular number, or number; but we wish to enlist you to butcher men by the day, till we say cease doing so."

Zach.—"So, then, now I understand you. You wish me to enlist into your service, to kill human beings, without regard to their character, innocence, or your feelings, and for your benefit. You want me to murder, as I understand, that I will kill men, women and children at your discretion, even though I know they are innocent, and though I believe that to kill them would be murder?"

People.—"Yes, such is our wish."

Zach.—"But suppose I should enlist, and then should not be willing to kill all whom you command me to kill; and suppose I should wish to leave your service?"

People.—"Once enlisted, you must do our bidding or be killed yourself; and if you attempt to leave our service without our consent, we shall shoot or hang you."

Zach.—"How much money will you give me?"

People.—"Two hundred dollars per month."

Zach.—"Well; the murders and butchers say war is a right and Christian practice. If so, then it is right to enlist [illegible] and when enlisted to engage in any [illegible] right or wrong. So I am your man. Henceforth I am a butcher. I am ready to kill men, though I know them to be innocent, and though I believe I would be murdering."

People.—"You are the man for us. Report [illegible] to your name henceforth. We have work on hand at this moment."

Zach.—"Name it and it is done."

People.—"There is a town in Mexico called Monterey. Go, destroy inhabitants and destroy it."

Zach.—"Give me the means, and I will do it—done."

So the men assembled, and Zachary Taylor, at their head. Now behold Zachary before the devoted town. He says:—"Thus I have succeeded by labor to render the attack. See the cannon erected by Zachary the soldier. Hear the whizzing messengers of twenty millions. Hear the bombshells that burst, the torrents of grape have had no been the execution of mankind!

I will not detain Senators by reading any more extracts. I did not know that the time for taking up the special order had passed, or I should not have trespassed so long on the time of the Senate.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Go on.

Mr. FOOTE.—I will then, if the Senate will bear with me, read a few additional paragraphs.

Look at that mangy ! See that mother watching her son, little one, brought at play in one corner. Zachary discharges a gun loaded with, perhaps, four at them, and in a moment their limbs and bodies are mostly fragments, and the mother sees their mangled remains. Immediately upon infant the change is discovered, the mother sees it is sucking, and singing as infancy. Zachary loads a cannon ball at that mother and infant, and buries them in space.

Look into their dwelling now. There are a father and mother and three children at the dinner table. A ball thrown by Zachary enters, in the father and children are torn and killed a mong the surviving mother. There is such a scene ! In the name of my God how could such a scene be ! Zachary throws a bomb-shell among them. Previously, and the bare limbs and dead bodies of five of them, before dead, and the mother and their teacher and companion, are covered with her blood ! There is a daughter and me by her broken heart ! Other to comfort and sustain him. Zachary looks on and has built at her and only her both in two, and those declared dead and cannot include her father.

"For the love of Heaven spare that house !" cries a young miss to Zachary, as he is running a deadly missile at a particular dwelling. "I AM. SORRY, MADAM that such scenes as shown to always ; but do not cry to it one."

Zachary :—What is your reason ?

Young miss :—My beautiful bird's there. She whom I love as my own soul."

Zachary :—All fond and domestic affections must be forgotten here."

Young miss :—But no spare that one. One of your own countrymen begs you to spare it."

Zachary :—It is the bidding and for the interest of our employers that that house and all in it should be destroyed. We must do as our employers, RIGHT OR WRONG."

Young man :—O, spare ! To what charge can the wicked have exposed ? Think of the agony I must feel to find her a mangled corpse !"

Zachary :—Young man, you seem to care not, my about the other, how and are willing to see them blown to atoms ! Yet every ball in hand. Still we thank best to possess some wife or husband, some parent or child, some interest to order, about whom we are objected to a time to other, and that duty cause, I must to again begin crying to always the death of your beautiful would be you. She not like. Stop is the bidding and pleasure of my employers.

A bomb-shell is named at the house, and in an instant it a heap of ruins. The thief comes into the garden where the parents and their children are assembled, and explodes. A ragged piece of iron strikes the young woman and tears away her head and shoulders.

Says another eye-witness of the doings of Zachary :—It was an awful sight to look upon the dead—some shot with cannon balls and some with small shot—one with their heads shot off—some with their legs off—some with their bowels scattered on the ground."

Says another eye-witness of another scene :—Bodies of Mexicans were lying all about in every direction—some with their heads shattered to pieces, their legs, arms, without legs, arms and—others with their entrails torn out—people about on my hands and knees, and at every few paces I would come across a dead body ; and at one place I discovered the body of a beautiful Mexican girl, STARKED by her side."

The above is obtained in a truthful recitation of the operations of our soldiers, men in Monterey, and other towns in Mexico, at the bidding and for the benefit of a religious, republican employers.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If the Senator will permit me, I would beg leave to submit to him whether it is best to detain the Senate by reading more of that pamphlet. Enough has been given to enable us to judge of its character. I will hear the Senator with a great deal of pleasure, but I think he ought not to occupy the time of the Senate by reading pamphlets.

Mr. FOOTE.—I know that this thing is disgusting, but having the sanction of the whigs of New England, I thought that it might be agreeable more or less to the appetites of some gentlemen here. I feel that perhaps I owe some apology for occupying the attention of the Senate so long. I do not charge the whig party with this pamphlet, but I have quoted it in order to vindicate what has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky in opposition to the dangerous sentiments of the Senator from New Hampshire, presenting as it does a striking illustration of the consequences to which such sentiments naturally lead.

Mr. CRITTENDEN again rose.

Mr. CASS.—Is the Senator going to make any motion ? The Senator from Texas has the floor on the special order.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I will not detain the Senate.

Mr. RUSK.—So far as I am concerned, I desire to say, that I have great pleasure in asking the Senator from Kentucky to proceed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not intend to protract this debate, but I desire to acquit myself of the personality of which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire seems to have considered me to be guilty. I did not mean to say, sir, that the gentleman was without patriotism, or without morality. No, sir, not at all. I meant only to contest the proposition which he laid down, and on which his objections to this vote of thanks rested, and on which they could alone stand. It was in reference to that proposition, and not the sincerity of the honorable gentleman that my remarks were made; and it was very far from my intention, indeed, to make any such charge as that he was wanting in morality or patriotism. The sentiments which the honorable gentleman entertained are of such a peculiar character, that one can hardly fail into the error of supposing that they are entertained from selfish motives. The gentleman must be sincere, and I do not doubt that he is sincere; and I assure him, that no personality was intended by me.

I am a little apprehensive that the Senator from Mississippi may have understood me as going a little farther than I designed to be understood as going, in relation to this war. I think I told you at the commencement of my remarks, that I was not one of those who approved of this war—not at all. But I said that the war by the act of Congress had become a national war. It was war according to law; and I had supposed that the great principle of republican government consists in the combination of the strength and power of the whole community in executing the laws passed by the majority of that community, that I am as much bound to respect the law passed in reference to this war, as I am in respect to any law that imposed duties or taxes, or regulated the conduct of citizens of the United States. With respect to any of those laws, the liberty of discussion, under the constitution, and according to every principle of republican government, is free and unlimited. It is upon that condition that every citizen of the republic agrees to conform himself to and be governed by the majority, however repugnant to his own opinion it may be the decisions of the majority. This freedom of discussion is the ground on which each and every individual may infer on entering into the social compact, that he may safely and cheerfully agree to obey whatever law the majority passes whilst discussion is left free; or in the words of Mr. Jefferson that error may be tolerated whilst reason is left free to combat it. That is the principle of republican government. I do not hold that I oppose the war because I discuss, and examine, and reason, in order to convince you that the law ought to be repealed, or changed, or modified, so as to put an end to this war. It is with respect to that law as it is in the case of every other law. Every constitutional law claims the obedience of every man, no matter whether it be according to his wishes or not. It claims his obedience. But it leaves him free to discuss it. It leaves him free to endeavor, in the exercise of all his constitutional rights, to have the law repealed, no matter whether it relates to peace or war; and the right is equally perfect in regard to the one as the other. Circumstances may modify—the exigencies of the country may control—the exercise of this right, but his constitutional right as a man and a citizen, is to discuss the law fully. He ought to do so because he is bound to obey implicitly. That is my doctrine. I do not hold that because a man disapproves of this war and in that sense opposes it—that he is with one hand endeavoring to support the law as a national law, whilst with the other he exercises his right to put an end to that state of things, he makes an opposition to the war which in any true sense of it can be regarded as unpatriotic. Some gentlemen run into the idea—and it seems to me that my friend from Mississippi inclines to the belief—that any degree of disapprobation of the war, every species of opposition to it, betokens a want of patriotism, or of courage, or of something that belongs to honorable and patriotic men.

Mr. FOOTE:—I thought that I used the most explicit language. I have uniformly used the same language—and it is now on record, upholding freedom of debate and discussion. But I have said and repeat it now that whenever speeches are made anywhere in the United States evidently intended to circulate in Mexico—calculated to encourage the enemy of the country—those speeches are stamped with treachery to the country. I am not to be understood, however, as in the slightest degree trenching on the freedom of debate. The Senator from New Hampshire is bound to express his sentiments if he entertains them. I only deplore his condition, being impelled by the peculiar character of his intellect to adopt such sentiments. I am not willing to shackle even him, certainly not any other person. But I see frequently newspaper articles which are intended to circulate in Mexico, giving "aid and comfort" to the enemy ; and speeches have been made which we know to have had the same effect. All know this. It is a part of the history of the country, and I challenge denial of the statement that it is so. In my opinion, for making such speeches the punishment of hanging, if the law allowed it, should be inflicted. I hope I am understood now. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will do me justice. I know it is one thing simply to declare that the war is unjust and to seek the repeal of the law, and another to become a traitor to the country in a moral point of view, by such overt acts in favor of the enemy as those to which I have alluded—Let it also be understood that I charge nothing of the kind upon the Senator.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I regret that this debate has taken this excursory direction, passing entirely beyond the point to which I supposed it would be limited in the first instance, otherwise I should not have felt called upon to obtrude any remarks of mine upon the attention of the Senate. I believe that the honorable Senator is of too liberal a spirit himself lightly to impute to others any want of patriotism, much less to a great party like that of the whigs. He disclaims any such imputation with respect to them, if I understood him. What, sir, do the whig party want patriotism, and shall the whig party in retaliation, charge the democratic party with a want of patriotism ! Then, who, in the name of all that is virtuous, has patriotism in this wide republic ?

The gentleman imposes another limitation upon this right of discussion in relation to the war, which it seems to me cannot be maintained. I may speak the more freely on this subject, inasmuch as that though my opinions on the war have not been withheld, it has not been my lot to participate so largely in the discussion as many others have, and I doubt whether in all the archives of Mexico, from the fortress of San Juan d'Ulloa, to the city of Mexico, one sentence, line, or word of any poor remarks that ever I made here can be found. And I am equally well assured that no remarks of my whig associates on democratic associates have been made for any such purpose of encouragement to Mexico or Mexicans. These remarks have been made in the exercise of their constitutional rights here, for the benefit of our own country, by the discussion of a matter involving the interests of our country.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am very sorry to interrupt the Senator. But I had no reference to speeches made here. I alluded to speeches made in various parts of the United States—deliberately made to crowds assembled, for the purpose of being inflammated, and which the speaker knew would operate in Mexico, therefore meeting all the denunciations which I heaped upon them, and I only regret that my powers of sarcasm, are not adequate to the work of stigmatizing them as they deserve.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I accept the explanation of the gentleman. I thought he had reference to speeches here and elsewhere. It seems that he had not reference to speeches here. Now, that might be his limitation of the doctrine, but since I am upon the subject, allow me to say, that I know well, that that is not the limitation put by presses now advocating the doctrine. We are told that this war with Mexico has been inflamed—that the obstinacy of the Mexican people has been increased by their knowledge of what is said and done by whigs, and whig newspapers. That is boldly affirmed every day. The liberty of speech is censured. We are told by these same presses, that instead of exercising the rights of honorable gentlemen, and those which appertain to the more dignified and important character of representatives, we ought to be silent in regard to a matter, in which the interests of the country are concerned, and follow in mute submission, whatever is done by the Executive of the government.

Mr FOOTE.—If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him again for a moment, I would state that a distinguished member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kentucky has received an announcement from General Marshall, stating the fact that we might have had a treaty of peace, but for the speech of a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, with certain resolutions, which induced the leading men of Mexico to wheel about, and raised a universal expectation of a pronunciamento by which Mr. Polk would be turned out of the White House, and a certain distinguished gentleman from Kentucky be brought in; from whom such a peace could be obtained as would accord with their notions of justice and humanity. I state that as a matter of fact. We all know that this intelligence circulates in Mexico. No man can deny it. I did not charge any bad intentions at all to the distinguished gentleman in Kentucky, who made the speech, but the effect has been produced by it, which was predicted at the time, by myself and thousands of others.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not doubt that such a letter has been written, and that such is the opinion entertained by the writer. The gentleman is well known, and with him I have always sustained the most friendly relations, but, although I do not know what effect his military career may have had, his politics were of the severest and most heated character when he went to Mexico. I presume he retains those opinions, and is therefore very ready, from his political bias, to place upon any act of the honorable gentleman alluded to—one of the most distinguished fellow citizens, Mr. Clay—we need not conceal his name—an unfavorable construction. It is quite likely that General Marshall may have entertained the opinion that we should have had a peace before now, had it not been for Mr. Clay's speech; but I put it in all candor to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, to say whether a speech delivered by Mr. Clay in November last, in Kentucky, has found such access to the mind of Mexico as to present——

Mr. FOOTE.—I do believe that his magnetic influence may have been as great as that. The Mexicans are a peculiar people—semi-barbarous—accustomed to pronunciamentos, and, of course, judge our country by their own. I rather think, from the evidence before me, that they expect a pronunciamento here, which I think they will expect a long time before it arrives.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am glad that my honorable friend from Mississippi cannot say that he believes that it is so. He is very ingenious in giving reasons why it might possibly have been so, but he is not quite satisfied that it is so; and how can he—how can any man believe that a few scraps of newspapers, and a handbill or two, placed in the great scales of peace and war in Mexico, really turned the balance and inclined them in the favor of war? Why what do we know of Mexico? We know that the leading men want peace. They cannot make peace, and why? Because the masses of the people have become exasperated against us, and those holding the reins of government dare not, for fear of popular vengeance, make peace. The great masses of the Mexican people cannot read—they know nothing about our speeches and nothing about our parties, and yet they are the people that are for war. They are the exasperated people that insist, madly insist, on continuing this contest. That is the account which I receive. That is the general tone of all the accounts. It is natural and reasonable. But the idea is absurd that the people of Mexico, with patriotic feelings as strongly felt as in our own case, should be like a weather-cock moved by an article in a newspaper—a speech in Massachusetts or Kentucky—or any process of logical reasoning. Yet it is put forward to the public as having an effect of that kind, and that is insisted upon for the purpose of controlling and regulating our conduct and opinions here. Well, I trust that I am incapable in any circumstances of making a speech that can be justly or truly or in any particular sense considered as hostile to my country. I trust that having the liberty of free and full discussion, whenever and wherever I think that my duty requires its exercise or it is my pleasure to use it, that I shall freely exercise it. That is the reason, sir, why I boast that I am an American citizen—why we all boast that we are American citizens. But the moment we have a war, we are to be silent; and the more questionable may be the character of that war, the more stringent is to be the denial of the right of freedom of speech! Why, sir, that is the very time when we ought to speak out. If Mexico is so sensitive to the principles and opinions upon which we act, and by which we are governed in this country, she ought to know this, that however we may question, in our legislative capacity, the justice and propriety of this war, so long as it continues—so long as it is a national war, made so by our laws, every body—those who think it just and those who think it unjust, unite their strength to carry it on; that the strength of the whole is to execute the will of the majority. That is the fundamental principle of our government, and that Mexico ought to know. What comfort," then, can Mexico derive from our questioning the propriety of the war? If she knew how to estimate it aright, she will see the most formidable of all enemies in that very community which, while its members discuss the propriety of anything, they fully unite in their combined strength in executing whatever the will of the majority may determine. And that is what Mexico must know and learn, if she reads to any advantage what we say and publish. But the effort of certain portions of the press has been to enforce silence upon this subject, to control us by a sort of new-made editorial sedition-law! A few scraps of newspapers have been found in Mexico, and oh! forsooth, what swelling tirades of treason—treachery—combinations of our own countrymen against our own country and in favor of Mexico! Can any thing be more palpable, sir, than the outrageous violation of liberty of discussion and freedom of the press which is thus displayed?

I regret that I have trespassed so long on the time of the Senate. I believe that I owe you an apology. I rose simply to make a few remarks on this resolution, from which we have so far departed, that it has almost been forgotten. I hope the question will be taken on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The Senate will not expect that I intend to enter into this discussion. Indeed, I regret that the discussion has been thought necessary by any one, and I hope, with the Senator from Kentucky, that we will return immediately to the resolution from which we never should have wandered. It should be allowed to remain on the ground assumed, a simple vote of thanks, in which the justness of the war—its policy—the wisdom of the legislature on the subject cannot, with any propriety, be at all involved. Officers have no other right than to refuse to obey an unconstitutional order. The power to declare war was vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, and when they declared the war it cannot be unconstitutional. The officer obeys the order he receives as an executive officer, and upon the vote of thanks, involving only the consideration whether he has gracefully discharged his duty, we might expect the union, of which the Senator from Kentucky has spoken—the union of the whole country on a question which has but two sides—the side of our country and the side of the foreigners, with whom we are at war. Party lines cannot enter into the consideration of such a question, whilst patriotism exists. There may be a faction—there will be a faction—in all times there has been a faction, that would raise its croaking voice, when the people, with one accord, send up their poeans of thanks or prayers for success. Yes, sir, the American people rejoicing over their independence, just acquired—exulting in the possession of civil liberty at the close of our revolution, returned their thanks to Almighty God, who had held them in the hollow of his hand, and yet, in the emphatic and classic language of Patrick Henry, one croaker was found, whose discordant voice attempted to disturb the harmony. The good sense of that day, turned in loathing and disgust away. Why not do so now? Why shall we pause to enter into this long discussion about fore-gone conclusions before the question was raised? Must President-making, too, be involved in a resolution of thanks to gallant officers? If so, and if the great result which has been deprecated is to come, and the army is to make your President, I would rather receive him from them than from the hands of free negroes and their confederates. But here stands a soldier whose life has been wholly devoted to his country—whose services accumulating one by one, have become a pyramid, as beautiful for its simplicity as it is sublime for its grandeur—one which can stand like the commemorative monument of Bunker Hill, a plain and noble obelisk, with its head amid the clouds, and despising the assaults of the creeping things that crawl around its base!

I trust that the feelings of gallant men will not be assailed when the country comes to thank them for services done to the whole country. I trust, sir, that the Senate will no longer engage in a discussion, a cross-fire of which leaves the question at issue, and that leaving whatever of croaking there may be to disturb the harmony of the people's thanks, we will test the question by a vote of the Senate, allowing those who refuse to yield their thanks to the gallant soldier to go before the country in the issue.

No further amendment being made, the resolutions were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the resolutions read a third time.

The said resolutions were read a third third time, as amended.

On the question "Shall these resolutions pass?" Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

NAY – Mr. Hale—1

So it was

Resolved, That the resolutions pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. BELL asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to have his vote recorded in the affirmative on the passage of the resolution of thanks to General Scott. Having voted in favor of the resolutions of thanks to General Taylor, he did not wish to have the appearance of voting for one and not the other. He was not in the Senate when the vote was taken upon the resolution in relation to General Scott, or he should have voted for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT read the rule on the subject, showing that under no circumstances could a vote be recorded after the result had been declared.

Several Senators suggested that the object could be accomplished by a reconsideration of the vote upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GREENE hoped that some Senator who was present when the vote was taken, would move a reconsideration. He was anxious to record his vote, also, in favor it.

Mr. RUSK moved that the vote be reconsidered, which was agreed to; and the question recurring "Shall this resolution pass?"—

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered, and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Cameron, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, (of Miss.) Davis, (of Mass.) Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Felch, Foote, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, (of Md.) Johnson, of La. Johnson, of Ga. Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Sevier, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee,—36

NAY.—Mr. Hale—1.

So it was

Resolved, That the resolution pass

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives has signed the enrolled bill entitled [illegible] and for other purposes," I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill received from the House of Representatives, above named, and it was delivered to the committee to be presented to the President of the United States.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of citizens of Jefferson county, Iowa, remonstrating against a change in the mail route from Burlington to Fairfield, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MILES presented a memorial of Insurance Companies and merchants of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of March 2d, 1837, concerning Pilots; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the fund, arising from the sale of the lands ceded by the treaty of January 14, 1837, with the Saginaw bands of Chippewa Indians, which are to be disposed of for their benefit; what measures are required to effect a sale of said lands [illegible] and what further provision, if any, ought to be made for the said bands; and how, if more advantageously to the United States and the Indians, it can be made to the Indians for them; and whether, in justice and equity, provision should not now be made for the appropriation of the funds, or a part of said funds, to the payment of such claims as may be presented to the government, for the payment of the class of obligations provided for in said treaty and embraced in schedule B, which were not provided for out of the amount retained by the United States for other obligations and objects provided for in the same treaty.

PROTECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether [illegible] and, if not, what amendment is necessary to the [illegible] and [illegible] of tea and coffee.

PATRICK WALKER.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick Walker, submitted a report accompanied by a bill granting a pension to Patrick Walker.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

MR. DICKINSON'S RESOLUTIONS.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the prior orders were suspended, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. DICKINSON, relative to the proper policy to be pursued by the United States in respect to the acquisition of new territory, and the substitute therefor submitted by Mr. YULEE.

[Mr. YULEE resumed and concluded his argument in support of his amendment, which has been given entire in Tuesday's proceedings.]

Mr. FOOTE.—I move that the resolution be laid upon the table, and with the consent of the Senate I will occupy a single moment. I have scrutinized this matter as well as the honorable Senator from Florida. I have looked a little at the indications of public sentiment in the South, and I undertake to assert that not one word that has come down the lips of the Senator on this subject is sanctioned by enlightened public opinion in the South. I undertake to say, also, that there is not one of his authorities which will not be ascertained hereafter to be a misquotation or worse. I will not say that the gentleman from Florida has "just enough of learning to misquote," but it will turn out that either his authorities are misquoted, or that he has entirely the principle of the Walnut proviso, and this the gentleman, with all his sagacity, has not been able to perceive. I applaud the gentleman's liberality, his magnanimity in going so far as he does to teach the abolitionists and defenders of southern institutions. The manner of the gentleman is as objectionable as the matter of his remarks. Upon the latter I shall have something to say hereafter. His manner has been decidedly oracular, and, as I conceive, insulting and illiberal towards the best friends we have in the North.

Mr. YULEE.—I hope I shall be allowed to make a single remark, which will not occupy two minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I want two minutes myself.

Mr. SEVIER.—I rise to a question of order.

Mr. FOOTE.—I will take my seat, for that purpose alone.

Mr. SEVIER.—I ask the attention of the Presiding Officer to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The honorable Senator from Mississippi, has not yielded the floor.

Mr. YULEE.—I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am upon my feet, sir.

Mr. SEVIER.—I rise to a question of order; that I have a right at any time to do, whether a Senator be on the floor or not. My point of order is this, at one o'clock, the special order of the day is the only business that is strictly in order.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.—The special order is not in order at one o'clock, if a Senator has possession of the floor.

Mr. FOOTE.—I have made a motion that the resolution be laid upon the table, to be taken up hereafter.

Mr. YULEE.—I will agree to that motion, but must first ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment.

Mr. HALE.—I rise to a question of order.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from Florida is on the floor.

Mr. YULEE yielded.

Mr. HALE.—My point of order is that the Senator from Mississippi moved to lay the resolution on the table, and that motion is not debateable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER decided that the motion was not debateable.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution on the table, and the motion was agreed to.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. RUSK.—Mr. President: When this bill was introduced, I had no disposition to trouble the Senate with any remarks; but the discussion has taken a much wider range than I anticipated, having gone into the causes and consequences of the existing war with Mexico. It has been assumed, on one side, that the war was not begun by Mexico, but that it was commenced by the unauthorized and unconstitutional act of the President of the United States. With a view to maintain this position, a new boundary line has been assigned to Texas, the State which I have the honor in part to represent, which is said not to extend to the Rio Grande, its true boundary, as I am prepared to prove, but only to the river Nueces. The assumption, sir, of this position, renders it due to myself, due to the State of Texas, and due to the widows and orphans of some of the brave men who fell in our struggle with Mexico for our independence, that I should address the Senate, particularly on this branch of the subject. Now, sir, I venture to assert that, when all the facts shall have been made known to the country, no clearer question ever existed, than that the Rio Grande is the true boundary of Texas.

Before, however, I commence the discussion of the question of boundary, it may not, perhaps, be improper for me to allude, briefly, to the causes which led to the Texan revolution, and the subsequent struggle between that country and Mexico. I am aware, sir, that the people of Texas have been calumniated, as a band of assassins, land-robbers, and a set of God-forsaken, reckless desperadoes, and it seemed, the other day, to afford the honorable Senator from Vermont no small degree of pleasure to rake up old newspaper articles, published ten or twelve years ago, rivalling, if they do not surpass, the plentiful abuse heaped upon us by the Mexicans themselves during our contest.

Mr. UPHAM.—I certainly did not read those papers for the purpose of reflecting upon the character of the Texans. It was for the purpose of showing the views of the democracy of the North at the time when annexation was first announced to the country.

Mr. RUSK.—I did not understand the Senator as endorsing the statements, but still, they prove the fact that such abuse had been lavished upon Texas, and is perhaps at present circulated. Now, sir, it is not necessary that I should rise in my place, for the purpose of defending the character of the people of Texas from newspaper slanders. Their conduct, sir, is a sufficient vindication of them against such assaults, and the more their true character is known, the more it will be seen that they are entitled to respect and confidence. I will further venture to assert that, when the whole of the circumstances connected with her revolution and separation from Mexico shall become known, it will be admitted by every disinterested individual, that no people on the face of the earth ever had a more just cause of revolution than had the people of Texas. Whatever may have been said in regard to our being land-robbers, there were, at the commencement of our struggle for independence, and are still, many, very many, in Texas, who dare believe that we were indebted for our final success to the beneficieut Providence of a just and righteous God. And, Mr. President, I think it may be safely said, that we manifested no small degree of confidence in the justice of our cause, when, with a population of less than thirty thousand, we dared to appeal to arms, in a contest with a nation of eight millions. But, sir, I proceed.

I might here go back and arrey names that would command respect, and among them the names of such men as Mr. Monroe, Mr. Madison, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Clay, to establish the fact that the territory of Texas extended originally to the Rio Grande. But it is unnecessary for my present purpose to do so. The boundary of Texas, as now claimed, is the boundary established by revolution, and that boundary is the Rio Grande.

Mexico, after having adopted constitutions, State and federal, conforming very nearly to those of the United States, passed liberal laws, and held out strong inducements to the people of every clime, to encourage the settlement of Texas. This was done not so much for the benefit of those who might take up their abode within that district of country, as for the purpose of redeeming that valuable portion of her territory from the dominion of the savage, which Mexico had struggled to accomplish, but without success, for centuries past.

Before Austin went into Texas with his colonists, hostile Indians roamed in bands throughout the country unrestrained. They were constantly committing depradetions, robbing the people of their property, and carrying into abject bondage the women and children of the frontier settlements. For the purpose, then, of driving out this ruthless foe, were inducements held out to the colonists to settle there. Until the year 1834, with but few interruptions, there existed a state of peace and quietness. In that year Santa Anna, at the head of a military power, overthrew the constitution of 1824, abolished the State governments, and established one of the most tyrannical and absolute governments that ever existed. The government thus established by Santa Anna is misunderstood here—for an absolute government is one where there was the name of a Congress, but it was the name alone. The President was, in reality, the Supreme Dictator. He called a Congress of Notables around him, but that Congress was entirely subservient to his will. Another feature in the central constitution was, that the President had the power to appoint, at his pleasure, an executive council from the different portions of the community, the industrial classes, the priesthood, the military, the commercial, and others. They were, however, from the very nature of the tenure of their offices, his creatures, and, if they were not subservient to his views, he could remove them at his pleasure. Again: it was one of the fundamental articles of this central government, that the President, with the advice of his council, might suspend the action of any other department of the government, so that, in reality, absolute power was vested in the President.

The people of Texas were unwilling to commence the revolution—they were anxious to avoid a collision with Mexico. They sent Austin to Mexico to represent their condition, and to ask some guaranty that they should not be disturbed in the enjoyment of their rights. Without any cause, and even without charges being preferred against him, he was seized and incarcerated in the loathsome dungeons of Mexico, where, in fact, he contracted the disease which terminated his honorable and useful life. In order to carry out the establishment of this central government, it became necessary for Santa Anna to possess himself of all the physical power in Mexico. With a view to this, he procured the passage of a decree requiring the States, as well as individuals, to surrender up all the arms which they had in their possession. This law was enforced throughout Mexico. State constitutions were destroyed; States were declared to be mere departments; were deprived of all legislative authority; and their governors were appointed by the central government. This law was, as I have said, enforced all over Mexico, although there were some States which held out for some time against it. The State of Zacatecas, after a sharp contest, yielded, and other States made but a feeble resistance. Texas could not yield to it—she could not yield to such a decree. We were surrounded by hostile Indians, the Camanches and various other tribes, who were committing depredations on our frontiers. The Indians set led amongst us greatly exceeded our own population in point of numbers, and it was known that Mexican agents had been among them urging them to take up the tomahawk and scalping-knife and exterminate the Texans. If we had submitted to have our arms taken from us, the result would have been indiscriminate massacre. Under such circumstances, there is scarcely any one, I presume, who would have asked us to give up our arms, even to avoid the charge of being land-robbers. An attempt was made by Santa Anna to enforce this law in Texas. The legislature of Coahuila was attacked for merely protesting against the action of the central government, and its members were seized and imprisoned.

In this state of confusion, the people of the various municipalities had elected delegates to meet in general consultation, at San Felipe, to determine whether we would submit to the central government, and to agree upon some definite course of combined action. This convention was to assemble in October, 1835.

About this time, however, General Cos, at the head of an army of central troops, crossed the Rio Grande, left a garrison at Lipantitlan, on the west side of the Nueces, and one at Goliad, and marched with his main force to San Antonio, where he established his head quarters. During this march there was no movement on our part to take up arms; we were quietly assembling at San Felipe to consult as to what course we should adopt. About the time General Cos arrived at San Antonio, he sent a detachment of two hundred cavalry to Gonzales, a small town in the neighborhood of that place, to demand from its citizens the surrender of a small piece of ordnance, which had been purchased by them as a means of defence against the Indians. They asked twenty-four hours to consider, and finally refused to surrender their cannon, but gave the assailants its contents, and a fight ensued between them and the Mexican cavalry; and thus, sir, the revolution commenced.

As the news of this occurrence spread, the citizens from all quarters shouldered their rifles and hurried to the contest. Capt. Dimmit raised a company of men, took the garrison at Goliad, marched to Lipantitlan, where he was joined by citizens residing on both sides of the Nueces, as well as some who resided on the Rio Grande; and, at the head of this combined force, captured the fort and dispersed the central troops.

The convention, which had in the meanwhile assembled at San Felipe, declared against the central government, and protested against the military despotism of Santa Anna, and in favor of the constitution of 1824, inviting all the States of the confederacy to join them in restoring that constitution and reclaiming their liberties. General Cos, who had been closely besieged in his fortification at San Antonio, capitulated, after having been beaten. Many of the citizens who resided between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, were attached to the army which captured General Cos. Now, sir, I would ask, was it not right that we should include them in the benefits of our victory, and provide for their safety? I say, sir, would it not have been just or honorable in those of us who resided east of the Nueces, to have provided for our own security, and to have left those west of that river, from whom we had received valuable aid, to the tender mercies of the Mexican dictator? We did provide for their safety—many of them have since fallen. We have always asserted and stood by the rights of their widows and orphans, and, anxious as we were for peace and a termination of the war with Mexico, there never has been a time when Texas would not have hazarded her very existence as a nation, in any contest, however unequal, rather than have abandoned them to the enemy. Life and liberty were the stakes for which we fought—mere territory was a secondary, very secondary consideration. These people had dared to resist the central power—they had periled everything and had joined us—had rendered important services, and we had cheerfully accepted their aid in the hour of adversity, and I, for one, sir, think it was not discreditable to us that we regarded their rights and stipulated for their security in our prosperity. General Cos was forced to enter into a capitulation which protected the rights of those citizens, and which forms the first link in the chain of our title to the territory extending to the Rio Grande. Mr. President, I will ask the favor that the Secretary will read the copy of that instrument which I hold in my hand.

[The SECRETARY read the capitulation entered into by General Martin Perfecto de Cos, of the permanent troops, and General Edward Burleson, of the colonial troops of Texas.]

General Cos, sir, with his convicts and soldiers, retired to the west bank of the Rio Grande.

Thus, sir, the citizens of Texas, east of the Rio Grande, had, so far, successfully resisted the change of government. The military despotism had no foothold remaining on this side of that stream. Up to this time we had been contending for the constitution, which had been overthrown, and not for a separate national existence.

Santa Anna, bent upon the possession of absolute power, was not to be thus baulked in his views. He immediately mustered a large and well appointed army, and at its head, put himself en route for our extermination. He could not remain quiet while a few thousand on this side of the Rio Grande were in the enjoyment of rational liberty, and would not bow and worship at the footstool of his power. The rest of Mexico had submitted; no response to the shout of constitutional liberty reached us beyond the Rio Grande. Santa Anna was rapidly advancing upon us, threatening extermination, and we had no alternative left but to assume a separate national existence. A convention was accordingly called in haste, to which the people between the Nueces and the Rio Grande sent delegates. We declared our independence—appealed to the civilized world for the justice of our cause—and trusting to the God of battles, put ourselves in position to defend our rights. Santa Anna advanced with great rapidity, and the first blood that flowed in this campaign was shed upon the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. The Alamo was surrounded, and its brave defenders, to a man, perished by the sword. Fanning surrendered, and, in violation of the most solemn stipulations for the safety of his command, he and his gallant men were inhumanly butchered in cold blood. Most of the male inhabitants of the country west of the Nueces found bloody but honorable graves. Santa Anna continued his rapid advance, spreading ruin and devastation on his path. He was met at San Jacinto by seven hundred ... eighty Texans, and the result is before the world. ... Texas was slain, the remainder, trembling hatred, ... of Mexico or Tamaulipas, if they had a custom-house and had possession, as has been stated, is it not a little unreasonable that Gen. Wool should denounce the citizens of Tamaulipas, the custom-house officers of his own government, as "traitors," and subject them to capital punishment?

It has been said the Mexicans had a custom-house at Brasos Santiago, and that Gen. Taylor found a custom-house at Point Isabel, which the Mexicans abandoned and burnt at his approach.—Now, sir, the truth is, that the custom-house was at Matamoras, and the collector of customs resided there. It was there that the duties were paid on goods landed at Brasos Santiago, or at the mouth of the Rio Grande, on the west side, where, in fact, most of the merchandise intended for the Matamoras market was landed. I believe it is true that the collector did, occasionally, send his deputies to Point Isabel and Brasos Santiago, and they were sometimes accompanied by a military guard. I recollect upon one occasion several hundred soldiers were sent down to the latter place. The Mexican government had previously issued a declaration of independence, passed a law declaring the ports of Texas closed against foreign commerce, which law remained unrepealed. In 1837, the Mexican government procured what they called a navy, consisting of some three or four ships, one of which, I recollect, the "General Urea," came down to our coast, and captured one or two vessels owned by American citizens, and loaded with merchandise belonging to American merchants, and destined for the Texan trade. These vessels were carried to Brasos Santiago.—In a few days the commander of the United States ship Natchez, on her way home from a cruise, seeing these vessels in the harbor, demanded of the captain of the "General Urea" for what cause they were detained. He was informed they were prizes captured in an attempt to violate the blockade of Texas. The commander of the Natchez, not being apprised of any blockade, demanded that a copy of the proclamation of blockade should be furnished. They were obliged to send up to Matamoras to Gen Bravo, the collector, for it; and, when it was furnished, it turned out to be nothing more than a certified copy of the old law of 1835, closing the ports of Texas against foreign commerce. The commander of the Natchez would not recognize this as a blockade, and demanded that the American vessels should be released. This was refused, and the Natchez captured the Urea. A great parade was now made on shore, troops were collected, cannon fired at the Natchez, which was, however, beyond the reach of their shot; the goods were confiscated, and many of the men on board the vessels were marched to Matamoras and imprisoned. The commander of the Natchez brought the General Urea to Pensacola and reported the whole affair to his government. The matter ended, I think, in the release of the General Urea, and I am not sure that an apology was not made to the Mexican authorities.

But, sir, the Nueces boundary had its origin here. No act of the Mexican government, nor declaration of any Mexican officer can be produced, showing that Mexico has, upon any occasion, since 1836, claimed the territoiy between the Nueces and Rio Bravo, by any other or different title than that set up by them to the country as far as the Sabine. I might adduce many other facts in support of this position, but I will only trouble the Senate with one more, which is this: General Santa Anna, on the 27th of February, 1847, in his report of the battle of Buena Vista, holds the following language:

"From the impression we had made on the enemy here [illegible] of these was the hope of a day of time, however [illegible] Taylor from receiving powerful reinforcements [illegible] manœuvre he used. He also expected [illegible] the pacific disposition of part [illegible] General, that we sustained the most [illegible] the pretensions of our nationality and [illegible] that our government never acknowledged [illegible] conformity to peace when the [illegible] occupied any part of Mexican territory, [illegible] the Sabine, which [illegible] the Mexican territory in [illegible] to the enemy and the expenses [illegible] chan."

Now, sir, if these facts do not constitute a valid title in Texas to the territory as far as the Rio Grande, I frankly confess that I am incapable of forming a conclusion as to what would constitute such a title.

Texas solemnly claimed that territory, and every act on her part is perfectly consistent with that claim. Mexico has disclaimed it, except as a part of Texas, all of which she claimed, and all her acts have been perfectly consistent with this disavowal.

The title then having been, as I assert, in Texas at the time of the annexation, she surrendered to this government the right to assert and maintain her claim, as she could not, consistently with the constitution, herself muster a force to protect her soil from the pollution of a foreign foe and her citizens from outrage. It follows then that the President of the United States was not only authorized, but was bound, solemnly bound, by the constitution and laws, as well as his oath of office, to protect the citizens of Texas against, actually a threatened, but an actual invasion. So General Taylor found the Mexican troops upon the territory in question, on his march to the Rio Grande. He would have been [illegible] culpable, and justly chargeable with all the consequences, had he failed to do so.

It may, perhaps, Mr. President, be proper, before I proceed further, to say something in regard to the claim of Texas to Santa Fe.

A SENATOR.—Yes let us hear something about that.

Mr. RUSK.—This, sir, is the more necessary, inasmuch as I see by the newspapers, that an attempt is now being made to establish a territorial government of the United States there, irrespective of the claim of Texas. Santa Fe, sir, is east of the Rio Grande, and is included within the limits prescribed for Texas, in the treaty with Santa Anna. It is included in our territory by a law passed by the Texan Congress, in the year 1836, so that, at the time of annexation, Texas and Mexico claimed the territory. This government was fully apprized of this claim, as the resolutions of annexation show. The United States consented to become the judge upon the question of boundary between Texas and Mexico. For a country has to claim except [illegible] annexation. The government has taken possession, and it would be a new principle, that the judge, to whom a controversy has been submitted, shall seize the thing which is the subject of the dispute, and appropriate it to his own use. I think I have seen such a decision in a newspaper, but I believe it is nowhere to be found in the books.

Mr. President, we are so constituted by nature, that when a war is once begun, our attention is so much absorbed by the stirring scenes that attend it, and the consequences which spring from it, that we loose sight, in a great degree, of the causes which immediately preceded and led to the result. And, sir, the truth of this proposition is peculiarly illustrated in the case under consideration. It has been boldly charged on the one side, and resolutely denied on the other, that this war was not commenced by Mexico, but by the President of the United States. Let us, sir, go back and examine [illegible] circumstances which immediately preceded its commencement. Every act of the President shows, I think, most conclusively, that he was extremely solicitous to avoid a collision with Mexico.

It had been asserted, repeatedly asserted, that to annex Texas was an act of war, or would inevitably lead to a war. The President thought otherwise, and did everthing in his power to avoid such a result. He sent a minister who was thought to be, personally, more acceptable than any other, to negotiate with Mexico. Her minister had left Washington in high dudgeon, and she indignantly refused to receive our representative, or listen to terms, declaring in the face of a truth of twelve years' standing, that Texas was her province. Her government denounced that of the United States; declared its determination to go to war, and made every preparation [illegible] accomplished [illegible] and commenced a concentration upon the Rio Grande. Thus matters stood at the beginning of the year 1846.

General Taylor, in a despatch to the Secretary of War, dated at Corpus Christi, on the 4th of October, 1845, had, very properly as I think, recommended a movement to the Rio Grande. In his communication, the general says:

[illegible]

After giving at full length the reasons for the recommendation which he was about to make, he proceeds to say:

[illegible]

The President very properly adopted the suggestion of General Taylor, and ordered the troops to the Rio Grande, instructing that officer to avoid everything calculated to lead to a collision. On the 21st of March, 1846, General Taylor was met at the Colorado by the Mexican troops, and ordered peremptorily not to cross that river. Now, I say, to which party is that principle of the law of nations applicable, which declares that for either party to take against possession of a territory in dispute, is an act of war? On the 28th of the same month, two of General Taylor's dragoons were taken prisoners, and a bugler boy robbed of his horse by the Mexican troops. On the day above named, General Mejia refused to receive a communication from General Taylor, and on the 10th of April, Colonel Cross was missing, and in a few days his body was found shockingly mutilated. On the 12th, General Ampudia arrived at Matamoras, and peremptorily ordered General Taylor to retire. Taylor declined to do so, but expressed the wish of his government for a peaceable adjustment of all difficulties. On the 18th, Lieutenant Porter, with a small party of our troops was [illegible] and after being disabled by a wound, was butchered. On the 24th General Taylor was so well satisfied of the hostile intentions of the enemy, that he blockaded up the mouth of the Rio Grande, in order to cut off supplies that were expected by them. On the 24th, General Ampudia demanded that the blockade should be raised; the American General refused. On the same day, General Arista arrived at Matamoras, and on the 26th, Captain Thornton, in command of forty-five dragoons, was attacked by Torrejon, with a force of over two thousand, and two companies and eight privates were killed. On the 28th, Captain Walker was attacked by a large force of Mexicans. On the 1st of May, an unarmed family of sixteen persons, two of whom were females, were taken prisoners at the Colorado, by the Mexicans, tied together in pairs, the women outraged, and their throats cut, and left to rot upon the prairie. Mr. President, Texas suffered much at the hands of Mexico—prisoners have been butchered in cold blood, confined in Mexican dungeons, and starved. But, sir, we had to submit to no such outrages as these, and can, each American citizen, look back upon his country as free and pure, and not one of his hands washed even with blood, as I had been left to regard by the President of these United States, would have caused every American heart to turn from him with loathing and disgust. Who is there in all this broad land that would have cried "forbear," or could have expected the Executive again to entreat the Mexicans to negotiate? Not one, sir; no, not one.

The battles of the 8th and 9th followed, and who is there that, even if he could do so, would be willing to blot these and the brilliant victories which have followed in quick succession, from the pages of our country's history? The President, sir, has been blamed for alluding to the injuries and insults inflicted upon us by Mexico. If there be any blame attaching to him, I think it is for too great forbearance in this matter. Mexico has, sir, for the last twenty years, robbed your fellow-citizens of their property and imprisoned their persons, in violation of solemn treaties. She has met their demands upon her for redress with insult and indifference, until they have ceased to appeal to you for redress. In Mexico, sir, ever since she has had a government of her own, to claim to be an American citizen, was sure to result in confiscation of property and imprisonment, and perhaps, while to claim to be an English or a French subject, was to unbar the doors of her dungeons. How different in this respect has been the conduct of the French government from that of our own. When redress was refused for injuries inflicted upon French citizens, the government of France did not stop to parley and negotiate; she battered down the walls of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa, and the proud Castilian blood, about which we have heard so much, instantly yielded to the demands of justice.

It is, sir, a beautiful feature in the policy of the British government, that she never fails to redress the grievances of the lowliest as well as the proudest of her subjects, and hence arises that deep seated, enthusiastic attachment which a British subject always feels to the institutions of his country. He may perish, sir, in a far distant land, beneath the scourge of the oppressor, but his dying moments are cheered by the assurance that his government will exact ample redress for the wrongs inflicted upon him, and his last aspiration on earth will be for his country.

I hope the day will come when an American citizen will look with a similar confidence to his government; but, sir, it pains me to say it, hitherto it has been far otherwise.

I might allude to the many instances of oppression practised on American citizens by American officers, but, sir, it would take volumes to record them all, and I feel safe in hazarding the assertion, that no single year has passed within the last twenty during which the dungeons of Mexico have not contained American citizens, incarcerated without fault or crime justly imputable to them. This, sir, is but a feeble sketch of the course of the government of Mexico, in behalf of whom so much sympathy is invoked from the people of the United States.

But, Mr. President, we are in the midst of a war. That it exists, is a matter of regret to all, and the sooner it can be brought to a close the better. It is my opinion, that if the President had been properly sustained, it would have been terminated long since. I believe that our own differences of opinion have had the effect of prolonging this war; but you will allow me, Mr. President, here to say, at the same time, I believe that those who contend that it was unconstitutionally and improperly begun, are as sincere and as patriotic as I claim to be myself, in holding the opposite opinion. It is, sir, an honest difference of opinion concerning momentous questions upon which a final judgment has not yet been pronounced. But, sir, the Mexicans are a peculiar people; they cannot appreciate the American character, nor can they realize the beautiful sentiment uttered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] as true as it was beautiful, and expressed in a style so peculiarly his own, when he said, "in making the law we have many voices—in its execution but one arm." The truth of this position, sir, has been most triumphantly proved upon the hard fought fields, where both whigs and democrats have nobly borne the standard of their country victoriously onward to the centre of Mexico. But, sir, it is an old adage that drowning men will catch at straws. The Mexicans know that many of the most prominent men in our country believe the war to have been improperly begun, and that our army ought to be withdrawn from their country; and, knowing them as I do, I am not astonished at the unfortunate hopes they entertain, growing out of our political differences of opinion. They know that party changes have taken place, that we are upon the eve of important elections, and they hope at least, if they do not believe, that something may transpire favorable for them. If the President, sir, could have felt at the beginning that he was fully sustained, I am of opinion the war would not have been prosecuted.

But, Mr. President, the question at present is, how we are to terminate this most advantageously? Three plans have been suggested:

1st. To withdraw our troops from Mexico altogether.

2d. To take a defensive line, and concentrate our troops upon it.

3d. To prosecute the war with vigor, until Mexico shall become convinced of the necessity of tendering to us justice, and shall do so.

To the first proposition, Mr. President, I cannot agree. Aside from the disgrace which, as I think, we should incur by pursuing a course which would be a tacit acknowledgment before the whole civilized world that the war had been improperly begun, such a policy would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could occur to the United States. That it would be one of the worst things that could happen for Mexico is beyond all question. If we were to withdraw our troops now, it would be to admit the truth of the charge which has been made, that the war was commenced for the purpose of land robbery. But, apart from all this, it would be a misfortune to the people of the United States, and a very great misfortune to the people of Mexico themselves. I may, perhaps, be told that my fears are idle, but I think otherwise. In such an event, what would be the inevitable result? It would be that Mexico, in her present exhausted condition, would immediately, in reality, if not in name, fall into the possession of some European power. Senators may suppose that this apprehension is a mere creature of the imagination, but I happen to know, that for the last ten or twelve years, Mexico has been practically under the control, directly or indirectly, of the British government. It is to this source that we must trace the prejudices which have existed against the North Americans. It is through the instrumentality of the military party of the country, led on by its chiefs, under the direction of British influences, that you have been excluded from their markets, and that your citizens have been imprisoned, and their property confiscated. This is the true but secret reason why your trade with Mexico, which was formerly so flourishing, amounting to not less than eleven or twelve millions of dollars annually, has been reduced to perhaps less than million of dollars. The British agents, sir, are always at work; they are never idle; nor are they so at this time. I am indebted to the gallant Lieut. Col. Fremont for some information acquired by him while acting as Governor of California, which has an important bearing upon this branch of my subject, and which will throw a great deal of light upon what is at present going on in Mexico. There has been in progress in California, ever since the commencement of this war, a three-fold operation, having its origin in the city of Mexico, and conducted by official or unofficial agents of the British government. In the first place, there have been transfers of land, not only from individuals, but from churches, through which a transfer of the sovereignty of the country has been attempted. A junta, as it is called, or convention, had been sanctioned by the governor of the province, to be called to deliberate on the propriety of declaring the inhabitants independent of Mexico, and seeking the protection of the British government. More than this. In the city of Mexico itself, a stupendous scheme had been devised by a Roman Catholic priest, named Macnamara, who, having obtained the sanction of the Mexican government, was sent down to procure a grant of three thousand square leagues of land in that province. The ecclesiastic was transported to Monterey in a British national ship, and the grant was immediately sanctioned by the government of California.

But, sir, I will not anticipate the account which will be laid before the country, at the proper time, placing this transaction in its true light. It is sufficient to say, that had it not been for timely and energetic action, California would have belonged, at this moment, to subjects of Great Britain, and the British flag would have been flying on all her forts. Senators will find these facts established beyond all doubt, in the course of a very few days. I will not take the trouble to read any part of this grant, but I will append the precious document to the remarks which I now offer, in order that the country may be advised of what is going on in Mexico.

These things are and have been in progress in Mexico ever since the commencement of our present difficulties, and there can be no question that the British government would sanction and favor the taking possession of that whole country by her subjects. When were the possession and sovereignty of a country ever offered to and refused by that government? I would not like to see Mexico in that condition.

There are various other reasons which induce me to believe that something of this kind is in contemplation. I know something of Mexico, and I feel assured that our army has already captured more small arms in that country than were in it at the commencement of the war. The vessels of foreign nations are constantly hovering off the coast, and the observations of fifteen years have taught me to anticipate the effect of the immediate withdrawal of our army from that country. It is known that Parades, the avowed advocate of monarchical institution, is now in Mexico, attempting to place some European prince upon the throne, or assume the kingly power himself. Should Santa Anna again get into power, the establishment of a monarchy will, in all probability, be the result. He has no sympathies with the people, none whatever; and revengeful and ambitious as he is, he would not hesitate to make himself a king. He has not forgotten, that when he was deprived of power, the populace took from its resting place the limb he had lost in their service, and treated it with the utmost indignity. If he cannot enslave the people by his own power, he will readily join in any project which may effect that object. Such is the temper of the Mexican people, Mr. President, that I feel convinced they will either establish a monarchy, with a native sovereign, or place themselves under the dominion of some European power.

But, if there were no such thing as the establishment of a monarchy to be apprehended, are we willing, I would ask, to abandon the prosecution of this war under the circumstances which have attended it. When we have proceeded thus far without having been in error at the commencement or during the progress of the war—asking nothing but an honorable peace with a reasonable indemnity, which our enemies have refused to grant on all occasions, or even to talk about, are we now to withdraw our troops without effecting our object? General Taylor offered them peace—General Scott has offered it, and the President has offered it over and over again, under circumstances which have almost made them objects of ridicule with the country. And yet we are told that the poor, confiding, magnanimous Mexican nation are suffering at our hands, and we ought to withdraw our troops. What will the world say in such an event? They may say we are a magnanimous people, but must think we have very little judgment. We want peace and Mexico has utterly refused to make it, and I am unwilling to make a retrograde movement, until she is brought to her senses, and offers assurance of good behavior in future.

It has been proposed that we shall adopt a defensive line. In my opinion, sir, the adoption of such a line will extend the duration of the war to an indefinite time. If we were to fall back and assume a line which should include what we are willing to accept as an indemnity for the losses and injuries sustained by us, and garrison it, what would be the consequence? Being relieved from the presence of our army, Mexico will acquire the means of operating against us. She will get the mines and revenues of the country, and will invoke foreign aid, and thus the war will become interminable, and may eventuate by bringing us into conflict with some foreign and transatlantic power.

My opinion, then, Mr. President, is, that we should prosecute this war with vigor, and that the necessary consequences of such vigorous prosecution will be, to show the Mexicans that we are resolved to bring them to reason. They should be made to understand that they have nothing to expect from our divisions at home, the nature and extent of which they do not know and cannot properly appreciate. If they see forty or fifty thousand men about to seize and occupy permanently their large cities and mining districts, they would soon be convinced, notwithstanding the approach of our Presidential election, that their only means of escape is the adoption of a treaty of peace which shall be satisfactory to this country. They do not know that any differences of political opinion which may exist among us, do nor weaken the arm of any man who serves his country. But it is said that Mexico is in our hands, that we have her already at our feet, that it is ungenerous to press her further, and that we have already men enough in that country. All this may be true. Allusion has been made to the battle of Buena Vista. We have been told that we had men enough there to overcome the enemy, and gain a victory that has few parallels, if any, and that this was effected with a force of about six thousand men opposed to twenty thousand. This is all true, and if there had been but six hundred of our men there, General Taylor would not have retreated. He and his gallant followers would have maintained their position; they might have been slain where they stood, but would never have been beaten by the Mexicans. It will be admitted that if instead six of thousand, we had had twenty thousand men on the field, Santa Anna would never have escaped with the bulk of his army and his munitions of war. Had such been the case, I would ask, would the gallant, the chivalrous Clay, when lying mangled and bleeding on the battle-field, and unable to defend himself, have been pinned to the earth by the lances of a brutal and dastardly soldiery. No, sir, and it is my belief, that the greater the energy with which we prosecute this war, and the more commanding the force we place in the field, the less will be the sacrifice of human life, and the sooner will we bring the enemy to terms.

I know, Mr. President, that great fears are entertained of the consequences likely to ensue from the taking of all Mexico, or any considerable portion of it. I confess that I entertain no such fears, but at the same time I would not insist upon any more of Mexico than may be necessary to afford us indemnity for losses, and, at the same time, furnish a well-founded assurance that she will maintain a government, free in itself, and not liable to the interference or control of any foreign government or their agents. I would be content with a fair indemnity, but would run the risk of the consequences of taking the whole country, rather than to see the people exposed to the oppressions of the military power.

It is said, Mr. President, that it would be robbery to take away their country from the Mexicans. On this point, I would ask whether the principles of our government do not guaranty to all of our citizens the full enjoyment of life, liberty, and property? If so, would not the extension of our government throughout Mexico, give perfect security to the inhabitants, who would, in that event, be entitled to the protection of our laws? Could this be called robbery, or would the right of property be divested? How would the rights of individuals be, in any degree, interfered with, by reason of our occupation of the country, or what sort of robbery would it cause? It would be nothing more nor less than this, Mr. President. It would take from the tyrannical military chiefs the power of oppressing the people. It would deprive foreigners of their power and privilege to make use of the government for their own purposes, in effecting their own aggrandizement and enriching themselves. It would afford the country an opportunity to develop its mighty resources, and prevent them from being monopolized by a few foreign capitalists, whose interests are in conflict with those of the United States. There is one thing, however, sir, that I would not be willing to do. I would not be willing to vote for a treaty of peace that would not secure to us the territory as far as the Sierra Madre, including the Californias. This is what we should have, under all the circumstances, to place us in position to watch the political movements that may hereafter transpire; for if we leave Mexico in the possession of the priests or the military power, she will become an instrument in the hands of some other government, with which to annoy and interfere with us

Such an arrangement would be to the advantage of Mexico herself, if she be disposed to establish a free and stable government. The truth is, sir, that the city of Mexico controls the whole of the Mexican republic. It always has done so, even when there existed the form of a constitution, and the pretence of State sovereignties. It is the heart of Mexico, and is to her what Paris is to France.

The government then being in the city of Mexico, it cannot effectually control the more distant provinces, and, consequently, be less able than ever to afford them security. To these people the advantages would be immense, growing out of the protection they would enjoy against Indian outrage. The roving bands of Camanches and other savages, are committing depredations upon them constantly, and at this moment there are thousands of their women and children belonging to the most respectable families, who are held in the most hopeless captivity by those Indians, against whom they cannot protect themselves. There is not a month, or scarcely a week that passes, which does not witness outrages of this sort. Then, sir, instead of being an injury to these people, it would be to do them the greatest service possible, to take them under our protection. While this territory is, comparatively, of little value to Mexico, to us it is of great importance, and to make ourselves masters of it, would be only to acquire what is justly due, in consideration of the debt which Mexico owes to us, and which she is unable to pay in any other way. Our claims against Mexico are of no ordinary kind. What she owes us is due, not to the government, but to our citizens. They did not voluntarily part with their property, in order to create this indebtedness; but Mexico, with violence and a shameless disregard of all principle, robbed them of what belonged to them. Most of the claimants have been for years, and are at present, ground down to the earth by poverty, brought upon them by the forcible taking of their substance by the authorities of Mexico.

I do not propose to pursue this discussion further at this time; but before I take my seat, Mr. President, I will venture the assertion, that, if partisan political motives be suffered to enter into and mingle themselves with the management of the present war—if protracted debate be allowed to postpone the prompt and energetic action necessary to bring it to a successful and honorable termination—and if it be continued for twelve months longer, Senators will find it impossible to get rid of it, until we shall make up our minds to annex the whole of Mexico.

Mr. GREENE took the floor, and on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented a petition of citizens of the United States residing in the Wyandot nation, in the Indian territory, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on newspapers, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a document relating to the claim of Joseph Barclay, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, to an additional bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANGUM presented the petition of William Davis and others, praying that the right to purchase the timber on certain public lands in Alabama, may be granted to them; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BREESE presented two petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying the establishment of a mail route from Waterloo to Sparta, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Caroline E. Clitherall, widow of George C. Clitherall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That Scott, White and Company have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

POST ROUTE.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Waterloo to Red Bud and Fayetteville to Sparta, in the State of Illinois.

CONTRIBUTIONS IN MEXICO.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following resolutions for consideration, which were ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the amount of money levied by the army of the United States in Mexico, from the citizens of that republic, and from the municipal authorities and people thereof, to the use of the Treasury of the United States for the support of the army, and for the payment of the troops and other expenses of the United States in Mexico, and for the payment of claims against Mexico, and for the liquidation of the claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, under the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848, and the Act of Congress of the 3d March, 1847, [illegible] shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be applied to the purposes for which it was levied, and to no other purpose whatsoever.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to the amount of money collected in Mexico, or contributions levied by the military forces of the United States in Mexico, and the manner in which the same has been disposed of, or applied.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the memorials of Susan C. Randall and of C. Chauncey and others, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the petition of J. Bigelow, administrator of Francis Cazeau, deceased; and also the report (and bill accompanying the same) made in said case by same committee, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Aaron Carman, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mary Cassin; and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Board of the American Indian Mission Association.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill concerning the courts of the United States in and for the district of Michigan, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

HOUSE BILLS REPORTED.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment.

An act for the relief of the legal heirs of John Snyder, deceased.

An act for the relief of S. Morris Wain

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James Brown, deceased.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Phineas Capen, legal administrator of John Cox, deceased, of Boston, reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE LOAN BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

On motion by Mr. NILES, the prior orders were suspended, and the bill in amendment of an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of fraud on the revenues of the Post Office Department,'" passed the 3d of March, 1845, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

WIDOW OF COLONEL MCREA.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the prior orders were suspended, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for the relief of Mary McRea, widow of Lieutenant Colonel William McRea, late of the United States army, deceased.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "during her natural life," and inserting in lieu thereof "for the ensuing five years from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. SEVIER suggested the propriety of allowing the bill to stand as it had been reported. The widow of Col. McRea was very old and infirm, and it was not likely that she would live much longer. Their experience had shown that the limitation of these relief bills to a period of five years was not effective, a renewal always being sought. In order to save legislation he made the suggestion that the bill be allowed to remain without amendment.

Mr. HANNEGAN said that he should most cheerfully acquiesce in the suggestion were it not for a letter which he had received from the old lady himself, with whom he had no previous acquaintance, and had never seen. She was more than seventy years of age and was borne down by many infirmities. In that letter the old lady expressed her desire that the limitation of five years should be made in order to facilitate the passage of the bill, at the same time that she implored speedy action. The claim was a highly meritorious one, and the relief proposed to be extended was in consideration of services as deserving as any ever rendered by any gallant soldier.

Mr. BENTON then rose, but yielded to

Mr. NILES, who said he not did rise exactly to oppose the bill, but he begged leave to call attention to the course of legislation on this subject, in order that they might see whither it is tending, and where it is to end. For a length of time a law providing for the widows and minor children of officers and soldiers of the militia dying from wounds in that service, had been in existence. As he thought, with good reason, a distinction had been made in favor of the militia. A few days since, after a very little consideration, a bill had passed the Senate extending the law, to which he had just alluded, to the regular army of the United States. In the form in which it was presented, that bill would have gone back to 1818, but he had discovered that, and procured an amendment, which confined its operation to the regular army from the first of March, 1846, to the end of the present war. No doubt the case now before the Senate was highly meritorious; yet, as it went on the principle that the widow of an officer who had been engaged in the service of his country in war was entitled to this extension of a pension, it was easy to see that if passed, it would not be easy to resist the application of this principle to all cases of widows of officers or soldiers engaged in the last two wars—the Great Britain. He wished, then, the attention of the Senate to be directed to the effect, length, and breadth of the principle in which it was now proposed to act.

Mr. BENTON said he yielded the floor to his friend from Connecticut, in the full expectation that he would support the bill, because he so generally concurred in favor of what was right. The case of Mrs. McRae had been brought forward by himself some years ago; and a Senator from Maine, no longer a member of the body, who was also acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, most cordially co-operated in bringing it to the favorable consideration of the Senate. At the time the case was first brought forward, he expressed his desire that the principle involved in the case might be applied to the whole army; but the old lady having lived too long already to expect to be able to live long enough to see a general principle applied to meet her case—begged him to give the bill the form which the Senator from Indiana had now given it. In that form he cordially united with the Senator from Indiana and others acquainted with the subject, in giving it a cordial support, in the full conviction, at the same time, that they were not doing adequate justice. It was the case of a lady—her letter showed her to be one in every sense of the word—who, for upwards fifty years, had been the wife of as brave and as honorable a soldier as ever lived, and who, in his fifty years of military life, was always upon the frontier—always engaged in arduous service—in Indian wars, at frontier posts—doing every thing which belonged to the laborious military life of the earliest period of our history, from '91 coming down to the end of the war with Great Britain. He perished on the banks of the Ohio, struck with the cholera. If he had been struck down by the arrow or the hatchet of the Indian, his wife would have taken her pension as a matter of course. He was struck down in the line of his duty, and his death to his family was precisely the same as if he had fallen by the hand of the foe. But the law made a difference between the soldier killed in battle and him who dies from disease. Yet there should be no difference; for it matters not upon what field the soldier dies who gives his life for his country, so far as regards the merit of the sacrifice. It is the same in both cases. The loss to his family is the same. And far more was he to be pitied who died from disease than he who fell at the head of his command on the field of battle. Yet the law made a difference, and thus, after fifty years of service, this officer's widow cannot take a pension because her husband was struck down by disease, although in the line of his duty. If she had been only twenty four hours married, and her husband had fallen in battle, she would have been entitled to a pension. But here, after fifty years of service, the widow of the officer receives nothing because he did not happen to fall by the hand of the foe.

A SENATOR.—He may have been on a furlough.

Mr. BENTON.—On furlough? He had never any thing to do with furlough. What he had to with most was double duty—building forts, opening roads, making bridges—on the frontier always. This was truly a case in which they might say—

"Deliberat Roma, pent Saguntum."

The old lady perisheth whilst they deliberate! He hoped, in conclusion, that every consideration of justice would prompt the Senate to consent to the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, agreed with the Senator from Connecticut, that there might be some danger in establishing precedents calculated to lead to a too wide extension of the pension laws. But he did not apprehend that the passage of the present bill would operate in that way. The case was one of the most meritorious character, and it had peculiar features which rendered it hardly probable that it would be hereafter cited as a precedent to justify any improper legislation.

Mr. PEARCE remarked that it was very difficult to resist such appeals to the feelings of Senators as had been made in favor of this bill. But he was of opinion that the bill introduced a new principle in their legislation, ever known in the case of military pensions, and but for a short time, and that most unfavorably in the case of naval pensions. The principle of the naval pension law was that the widows of those killed in battle—dying from wounds received in battle, or in consequence of exposure to some of the peculiar hazards of their profession, were entitled to a pension.—So far he was willing to go. But the present bill proposed to go farther. It proposed to give a pension to the widow of an officer who died from a disease to which he was not subjected in the line of his duty. If that principle were adopted, why not extend it to all employees of the government, civil as well as military. He was very far from wishing to detract from the value and importance of the services of this officer, but he did not approve of the principle involved in the bill. If the bill passed, he did not see why they should not go on and, and following the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, enact a general law, giving pensions to the widows of all officers dying in the service, no matter how or where.

Mr. BADGER said that he was at once glad and sorry to hear the remarks of his friend from Maryland, because it was evident that, throughout, his excellent understanding was engaged in a forced contest with the suggestions of his heart. For himself, he had never given a vote in that body with more pleasure than he would vote for this bill. It introduced no new principle into their pension laws. It was not an application to extend the pension laws. It was simply an application to Congress to pass a special bill for a special case, and when a similar case presented itself all that was to be done was to make a similar provision for it. When a similar case occurred, he would, with equal cheerfulness, be prepared to provide for it in the same way. He thought that that country might be declared incapable of self-government, and the proper discharge of its duties to those who served it, which was either unable or unwilling to discharge such a debt as that incurred in the present case—a case of more than forty years unremitted, devoted, faithful service, death in the service, and an aged relict left entirely destitute.

Mr. HANNEGAN said that he had refrained from expressing his own opinion on the bill from the fact that he had been satisfied from the first that the Senate would pass the bill. He rose for the purpose of begging the friends of the bill at any rate, and Senators on every side, to allow the question to be taken without further debate, as it was apparent from the hands of the clock that unless acted on at once, it would be laid over for another day, meanwhile, in the beautiful language quoted by the Senator from Missouri, whilst they deliberated, the aged widow starved.

The amendment was agreed to; and no further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. GREENE.—Mr. President, when the act of May, 1846, recognizing the existence of the war with Mexico, passed the two Houses of Congress, I was absent on a visit to my family, and, therefore, my name is not to be found on the journal of the Senate, upon that bill. I have since voted for supplies of men and money for the prosecution of this war; but I have now come to the conclusion that it is my duty to vote against the bill upon your table. It is due to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent in this chamber, that I should declare, at least, some of the reasons which influence me in the vote I am about to give. This, sir, must be my apology for obtruding myself upon the indulgence of the Senate at this late period of the debate. I have no hope that any thing I can say will influence the action of this body. I have no hope that I can throw any new light upon a subject which has been already so ably and so fully discussed. It is merely because I think the people of the State of Rhode Island have a right to hear from me, upon the questions involved in this debate, that I now address you.

Had I been in my seat when the vote was taken upon the act passed in May, 1846, I do not doubt—I never have doubted—that I should have acted with Senators upon this and the other side of the chamber in voting for the bill; I should have endeavored, with my friends upon this side, to amend it, by striking out the objectionable preamble; but, if we had not succeeded in that, in the emergency presented to us by the message, and without time to examine into the facts, in regard to the origin of the war, I should not have felt myself authorized to withhold my vote from a measure which I should have deemed of pressing necessity for the safety of our army upon the Rio Grande, then understood to be in great peril from an overwhelming force.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to detain the Senate by any discussion of the origin or justice of this war. These questions have brought to their consideration the minds of men abler by far than he who now addresses you; and the subject seems to me to have been entirely exhausted. It is sufficient for me to say, that I believe the war to have been unnecessarily precipitated; that the immediate cause of it was the order under which the army was marched from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande; that it might have been avoided by the exercise of prudence; and that it was, therefore, unnecessary, and, if unnecessary, unjust, at least to ourselves. I propose to confine myself, in the remarks which I shall make, to the consideration of our present position and future prospects, if the war be continued, and the measures and policy now recommended by the President of the United States, be adopted. I shall endeavor to show that the character and objects of the war are changed; that it is inconsistent with the intention of the framers of, and parties to the constitution of the United States, and with the spirit of that instrument itself, to acquire and hold by conquest any foreign territory; that it is not only unconstitutional, but would be inexpedient and dangerous to our free institutions and to the permanency of the Union, to acquire and hold any portion of Mexico by conquest; and that to make the addition to the army now proposed, is unnecessary, and would tend to increase the difficulties of our position and protract the war. I will consider these various points as briefly as I may. I shall not go over the whole of the wide field embraced in these propositions, but shall content myself with offering only such remarks, in regard to each, as shall sufficiently explain my views in relation to them.

Until the present session of Congress, every message of the President of the United States, from that of May, 1846, has held out the idea that the war would be prosecuted with vigor, but that no territory was to be permanently held by this country, unless by free and voluntary cession on the part of Mexico—by treaty, and on fair and honorable terms. I think I am correct in this position, that until the annual message of the President of the United States to the present Congress, the idea of holding any portion of territory by conquest, was never intimated by the Executive, nor indeed was it ever, so far as I recollect, suggested upon this floor. If this be true, then, I repeat, and it is demonstrable, that if we carry out the measures recommended in the message of December, 1847, we shall prosecute the war for objects not only not hitherto avowed, but, on the contrary, expressly disavowed, by the Executive, and which are, in my opinion, utterly inconsistent with the welfare and prosperity of our country. For the purpose of showing this, I will compare the present annual message of the President with his former messages. I will first refer to the message of August 8th, 1846. In that communication, the President, after speaking of the best mode of carrying on the war, says:

"Impressed with the belief that Mexico will yet accept peace rather than meet the certain consequences of a further prosecution of the war, I forbear to enumerate the conditions on which I would be willing to terminate it. They would be such as would be entirely consistent with the honor of the republic, which could not be inconvenient to both, and such as neither will hereafter be inclined to disturb. In the adjustment of those conditions, we ought to pay a fair equivalent for any concessions we may make."

"A peace just and honorable to both parties," was then avowed to be the object of the war. The language is explicit. It not only does not look to the acquisition of territory by conquest, but it expressly disavows and disclaims any such intention. In the adjustment of the boundary he says, "we ought to pay a fair equivalent for any concessions which may be made by Mexico." Again, in the annual message of December, 1846, the President says:

"They will continue to be prosecuted with vigor, as the best means of securing peace. It is hoped that the decision of the Mexican Congress, to which our last overture has been referred, may result in a speedy and honorable peace. With experience, however, of the unreasonable course of the Mexican authorities, it is the part of wisdom not to relax in the energy of our military operations, until the terms of peace are finally settled. In case we are compelled, by the military power of the provinces which have been taken, until a definitive treaty of peace shall have been concluded and ratified by the two countries.

"Should our present overture be rejected, but nothing been commenced by Mexico, it has been carried into the enemy's country, and will be vigorously prosecuted there, with a view to obtain an honorable peace, and thereby secure an indemnity for the future expenses of the war, as well as for other injuries sustained, who hold large pecuniary demands against Mexico."

The President here reiterates his disavowal that the war has been "waged with a view to conquest." And again, on the 13th of February, 1847, the President tells us:

"While it is deemed to be our true policy to prosecute the war in the manner in which it is now conducted, and to press it with all the vigor which the circumstances will admit, we are ready, with the authority conferred on me by the constitution, and with all the means which may be placed at my command by Congress, to conclude a just and honorable peace."

Now, sir, what is the language of the President, and what are the measures proposed by him at the commencement of the present session? I will ask the indulgence of the Senate, whilst I read a passage from the last annual message of the Executive. The President there says:

"Whilst our arms have been every where victorious, having subjected to our military occupation a large portion of the enemy's country, including his capital, and negotiations for peace having failed, the important questions arise, in what manner the war ought to be prosecuted, and what should be our future policy? I cannot doubt that we should secure and render available the conquest which we have already made and that, with this view, we should hold and occupy, by our naval and military forces, all the ports, towns, cities, and provinces now in our occupation, or which may hereafter fall into our possession; that we should press forward our military operations, and levy such military contributions on the enemy as may, as far as practicable, defray the future expenses of the war.

"Had the government of Mexico acceded to the equitable and liberal terms proposed, that mode of adjustment would have been preferred. Mexico having declined to do this, and failed to offer any other terms which could be accepted by the United States, the national honor, no less than the public interests, requires that the war should be prosecuted with increased energy and power, until a just and satisfactory peace can be obtained. In the meantime, as Mexico refuses all indemnity, we should adopt measures to indemnify ourselves by appropriating permanently a portion of her territory. Early after the commencement of the war, New Mexico and the Californias were taken possession of by our forces. Our military and naval commanders were ordered to occupy and hold them, subject to future negotiation."

These provinces are now in our undisputed occupation, and have been so for many months, all resistance on the part of Mexico having ceased within their limits. I am satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico. Should Congress concur with me in this opinion, and that they should be retained by the United States as indemnity, I can perceive no good reason why the civil jurisdiction and laws of the United States should not at once be extended over them. To wait for a treaty of peace, such as we are willing to make, by which our relations towards them would not be changed, cannot be good policy; whilst our own interest, and that of the people inhabiting them, require that a stable, responsible, and free government under our authority should, as soon as possible, be established over them. Should Congress, therefore, determine to hold these provinces permanently, and that they shall hereafter be considered as constituent parts of our country, the early establishment of territorial governments over them will be important for the more perfect protection of persons and property; and I recommend that such territorial governments be established. It will produce quiet and tranquility among the inhabitants, by allaying the apprehension that they may still entertain of being subjected again to the jurisdiction of Mexico. I invite the early and favorable consideration of Congress to this important subject.

Besides New Mexico and the Californias, there are other Mexican provinces which have been reduced to our possession by conquest. These other Mexican provinces are now governed by our military and naval commanders, under the general authority which is understood to be conferred upon them by the laws of war. They should continue to be held as a means of coercing Mexico to accede to just terms of peace. Civil as well as military officers are required to conduct such a government. Adequate compensation, to be drawn from contributions levied on the enemy, should be granted to such officers as may be thus employed. What further provision may become necessary, and what final disposition it may be proper to make of them, must depend on the future progress of the war and the course which Mexico may think proper hereafter to pursue."

Here, then, is proof abundant that the character and objects of the war are changed. By the recommendation of the President, we are to render "available" the conquests of Mexican territory which we have made. "We should adopt measures to indemnify ourselves by appropriating permanently a portion of her territory." We are to hold the provinces of New Mexico and the Californias, with or without a treaty. "I am satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico," says the President of the United States. To substitute—no equivalent—no payment of money, even, can change our relations in these provinces. In no event can they be surrendered to Mexico. What is this but title by conquest? We have, and we claim no right to these provinces, over which we are to establish "territorial governments," except the right of the strongest.

The obvious and striking difference between the messages to which I have referred, shows that the policy recommended to Congress at the present time is utterly at variance with that formerly avowed by the President. It must be apparent to the minds of all, from a comparison of these messages—from contrasting the objects formerly avowed by the President with his language now, and the measures at present recommended by him, that gentlemen who heretofore have voted for men and means for the prosecution of the war, may now, without affording the slightest ground for the charge of inconsistency, record their votes against the bill under consideration, even if there were no other reason for such votes.

But, sir, in considering the measures now recommended, with reference to their effects, we should not confine ourselves merely to the views officially expressed by the President. In looking to the consequences of our action here, we should not be unmindful of the "signs of the times," as they are indicated by resolutions offered in this chamber, by speeches and letters of distinguished members of the administration party here and elsewhere, by the expressions of popular opinion, and by the tone of a portion of the public press. These afford strong indications that something beyond the annexation of a portion of Mexican territory may be the consequence of the measures proposed, and of the further prosecution of the war.

It may be remarked, and indeed it must have struck every one, that we have never had any declaration from the war-making power of the objects of this war. We present to the world a strange spectacle—prosecuting, for nearly two years, a war, the objects of which, down to this moment, have not been declared by the war-making power, nor even, with any distinctness, by the Executive. We have carried on a "vigorous war" to obtain an honorable peace," and we are now carrying on this war to obtain "indemnity for the past and security for the future." Now, these words mean just what the author of them may choose to say they mean. They are indefinite; for, although they are broad enough to cover any thing, they in fact define nothing. We must, therefore, in ascertaining the objects and the possible consequences of this war, look to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of the chamber, who occupy high stations, and have great power and influence over the public mind. In forming our opinions in regard to the consequences likely to follow from the measures of the administration, it is proper to consider them in connection with the expressions of those who have been identified with its policy in this chamber and elsewhere. I have taken some pains to gather some of these evidences of opinion, and I feel satisfied, sir, that the question is eventually to be, whether we shall incorporate the whole of Mexico with these United States. I have in my hand a speech of the honorable Senator from Texas, who sits before me, [Mr. HOUSTON,] delivered at a great mass meeting, recently held in Tammany Hall, in the city of New York. And, sir, you will permit me here to remark, that we are not at liberty to value lightly the opinions of that gentleman, expressed on such meetings. They give a tone to public sentiment. They are dangerous, not merely from the effect they have upon the persons present on such occasions, but from the influence which they exercise upon the whole country through the medium of the public press.

I find that, on the occasion referred to, the honorable Senator said:

"You may escape the small pox, but you can never escape the contagion of land loving. As sure as you live, it will become a part of your nature. There is not an American man-birth but what lusts land. It is the fact, though I say so in my coarse and vulgar way. [The Senator uttered a great many 'Great Apostles.' Your ancestors, when they landed at Plymouth, upon the famous rock, were not long contented with that footing, or, but proceeded in their night, and went on prospecting at Jamestown as well as at Plymouth, till all the country was possessed by them. From the first moment they landed, they went on trading with the Indians, and obtaining their land. Now the Mexicans are no better than Indians, and I see no reason why we should not go on in the same course now, and take their land."

Well, sir, sentiments such as these, coming from so distinguished a personage, are calculated to have great weight. The example here held out for imitation cannot fail to have its effect. You love land, says the Senator. "There is not an American on earth but what loves land." Then, sir, the alleged example of our ancestors is appealed to. You have always acquired territory in this way; and in this way, you must get as much more as you can. Such is the tenor of the gentleman's remarks at that meeting. Sir, no great effort—no very strong arguments are required to persuade masses of people of the justice of measures which their interest makes them but too willing to pursue; and when this national land-loving propensity is held up as a sufficient justification, it would surprise us if it did not produce its natural effect. It excited "great applause." Sir, when the same meeting was addressed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] and after he had given his views upon the right of acquiring territory by conquest, he says:

"The enemy's country is in our possession; and what shall we do with it? You have declared what we shall do with it. You have declared by your resolutions what we shall do with it. We are not to withdraw our armies, for the present, at least. Well, suppose it turns out that Mexico will never be able again to make known as a separate national existence to the civilized world—that we shall have no government with which we can treat."

Then he asks "what shall we do with Mexico?" The response comes at once from the crowd—"annex it"—"annex it." The honorable Senator indeed said, "I am not prepared for that;" but, sir, it was evident that the minds of the people had been prepared for it.

This, sir, is not all. I have in my hand the resolutions presented by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. BAGBY,] one of which is as follows:

Resolved, That conquest is a legitimate mode of acquiring territory, and so recognized by the laws and the universal practice of civilized nations."

In connexion with this, and as indicating what the honorable Senator means, I beg leave to read an extract from a letter, said to be from him, which I find in a newspaper called the "Hannibal City Gazette," published on the 27th of January, 1848:

"SENATOR BAGBY UPON ANNEXATION. The United States Senator has written a letter to a gentleman in Tuscaloosa in favor of the annexation of all Mexico to the United States. He says:

'In every light which I can view the present condition of Mexico and our relations towards her, I am irresistibly led to the conclusion that there is no alternative left, but to reduce the country to absolute subjection, and extend the jurisdiction of our laws and institutions over it.'"

This language requires no comment. Again, sir, we have before us the resolutions of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON,] breathing the same spirit:

"Resolved, That true policy requires the government of the United States to strengthen its political and commercial relations upon the continent by the annexation of such contiguous territory as may conduce to that end, and can be justly obtained; and that neither in such acquisition, nor in the territorial organization thereof, can any conditions be constitutionally imposed, or institutions be provided for or established, inconsistent with the right of the people thereof to form a free sovereign State, with the powers and privileges of the original members of the confederacy.

"Resolved, That, in organizing a territorial government for territory belonging to the United States, the principles of self government, upon which our federative system rests, will be best promoted, the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthened, by leaving all questions concerning the domestic policy thereon to the legislatures chosen by the people thereof."

And to these the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. YULEE,] offers this amendment:

"That the territory belonging to, or which may be acquired by the United States, is the common property of the Union, and the sovereignty over the same vests in the people of the several States composing the Union.

"Resolved further, That the federal government has no delegated authority, nor the territorial community any inherent right, to exercise any legislative power upon the said territories by which the equal right of all the citizens of the United States to acquire and enjoy any part of the common property may be impaired or embarrassed."

And then we have the resolutions presented to this body by my friend, the Senator from Indiana:

"Resolved, That no treaty of peace can be made with Mexico, having a proper regard for the best interests of the United States, which does not establish as a boundary between the two nations the most suitable line for military defence.

"Resolved, That in no contingency can the United States consent to the establishment of a monarchical government within the limits of Mexico by the intervention of European power.

"Resolved, That it may become necessary and proper, as it is within the constitutional capacity of this government, for the United States to hold Mexico as a territorial appendage."

Well, Mr. President, it is true that honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber, who have discussed this bill upon this floor, have not, all of them, avowed their intention or desire to carry on this war for the purpose of conquering the whole of Mexico. Indeed, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs, [Mr. CASS,] disavows all such intention; whilst, however, he made the disavowal, he remarked that such a result might come, and if it should, he did not believe that even the absorption of the whole of Mexico "would kill us."

Again, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. SEVIER,] states, distinctly, his opinion that this issue may be forced upon the democratic party at the next Presidential election, and clearly avows that, should the alternative be the withdrawal of our troops altogether, without any acquisition of territory, or the subjugation of the entire Mexican territory, he goes for taking the whole of Mexico.

These are "the signs of the times," sir; these are opinions not lightly expressed; they emanate from no insignificant sources. They are operating upon the public mind, sir—who can doubt it? It was said on a former occasion, in this chamber, that it would be necessary to prepare the public mind for war. Perhaps, sir, it is now necessary to prepare the public mind for that, to hear which should awaken alarm in the breast of every American Senator. These apprehensions may be but shadows, sir; but "coming events cast their shadows before." If any gentleman in this Senate will look back to the period preceding the last Presidential election, and recall to his memory the condition of the question of the annexation of Texas, then, and compare it with the state of the question of the acquisition of the whole of Mexico now, he will, I think, see that the issue hinted at by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] will be the issue involved in the next Presidential contest. He will also see, sir, that all the expressions of opinion to which I have alluded are but preparations of the public mind for the agitation of that question, as the great issue upon which the democratic party intends to go into the next election of a Chief Magistrate.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to the consideration of the second question that I propose to discuss, which is the right of the government of the United States, in accordance with the spirit of our constitution, to hold foreign territory by the title of conquest alone. The constitution of our Union was framed for the government of the old United States, and the territory which they occupied or owned. It was framed by delegates from the States themselves, and adopted by the people; it was framed for an Anglo-Saxon race. Its powers were all delegated powers—and they are limited by the instrument itself. Its objects were all defined. It contemplated no acquisition of territory beyond the limits of the Union. True, the treaty-making power was therein given to the general government, as was also the war-making power, but it was for purposes essential to the efficiency of the instrument, which purposes are set forth with exactness in the preamble:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America."

These were the objects for which the constitution was framed—"to provide for the common defence, and to promote the general welfare," of the parties to the compact. It contemplates no extension of its benefits beyond the parties to the instrument. The power was given to Congress to admit new States; but, evidently, the power so granted had reference to new States erected within the old territory. This was the view taken at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and it continued to be entertained, until the period of the purchase of Louisiana by Mr. Jefferson, that purchase was never justified by its distinguished projector on the ground of its constitutionality, but purely and entirely upon the ground of the necessity of the case.

I propose to trace, as briefly as I can, the great departure that has taken place from the true intent of the constitution, in this respect, and to show how, step by step, we have at length arrived at the point where we claim for the United States the power to take and hold foreign territory, simply by the right of conquest. I have said that Mr. Jefferson himself justified the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, solely on the ground of necessity. It was indispensable to the growth and prosperity of the western portion of the States that an outlet, through the river Mississippi, should be obtained for their produce. When I speak of the doubtful power which was exercised in the formation of that treaty, I wish to be clearly understood, however, as not intending to depreciate or undervalue, in any degree, the vast advantages arising from it. There were no doubt very satisfactory reasons for the annexation of that large extent of country. But I was about to refer to the opinion of Mr. Jefferson on the subject. In his letter to Judge Breckenridge, in August, 1803, he says:

"This treaty must of course be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country, in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably be never again in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the constitution, approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the constitution. The legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized, what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian, investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory, and saying to him when of age, 'I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you;' you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty, however,

[illegible] dated August 30th, 1803:

[illegible] to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United [illegible] constitutional difficulty the better; and that it will be desirable for Congress to do [illegible]

[illegible] 7th, 1803 [illegible]

[illegible] into the Union new States, which should be formed out of the territory for which, and more [illegible] meant they might receive English, Ireland, Holland, &c., into it, which would be the case on your construction. When an instrument admits two constructions—the one safe, the other dangerous; the one precise, the other indefinite—I prefer that which is safe and precise. I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the [illegible] our powers boundless. Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. I am the same as to the opinion of those who consider the grant of the treaty making power as boundless. If it is, then we have no constitution. If it has bounds, they can be no others than the [illegible] operations permitted to the federal government, and gives all the powers necessary to carry these into execution. Whatever of these enumerated objects proper for a law, [illegible] the President and Senate may enter into the treaty; whatever is to be done by a judicial sentence, the judges may pass the sentence. Nothing is more likely than that their enumeration of powers is defective. This is the ordinary case of all human works. Let us go on, then, perfecting it, by adding, by way of amendment to the constitution, those powers which time and trial show are still wanting."

I am aware, sir, that these letters have heretofore been frequently referred to, but they have such a direct bearing on the subject I am considering, that I shall be excused for calling your attention to them at this time.

No, sir, was this, or the opinion of that distinguished statesman alone. Similar views, I am satisfied, were entertained by Mr. MADISON, and I know that the venerable JAMES MONROE always avowed and maintained the same opinions; and such indeed were the sentiments of many of our ablest and wisest statesmen at the time of the acquisition of Louisiana. General acquiescence, subsequently, seems to have made it a part of the constitution, that the treaty-making power may annex foreign territory to the United States.

[illegible] territory was that of Florida, which Senators will bear in mind, was also effected by treaty. Recently, and lastly, came the annexation of Texas. In this last instance, however, the treaty-making power having been appealed to in vain, a more summary mode of proceeding was adopted to evade the restrictions by which that power was trammelled. The two-third vote was found inconvenient by the friends of the measure, and recourse was had to annexation by joint resolution, whereby the new territory was made a part of our Union, and that, too, in this body, by a bare majority. Treaties require a two-third vote in the Senate, where the smaller States have equal weight with the larger; but if new territory can be annexed to the Union by a bare majority of both Houses, [illegible] members of the old confederacy, whose rights may thus be sacrificed by the addition of States, comparatively without population, [illegible] We had gone so far beyond the construction put upon the constitution by Mr. Jefferson, as to believe that the treaty-making power could annex foreign territory; but it has been, I think, but seldom contended that foreign territory could be annexed by any other mode. The federal constitution has been regarded as a compact between the original States, and, whatever the operation of the contract might be in other respects, the several States, be their size what it may, were to have an equal representation in this body. A vote of two-thirds being required to sanction a treaty for the acquisition of territory, there would always be something like safety in a treaty ratified by the Senate. When the proposition to annex [illegible] be obtained. But the democratic party at the Baltimore Convention had made annexation one of the great issues of the Presidential election, and it was necessary that the decrees of that convention should be carried into effect. The decree was accordingly executed in the shape of joint resolutions; and thus was the check and safeguard provided by the constitution broken down, and the new principle established, that foreign territory may be annexed by the passage of joint resolutions by the two Houses of Congress, with the approbation of the President. One would have thought that this was going quite far enough, and that we ought to pause here. But no, sir; we are now required to take another and a bolder step, and to recognize the principle that foreign territory—territory which has never been the property of this country—may be acquired and incorporated into the Union by the mere right of conquest. However barbarous this mode of acquisition may be, it cannot be denied that it has, to a certain extent, been recognized under other forms of government. But, sir, I do deny, that, under our constitutional compact, under the bond entered into by the States with each other, permanent acquisition of territory can thus be made.

I will not trespass further upon the time of the Senate by dwelling on this branch of my subject, but will now proceed, sir, to consider the third question, upon which I propose to make a few remarks—the expediency of the proposed annexation of new territory, beyond the limits of our present possessions.

The annexation of any portion of Mexico to this Union is, in my opinion, to be deprecated, first, and principally, because we can effect no annexation without raising a question which we cannot but consider the most dangerous that can possibly be agitated in this country. I refer to the question of slavery. On this subject, sir, we have before us resolutions from various States, expressing their decided opposition to the extension of the area of slavery, which may, and probably will follow, and be consequent upon, any acquisition of Mexican territory. I am aware that the policy indicated by these resolutions, and by the Wilmot Proviso, as it is called, has been termed an "aggressive policy," on the part of the free States. In behalf of those States, at any rate the one from which I come, I beg leave to deny that the policy can, justly, be termed "aggressive." It is the course indicated by a due regard to their safety and the protection of their rights and interests.

The ordinance of 1787, made under the old confederation, was intended to settle, and regarded as settling, the whole question, as to the States of this Union in which slavery should be permitted to exist. This was the ordinance, forever "unalterable but by common consent," in full force when the constitution was framed and adopted. The constitution was ratified with reference to it. It was regarded as a part of the compact, and one of the early acts of the first Congress under that constitution was a recognition, or, rather, adoption of it, as an existing fundamental law.

Among the most important subjects of discussion in the convention which formed the constitution was the distribution of power among the States. The representation of the slave population was a matter of compromise between the States. Neither the free nor slaveholding States looked to the acquisition of any territory beyond the limits of the States and territory then in existence. To that compromise we conscientiously adhere. We hold fast to the spirit and intent of the constitution. We have already submitted to the introduction of new States, in which slavery is tolerated, which have been created out of foreign territory, and which were never contemplated by the framers of the constitution. We have recently acquiesced in an addition to our slaveholding territory, by the annexation of Texas, larger than eight or nine of the old thirteen States, and out of which new States are to be created.

We say to the South, we can go no further. The free States take their stand upon ground. We want no more territory. We have had enough of the introduction of new slaveholding States from foreign territory, acquired since the adoption of the constitution. We cannot consent to go beyond the point at which we have already arrived. Our views upon this question are different from yours; we claim to be as conscientious as you; we regard slavery as a great moral evil, and cannot consent to its further extension. We regard the institution of slavery, not only as a moral evil, but we look upon it, also, as a great political evil. The people of the southern States are represented in Congress, not according to their population, but in accordance with the amount of their property. This is a political evil, to the increase of which we cannot consent.

On the other hand, gentlemen tell us that a restriction will never be submitted to by the South. Each party is equally positive, and conceding that both are equally honest in the assertion of what they conceive to be their rights, is it not evident, that, with the feelings which are manifested on this subject, you hazard the safety of the Union, by the contemplated addition to your limits.

I have before referred to the resolutions and amendment of the Senators from New York and Florida, [Mr. DICKINSON and Mr. YULEE,] on this subject, and already, in anticipation of what is looked for as the result of this war, has this question been debated here. What, then, I would ask, sir, is the true and patriotic course for us to pursue? Why, to acquire no more territory, and thus avoid this element of strife and discord. You have already territory enough, extending itself throughout every variety of soil and climate. God has blessed you with what is sufficient—why then do you desire to add to your wide possessions? Will it enhance your power and importance as a nation? No, sir; years, if not centuries, must roll by, before your population can occupy the territory which you now possess. Then why adopt a course that cannot fail to agitate our Union to its very centre? Why, sir, I would ask, shall we force upon ourselves this fearful issue? For myself, I can see no possible good that can arise from it, whilst, on the other hand, I cannot avoid seeing that it is pregnant with mischief, and fraught with evils of the most dangerous and appalling character.

But, sir, there is another and, perhaps, not much less important point of view, in which this matter is to be regarded. Looking to the probability that we are to be encumbered with the whole of Mexico; that "manifest destiny," or some other equally potent cause, is to [illegible] —looking to the probability of such being the result of the measures proposed by the President of the United States, I am led to another consideration. There are in Mexico, with a population of 8,000,000, about 5,000,000 of Indians. These Indians, sir, are free men, and under our form of government must be permitted to enjoy the rights which belong to freemen. They are, it must be granted, an ignorant and uncultivated race; but what of that? You cannot, on that account, refuse them the exercise and enjoyment of these rights. This reasoning, it will be borne in mind, applies to a portion, as well as to the whole of Mexico. Annex them, sir, and make them a portion of your confederacy, and what will you do with them? Besides these five millions of Indians, you will perhaps have two millions more, belonging to the mixed races, or castes, as they are called, varying in color and possessing every variety of complexion. What will you do with this population? Will our friends from the South agree that this portion of your American population, as it will then be, shall have all the rights of freemen conferred upon them? Are they prepared for this; and are they ready to endow them, among other rights, with the right of being eligible to seats in the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator desires a reply, I would say that I should be wholly unwilling to confer upon them political rights at present; and, I will add, that since 1835, not a single one of them has been in the enjoyment of those rights.

Mr. GREENE.—I believe the authorities differ upon that point. However, be that as it may, it is unnecessary to discuss that question at present. The honorable Senator would not have them on this floor immediately, but it would come to this result eventually. You must give them the rights of citizens, and it matters but little whether it be done now, or twenty years hence. They will not, in the meanwhile, change their complexions, their habits, nor their natures, although they may be somewhat better informed.

I do not know what term of probation they would have to submit to, but one thing I do know, which is, that if you annex these people by conquest, or by treaty, and do not extend to them the rights of other citizens, you violate one of the principles which lie at the foundation of our free institutions—one of the earliest principles avowed by the framers of our constitution—the right of self-government. Will you deny to them this right? You cannot do so. I would be an utter violation, I repeat, of the great principle upon which this government is based, that all government is of the people and emanates from them. To deny to these people the rights of citizens, would be an outrage upon the principles on which our revolution was founded.

Mr. SEVIER.—Do I understand the honorable Senator to say, that there are two millions of blacks in Mexico? There are but 6,000 negroes.

Mr. GREENE.—My authority is the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BELL.—The Senator was speaking of castes.

Mr. SEVIER.—In regard to the negroes and Indians, they have never exercised the right of voting; they are prohibited by the constitution, unless they have been taxed.

Mr. GREENE.—In some instances a property qualification is required.

Mr. FOOTE.—According to Mr. Jefferson, as cited by the Senator from Rhode Island, it was inexpedient to permit any but "the white inhabitants" to enjoy the rights of citizenship in Louisiana. He is the Senator of one of the [illegible] with his own chosen posterity?

Mr. GREENE.—The Senator may have so understood me, but, if he were acquainted with the history of my political life, he would not suppose that I concurred with Mr. Jefferson in every thing. I do concur in some of the views which he has expressed in regard to the constitution; but, I must say, that I have agreed but seldom with him upon matters of state policy. I referred to him as being high authority, and particularly on account of his having been the projector of the acquisition of Louisiana. I also referred to Mr. Adams, and other great men of that period. I gave these opinions, coming from different sources, in order to show you the doubts which then existed, with reference to the power of making additions to the established limits of our country.

But, sir, one of the projects under contemplation seems to be, to hold Mexico as a "territorial appendage." I will not anticipate what my honorable friend from Indiana has to say upon that subject. I have simply to remark, that if you attempt to hold any portion of Mexico by conquest, it involves the necessity of keeping on foot a large standing army. No one will reflect for an instant on the character of the people of Mexico, can suppose that you will be able to hold that country as you do Louisiana and Florida. The possession of their territory will make it necessary to keep up a standing army, which standing army cannot be less than the force with which you have conquered the whole country.

A single word now, sir, in reference to the proposed increase of the army, and I shall cease to occupy your time and attention. I say then, sir, that according to the view which I have taken of this question, the increase of the army, as proposed by the bill under consideration, would tend to make the difficulties of our position greater than they now are, and to protract the war. You have in Mexico at present an army of about 45,000 men, and you have the power, under existing laws, to enlist an additional force of 8,000. Without this bill you have authority then, already, to keep an army of over 50,000 men in Mexico. With a force of 12,000 men, you have conquered a great portion, and the most valuable portion too, of her territory. This is, I believe, about the number of troops that were landed at Vera Cruz. With an army of only 6,000 men, you have entered and become possessed of her capital. Her government is entirely prostrated and powerless—her army is dispersed—she has no power to raise money, and no spirit to raise men—and, in the face of all this, you now ask authority to organize ten new regiments of regulars and twenty of volunteers, to enable you to retain possession of that which you have acquired, and to make further conquests.

It appears to me, sir, perfectly evident, that this increase cannot be necessary for any legitimate object; any object, at least, in promoting which I can concur. If you persevere and subjugate the rest of Mexico, and annihilate even the shadow of a government that is left to her, with whom are you to negotiate? What power on her part will there be to make a treaty? You can institute no authority which can give any sort of permanence to any treaty that may be made with you. You may, it is true, send out your armies and take possession of the remaining States; but of what avail will it be, unless you continue your military occupation of them? These, sir, are questions which force themselves upon our attention. You will not have a peace, but you will have the whole of Mexico; and, as the Senator from Mississippi very properly asked, "what will you do with it?" I am very much afraid, sir, that honorable Senators on the other side of the chamber will have so prepared the public mind for such a state of things—will have so encouraged the land-loving disposition, which, we are told, is so irresistible in its power, and so characteristic of our countrymen, that when our people are asked what shall be done with it, the answer of too many of them will be—"annex it," "annex it." Of all evils that can befall this country, Mr. President, this, in my opinion, would be the greatest. Regarding it as such, and looking to the probability of such a result, growing out of the measures proposed by the Executive, I cannot sanction these measures. I would vote, as readily as any gentleman on this floor, for any supplies of men and means necessary for the safety of the gallant spirits who compose the army, did I believe them to be in any danger. I shrink from no responsibility that may be incurred in taking proper care of them; but under the present aspect of affairs, it is not my intention, nor do I think I can be induced, by any consideration, to vote for any increase of the military force of the country.

Mr. MASON took the floor, and moved that the Senate adjourn—but afterwards withdrew the motion.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Nye, assignee of Peter Bargy and Hugh Stewart, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

INVIOLABILITY OF FRANKS.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

[illegible]

Mr. BADGER asked for its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BADGER.—I desire to make a single remark by way of showing the necessity for the adoption of this resolution. As the law at present stands all letters and packages, under the weight of two ounces, may be sent and received by members of Congress free of postage. The Post Office Department has introduced a proviso into this law, providing that members who frank letters and documents shall also direct them. This is an unwarranted interference. It is a proviso not contained in the law. It is a serious inconvenience, and, in my humble opinion, is a gross indignity to members of this body. A gentleman, who is a member of the other House, showed me, to-day, a package which he had sent to his sister at school. The frank had been stricken off, and postage charged, although both the frank and the direction were written by himself, as he tells me, with different pens.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Postmaster General has rectified this matter some days since. It will do no harm to any body, but there is no necessity for any action. Some days since, I was informed, letters written for me, and at my request, and on my business, public and private, by a friend and constituent who was here, because directed by him, though franked by me, were charged with postage, and my frank erased. I felt indignant at it as an outrage. On enquiry, I found the same rule had been adopted as to all members of Congress. Supposing it was the fault of the city Postmaster, or his clerks, I called at the General Post Office, to have them instructed properly; and the Postmaster General being away, I saw Mr. Brown, the first assistant, and complained of the erasure as unlawful. Subsequently, a few days ago, the city Postmaster informed me that he had received instructions to let all franked letters and documents pass, whether directed by the person franking or not.

Mr. BADGER.—Documents, no—etc.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—No, not—letters and documents both. I was particular in my enquiry, and he expressly told me the instances—one applied to both.

Mr. BADGER.—All that is desired to be attained by the resolution now presented is, that we shall all stand upon the same footing as the Senator from Florida. If it has been rectified in regard to him, let it be so generally.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I merely rise to state that perhaps I have as much reason to complain of post-office regulations as any member of this body. I have suffered from them greviously. When I was a member of the other house, my constituents were, on one occasion, charged six hundred dollars for their speeches which I franked to them. It was done in this way: I wrote the frank and got my wife to direct them; I left the city in the morning, and, as I was afterwards told, the speeches were not sent to the post office until the next day. The franks were all erased, and those to whom they were sent were charged a dollar and a quarter postage on each, amounting to about six hundred dollars. Thus this amount was taken from my district by the assumption of the post office to degrade me by refusing my frank. The envelopes, a great many of them, were sent back to me to show the abuse that had been practiced by the post office. I have made it a rule, since I have been in Congress, never to frank for others. During the last summer, conceiving that I had a right to send and receive all my letters, free of postage, I franked those which I sent to Louisville, and I was afterwards informed that the franks were erased and postage charged regularly. Another gentleman has told me that he was served in the same way. It is a palpable misconstruction of the law; and it is really time that we should take the subject under our consideration and prescribe a remedy.

Mr. CASS.—What is the purpose of the resolution? Is it an enquiry whether the law has been violated?

Mr. BADGER.—The object is to change the law and render it more explicit.

Mr. CASS.—Why the law is clear in it itself, is it not?

At the request of several Senators the resolution was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I really doubt the propriety of adopting this resolution. There is no authority, as I understand, by which the Postmaster General is authorized to put such a construction as he may think proper upon a law of Congress. The resolution ought to be in the form of an assertion of our rights.

Mr. BADGER.—I will cheerfully concur in any resolution which the honorable Senator from South Carolina may think proper to propose in regard to this matter, which will secure to us our rights. And I will go further, and express a clear and decided condemnation of the practice on the part of any officers of this government of not only interpreting our laws in a way to suit their own views, but of amending them. I would make it an offence, punishable in a high degree, upon prosecution in the Courts of the United States, in case any Postmaster should dare to charge postage upon letters that are franked by those who are entitled to the franking privilege.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I submit to the honorable Senator, whether or not the right exists on the part of any officer of the government to put his own interpretation upon a law of Congress. I am not aware that it is so. I would suggest as the proper course to be pursued, to call upon the Postmaster General to state upon what principle it is that he gives the construction to the law which he has given; and after we have received a reply from him, then let a resolution be passed indicative of the sense of this body in regard to it.

Mr. SEVIER.—I think that if Senators will take the trouble to look at the law, they will find that the Postmaster has done exactly what the law requires, yet I am in favor of the resolution. I had my attention called to this subject last year. I had occasion to send a letter to Alexandria. The Postmaster there disregarded my frank; I wrote him rather a warm letter; and he came up and took the trouble to look out the provisions of the law, and the result was that I apologised for the trouble I had given him. If Senators will look at the law, I think they will be satisfied that the construction given to it is right; and I admit that it ought to be modified, for it is impossible for us in all cases to direct our documents ourselves.

Mr. BADGER.—I think that the Senator is under a misapprehension. An alteration has been made in regard to the franking privilege by an act of last session.

Mr. BADGER quoted from the act.

Mr. NILES.—I concur entirely with the Honorable Senator from South Carolina. My opinion is that the law is correctly construed, and that probably it will be right to remove the difficulty which the Senator has alluded to by an enactment. If the department has given an illiberal construction to the law it may be necessary to pass a declaratory act. I know how the law was formerly, as I had the honor to be for a short time in the department. The question has never been considered there as turning upon the circumstances of directing the letters or packages; it has been placed on a more substantial foundation, and that is whose act is the sending of the document? If a document is sent and the department is satisfied that it cannot be the act of the person whose frank it bears, postage is very properly charged. The mere fact of getting another individual to do the writing however does not change the act so far as the sending the letter or the document is concerned; it remains the act of the person franking it, and has always been so regarded. I apprehend that the law is right as it is; but I have no objection to enquire whether any amendment may be made, though I would not assume that it is wrong.

Mr. FOOTE earnestly deprecated adjudication without investigation. He hoped that the Senate would never despise the great principle of justice embodied in the saying—"strike but first hear me."—

The resolution was then agreed to.

CHEROKEE COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. BAGBY submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to [illegible] to the Senate the [illegible] by the commissioners of the United States to the Cherokee nation of Indians.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating agreeably to law, a report of the Second Comptroller, showing the appropriations, under the direction of the department, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1847; the amount drawn from the treasury; and the balances on the 1st July, 1847; which was read and ordered to be printed.

CONSUL BLACK.

The bill for the relief of John Black, late Consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

On motion

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by MR. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have agreed to the amendments of the Senate, to a bill "for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of John Paul Jones," with amendment to which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

JOHN PAUL JONES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the House of Representatives, to the bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones.

The amendments having been read—

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, moved that the bill be referred to the committee

Mr. HANNEGAN said that the bill did not originate in the committee this year, and in the peculiar circumstances of the case was passed without reference, having passed both Houses last session, and failed to become a law in consequence of being accidentally lost in the lobby on the way to the President for his signature. Owing to the courtesy, not to say a sense of justice of the Senate, it was passed this session without being subjected to the usual form of reference to a committee. The claim itself had undergone a strict investigation on these occasions. Twice had it been the subject of a favorable report, and it had again passed the House by a large vote in its favor. The amendments were entirely immaterial, being merely verbal. There was only one that had any substance, and that made an exception against the heirs of Capt. Landrey, who have received their share of the original claim. He hoped that the Senator from Massachusetts would withdraw his motion in order that he might be enabled to move the concurrence of the Senate in the amendments of the House.

Mr. DAVIS was quite aware that this bill had received the action of the Senate in the form in which it passed at the last session. Still he was not able to understand the bearing of the amendments which had been read. He could not determine without some examination whether they were important or not; therefore, without entertaining any hostile feeling to the bill or any desire to delay its final passage, he believed that it had better be examined by a committee; at least that was his impression, although if the Senate thought otherwise he should not insist on his motion.

Mr. HANNEGAN then rose, but yielded to

Mr. BENTON, who inquired if the motion was withdrawn?

Mr. DAVIS replied in the negative, and added that it would not be unless the general sense of the Senate opposed it.

Mr. BENTON then said that it would not be withdrawn by the unanimous sense of the Senate, for he would object to the withdrawal of the motion. This was a case seventy years old—approaching very close to that—and within the last two or three sessions had had, at least, a rapid passage through the two Houses. Now he was told by old Senators when he came there, that he should distrust any thing that went rapidly and unanimously, and their philosophical reasoning was, that the human mind was so various in its conclusions, that if any case were fully stated and presented in all its bearings, there would be difference of opinion in regard to it, and that, therefore, when a case passed rapidly through a legislative body the presumption was that it had not been fully stated and attentively examined. He was not in his seat when this bill was called up and passed through the Senate, without the observance of the usual forms. Had he been in his place upon that occasion, he should have moved that it be subjected to all those forms which the wisdom of legislators had provided for the protection of the public interests, and for ensuring sound and wholesome legislation. Now, with respect to the merits of this claim he knew nothing. But he did know one thing; that our ancestors, the men of the revolution, were just men. He doubted neither their justice nor their patriotism. They were also wise men. The men of the revolution constituted a body of men rarely seen on the face of the earth—rarely equalled in the justice, wisdom and moderation of all their doings. They who lived during the revolution, and were cognizant of all that occurred during that period, soon after that event—each State within itself, and the general government by assuming an amount perhaps exceeding all just demands against it—settled every just claim upon them, and they settled precisely as every man settles who is just, and at the same time, poor. They settled all accounts against them, and if they could not pay they gave their notes. Certificates were given in every case in which they thought that any thing was due; and his reading led him to say, that in the general assumpsit which took place about the year '94, an amount over and above what was due was assumed and allowed for the purpose of covering every thing which generosity even, not to speak of justice, demanded. That was his understanding of the closing up of the affairs of the revolution, and with that understanding, he looked with extreme suspicion upon any claim that was now presented. In the first place, such a claim was nothing less than an impeachment of the integrity of the men of that day; if not of their integrity, at all events, of their knowledge of their own transactions; and assumed that they of the third generation knew the transactions of their grandfathers better than they did at the time when these transactions took place! He asked what would become of Senators, if, at the end of sixty or seventy years, their children should be called upon to pay any demand which might be then brought up against their ancestors? How would Senators meet a claim presented against them, for transactions sixty or seventy years ago, on the part of their grandfathers? There must be some end to this business. Every generation was charged with the management of its own business. He did not say that they should have exactly a statute of limitation, but he said that that principle must go into the affairs of the whole community, otherwise nothing public or private—nothing between man and man, or nation and nation, could ever be regarded as settled. It was a just principle, that they who lived at the time, and were cognizant of the transaction, were the proper persons to settle the case. There was great danger in posterity attempting to open transactions which had been passed upon by preceding generations He hoped that the bill would be referred and examined, and that it would be subjected to every form which the wisdom of legislators had devised for the purpose of protecting the public interests and securing sound and wholesome legislation.

Mr. HANNEGAN desired to inquire, before replying to the Senator from Missouri, whether it required the unanimous consent of the Senate, or simply a majority, in order to obtain a consideration of the amendments without reference?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.—A majority is sufficient.

Mr. HANNEGAN then proceeded to say that the opposition of the Senator from Missouri to this bill appeared to rest on a very singular foundation, for he had assigned no reason for the opposition, except the age of the claim, telling the Senate that he distrusted any claim which presented itself, if it happened to be sixty or seventy years old. The Senator had remarked that the men of the revolution were eminently wise and eminently just, and that they took care to protect every good claim against the government of that time, by the issue of certificates. Well, no one valued more highly the character of our revolutionary fathers than he himself—no one cherished greater veneration for their memory—no one rendered more willing homage to their justice and sagacity. But it was to be presumed that the history of the country was intelligible to those who read it, and as he had stated, committees of both branches of Congress as he had stated, had examined the history so far it related to this claim, and had pronounced the claim to be just. That body had unanimously pronounced it just. Two committees of that body, after a most thorough investigation, had pronounced it just. The bill had twice passed the Senate without a division. It had passed the House of Representatives three times, by an almost overwhelming vote. The closest vote yet given on the bill, had been that of Friday last in the House, and on that occasion, according to the report in the papers, there was a majority in its favor of twenty-two, after the most strenuous exertions against it. It was the singular history of the bill, at the last session, which alone exempted it from the usual forms on its introduction, at the commencement of the present session. A sense of justice and of propriety—a sense of honor and of honesty, induced the Senate, by a unanimous vote, during the first week of the session, to exempt this bill from those ordinary forms of legislation, which he would be the last man to undervalue, or lightly disregard. In point of fact, the bill was a law, if ever there was a law in the eye of God, and an upright tribunal on earth; and hence it was, that the Senate did unanimously place it in the same position in which it was at the close of the last session of Congress. It then wanted only the last form prescribed by the Constitution, the signature of the President, to become technically, as it was substantially the law of the land. It was lost on its way from the desk of the Secretary to the chamber in the Capitol, in which the President was engaged in attaching his signature to the bill, which had been passed by Congress. If ever any claim had been subjected to the rigorous examination and scrutiny of Congress, this was that claim; and if ever the prosecution of a claim resulted in unhappy consequences to the individual concerned, it was in this case. He had no doubt that the fate of the bill, brought to an untimely grave, one of the most accomplished and famous gentlemen that he had ever met with in the whole course of his life. That interesting man had set his heart upon the publication of his cherished legacy of letters, which he sought at the hands of Congress—how the reader will be able to judge ultimately—that he had devoted all his energies, all his time, all his means. After two years of indomitable labor on his part, and at the very moment that the cup approached his lips, the rude hand of fate dashed it in atoms to the earth! The shock was too much for him, and he sank into the grave leaving a helpless family. Such were the circumstances in which the Senate had seen proper to avoid the ordinary rules of legislation, and give the bill a direct passage on the [illegible] of the claim, which was on the files of both Houses. It gave compensation, indemnity for prizes captured by the renowned naval hero—the world-famous Paul Jones—captured by him from the British government in the war of the revolution and under the direction of Dr. Franklin, then our commissioner in France.—These prizes were carried to the port of Bergen, in Norway, under the dominion of Denmark. Denmark, in violation of the law of nations, on the demand of England, yielded up those prizes to that power, and made herself justly amenable to the captors for the amount of prize money. Dr. Franklin himself assessed the value of the captured vessels, and that valuation was now before them. It was admitted, and was all that was asked, neither more nor less, without a cent of interest. The government of the United States took the matter in hand, and faltered and trifled with it, as it was in the habit of doing in the case of claims against foreign governments, thus depriving the individual claimants of the means of prosecuting their claims. Indeed, the cowardly French, man who betrayed Jones in the most famous of his actions, long since received his share of the prize money, but the descendants of the true hero till this day had not received a solitary cent. This bill proposed give to the heirs that which Paul Jones was himself entitled to seventy years ago, without one cent of interest. He trusted that the Senate would, without hesitation, notwithstanding the objection urged with respect to the age of the claim, concur in the amendment, and at once pass the bill.

Mr. CAMERON remarked that he was a member of the committee to whom the case had been formerly referred, and he had satisfied himself that the claim was just. The Senate was also satisfied of its justice and passed the bill by an almost unanimous vote. In his opinion the only objection advanced against the bill which was presented by the Senator from Missouri, furnished the strongest argument in its favor. If justice had been delayed in this case for a period of seventy years, that was surely one of the most powerful reasons why justice should be promptly rendered now. There was not a gentleman present, there was scarcely a man in the country, who did not know of some case, standing from the time of the revolution till this day, unsettled. It was true that the men of the revolution were just—no body of men that ever existed were more [illegible] they were too noble too poor to be generous, but to pay their debts. The debts of the revolution were left to be discharged when the country would be able to liquidate them. He himself knew of thousands of dollars worth of the continental money which lay locked up in old chests in his own state, which had never been liquidated. The country made a compromise, but he believed now as he had always believed that it was discreditable to them. But the strong argument in favor of this bill was that it had passed through all the forms of legislation and accidentally failed to receive the signature of the President and thereby become a law. It passed after a full investigation. If the Senate refused to pass it now, it placed the bill within the reach of accident again. He could not believe—he did not know till that moment that any one would have looked at this as anything more than a matter of form. He hoped the bill would be passed immediately.

Mr. BAGBY said, that it appeared to him that the Senators from Indiana and Pennsylvania had both mistaken the true point at issue with regard to this bill. He did not understand that the merits of the claim of the heirs of Paul Jones were at all involved in the proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts. The distinct and simple question before the Senate was, whether that was a deliberative body or not, and whether the usual forms of legislation were to be adhered to, or be overthrown and lost sight of. He did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to be opposed to the bill on its merits; on the contrary, that Senator had distinctly stated that he did not at present inquire into the merits of the bill. But it must be obvious, he contended, to all who have at all observed the transaction of business in that body, whether with regard to old or new claims, that they were falling into a very loose, careless, and in his humble conception, improper practise. Although both of his friends on his right, [Mr. HANNEGAN and Mr. CAMERON,] belonged to the junior members of the body in point of years; yet it was supposed that Senators were of that advanced age which ensured deliberation before they came there; and now what was the argument advanced? Why, that because this bill had slept for three quarters of a century, and because it passed at the very last hour of the last session; that, therefore, it was to be taken up post-haste, and carried through the body. If the bill possessed one iota of the merit attributed to it by both his friends on his right—and he did not question that it did—where was the danger of subjecting it to the usual ordeal of legislation? He did not, as he had said, at all enter into the merits of the bill; he took it for granted that its passage was prima facie evidence that the claim was a good one; but he maintained the principle that the character of the body as a deliberative assembly required that every measure, especially one which had lain for three score years and ten, should be subjected to the ordinary [illegible] examination.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It has been knocking at the doors of Congress since 1803!

Mr. BAGBY.—No doubt; but he would rather have this or any other claim lie over till next session, than the established forms of this body should be disregarded from day to day. He insisted on the strict adherence to the usual forms of legislation in this as in all other cases.

Mr. MANGUM remarked, that the only difficulty which he perceived in this case arose out of the fact, that the bill at the session was not reported by a committee at all, for if it had been reported he had no doubt it would have passed that chamber, and that then having also passed the House of Representives with amendments, it would on its return, in case the amendments should have been regarded as immaterial by its friends, have been at once passed upon by the Senate. Not having been reported, however, a little more strength was given to the proposition that it should be referred to a committee. Yet, what was to be gained by a reference? The only question now remaining was on the amendments of the House, which did not open the merits of the bill—not at all—and those who had charge of it had represented that the amendments were merely verbal, except one which was not of much importance, and even if it were concurred in and it should turn out that injustice had been done to any branch of the family, redress was easily to be obtained by an application to Congress. He knew that this case had undergone a very thorough examination on its merits, not in that chamber, but by a committee who sat upon it week after week and week after week. It was well known to honorable Senators, that it was utterly impossible for any member of this or any other legislative body to become intimately acquainted with the merits of such cases from personal examination. It was necessary that they should trust to their organs, the committees. In this case the committee had repeatedly examined the case, and reported favorably. He believed that the Senate would stultify itself in the eyes of the country if, after a solemn adjudication, it should refer the bill again to a committee, where it merits would not be at all open, and the amendments were admitted to be quite immaterial. Even if it were possible that under the influence of feeling they might go a little further than strict justice, yet the consideration that this was a just claim, which had lain unsettled for more than half a century, ought to be allowed some weight. Besides, their means were now abundant, for he understood that the war with Mexico had ceased. He hoped, then, that there would be no unwillingness to do full justice to the claims of the descendants of one who not only rendered important service in the revolutionary struggle, but by his great achievements, had added to the renown of the American name.

Mr. BADGER said he had voted for the passage of the bill at the last session, and had voted for a similar bill this session. But he could not suppose that it should be passed immediately in consequence of the statements made by the honorable Senator from Indiana, as he thought it proper now to refer it to the committee. Had the question on concurrence been presented, he would have at once voted in favor of the bill; but he felt that there was a necessity of referring the subject to the committee, if any Senator desired the reference. He believed that his honorable colleague was quite correct that the merits of the case were not involved; yet that did not furnish any reason why the reference should not be made. The long session was before them, and he could not see why the ordinary course should be resisted when it was demanded. He hoped that his friend from Indiana would yield and allow the reference.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, wished to assure the Senate that nothing was more opposed to his view than any purpose of unnecessary delay. He had no desire to interpose the slightest obstacle to the passage of the bill, and yet as he was somewhat responsible for the motion to refer, he wished to say a word in reference to his purpose in making the motion. The business was in such confusion at the close of last session that the bill had fallen under the table and was there lost.

Mr. HANNEGAN begged to inform the Senator that the bill had long previously passed the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS said he knew that, and that it had been brought to receive the signature of the Vice President.

Mr. HANNEGAN stated that it did receive that officer's signature, and that it was on the way to the Executive chamber that it was lost.

Mr. DAVIS.—The bill did not become a law. Now he did not complain of the rapidity with which the bill passed; all that he wished was to secure proper examination of the amendments which it had now received in the House. The object in organizing the committee was to secure deliberation. The remark made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MANGUM,) showed the necessity of deliberate examination. That gentleman had said that if injustice was done by any of the amendments, redress could be obtained on application to Congress. Now it was irresponsible the necessity of any such subsequent legislation that he wished it referred to the committee.

Mr. BENTON then observed that all he had to say with regard to this claim which had been represented as long pending, as a "continual" claim, he knew nothing whatsoever. He did not know that it had passed and been lost accidentally, till after the close of last session. All that might have been owing to his not attending to the business of the Senate, but such was the fact. Now he would go further and say that he never knew what the bill was for, nor what it was about—he knew nothing of the foundation of the claim till yesterday, when his attention was drawn to it by a speech of a member of the House—Mr. Starkweather—which that gentleman had sent to him, and which he had read, as he read all the speeches of that gentleman, with attention. It was thus that he had become acquainted with the nature of the claim, and he made this statement merely for the purpose of excluding himself from the supposition that he had given this bill proper consideration when it was before the Senate. The application at present was to give the bill a reference to the proper committee, and that perhaps would afford him an opportunity of requesting that committee to inquire whether Paul Jones had any heirs. It had been his custom from his childhood to read every thing relating to the revolution, and he thought he knew something about the men of the revolution. Everything connected with these men was worthy of careful examination. Yet he did not know that Paul Jones had any heirs. Perhaps the committee would find that out. He hoped that the reference would be made.

Mr. HANNEGAN said he would not detain the Senate by making any observations, and would merely read the amendments, contenting himself with a single remark in reply to the allusion of the Senator from Missouri to the fact, that Paul Jones had no heirs. The report had an entirely different statement, and he believed that according to the laws of descent a man could have heirs and direct heirs without having had children. The children of his brothers and sisters were his heirs. The grandchildren of his brothers and sisters were his heirs in the eye of the law. That was the case in the present instance. He then read the amendments, and added, that it would be seen that they were as he had represented them, entirely immaterial.

Mr. BRADBURY remarked, that the Senator from Indiana had alluded to the fact that this bill had once passed the Senate unanimously. He was himself present on that day early in the session, on which the bill was passed without being subjected to the usual forms, and had supposed that the case was one so clear, so well settled, one about which there could be no doubt, that as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Indiana, he had readily yielded to his request and voted for its immediate passage. Since that time he had had occasion to look into the case and he confessed that he was unable again to vote in favor of the bill on its meits out of courtesy to any Senator. The Senator from Indiana, had on the present occasion alluded to one fact to which he wished to call the attention of the Senate. That Senator had gone into the merits of the bill, and alledged that the United States government had deprived the claimants of the means of prosecuting their claims against a foreign government. The Senator then placed that claim on the ground that the United States government had interposed between the claimant and the foreign government, and had itself assumed the claim. In looking into the facts of the case, he found that the treaty with Denmark did not exactly warrant that conclusion; and he hoped that the reference would be made, in order that an opportunity might be offered of investigating the matter. If the claim were just, he would be very happy to vote in favor of the bill. If it were not just, he could not conscientiously vote for it; and in these circumstances he wished that the bill might be subjected to the usual forms of legislation, in order that it might be acted on with coolness and deliberation.

Mr. CASS said he hoped the bill would be passed over informally, in order that the special order might be taken up.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—"Question."

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the bill to the committee, and it was agreed to.

ILLNESS OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. BENTON rose, and with great feeling, said: I am called on to make a painful announcement to the Senate. I have just been informed that the House of Representatives has this instant adjourned under the most afflictive circumstances. A calamitous visitation has fallen on one of its oldest and most valuable members—one who has been President of the United States, and whose character has inspired the highest respect and esteem. Mr. ADAMS has just sunk down in his chair, and has been carried into an adjoining room, and may be at this moment passing from the earth, under the roof that covers us, and almost in our presence. In these circumstances the whole Senate will feel alike, and feel wholly unable to attend to any business. I, therefore, move the immediate adjournment of the Senate.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1848

The journal having been read—

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose and said, that he was informed the House of Representatives had met and instantly adjourned in consequence of the continued and dangerous illness of Mr. ADAMS, who still lay within these walls in a very perilous condition. Mr. ADAMS, he said, had attained to a great age, and had been greatly distinguished among the illustrious men of the country; and he hoped, under the circumstances which existed, the motion he was about to make would meet with the approbation of the Senate. It seemed to him that the anxieties of the moment, as well as veneration for one who had so long been an important colaborer in our councils, in a measure unfitted us for deliberation. He therefore moved that the Senate do now adjourn; which was agreed to without dissent.

The Senate then adjourned

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary.

SUSPENSION OF ACTIVE MILITARY OPERATIONS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That it be [illegible] to inform the Senate whether the active operations of the army of the United States in Mexico have been suspended, pending the negotiations for peace; and if so, at what period, and upon what authority such suspension took place.

THE ACT OF NINETY-NINE.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to repeal the [illegible] act of [illegible], and in addition to the following, viz, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, &c., That [illegible]

"Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to abridge the right of individual citizens of the United States to apply, by themselves, or their lawful agents, to any foreign government, or the agents thereof, for the relief of any injuries in relation to person or property which such individuals may have sustained from such government or any of its agents, citizens or subjects.

"Approved January 30, 1799."

and [illegible] necessary, by order or otherwise, to protect the rights and interests of the people of the United States against encroachments which may result from the assumption of any individual or individuals, without authority, to act in the name or behalf of the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, with any foreign government or department or officer thereof, or any individual or individuals assuming to be such foreign government or department or officer thereof, and especially in matters of Peace and War.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be, and the same is hereby removed from all past proceedings of the Senate, in Executive session.

ABOLITION OF EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the 40th rule for conducting business in the Senate, and which requires the Senate to close its doors when transacting Executive business, be rescinded; and the Senate shall hereafter sit with open doors when transacting all business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were re-opened, and the consideration of the morning business resumed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of John H. Pratt, deceased, late army contractor, praying payment of a balance due them by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, praying that Cat Island and Ship Island may be made ports of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of Joseph Hair, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying that the right of way, and a portion of public land may be granted to the State of Illinois for the construction of a rail road to connect the waters of the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the Northern Lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DIX presented a memorial of the College of Pharmacy of the city of New York; a memorial of the New York Academy of Medicine; and a memorial of Physicians of Richmond, Virginia, praying the adoption of measures to prevent the importation of spurious and adulterated drugs and medicines into the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Henry Williams, Benjamin A. G. Fuller, and George Williams, praying compensation for a vessel lost while in the service of the United States; wich was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, on presenting three memorials of citizens of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, praying that the surviving soldiers of the regiments furnished by that State for the Mexican war may be honorably discharged from service, said: He had retained these petitions, along with others of a same tenor from different quarters of his State, in the hope that the ten regiment bill would become a law, and thus enable the President to recall them; but Congress had now been in session for three months, and that bill which had occupied the Senate nearly every day seemed no nearer its final passage than it did a month ago. He felt no disposition to censure any one, but he must say, that so many speeches had been made by the friends of the bill—that it was to be expected that the opposition would dispute its passage, and make speeches against it, but the majority having the power should not have wasted the time in discussing a bill whose passage they considered of vital importance to the honor of the country. The Pennsylvania regiments left home more than a year ago, numbering more than 2,000 valiant spirits—at this time he did not believe there were more than 500 of that whole number left fit for service. He had a return from the 2d regiment, dated in December, which put its strength at about 260 men, and at that time the efficient force fit for service were only 191 men; all the rest had fallen in battle, or been stricken down by disease. In every battle, from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, the men of Pennsylvania had been foremost in the fight. They were among the best blood of the State. The sons of farmers, prosperous mechanics, young lawyers, and physicians, had all gone out in the camp of their country, stimulated by noble and patriotic motives, with no intention of making arms their profession. They do not ask to return; but their regiments cannot be filled from the very character of the volunteer service, and it is the interest of the country, that after so severe a tour of duty they should be brought home, and other full regiments be sent out.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of R. F. Pinckney, a lieutenant in the navy, in relation to an erroneous statement in the narrative of the exploring expedition printed by order of Congress; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Mr. MANGUM presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress, to use their exertions to obtain an appropriation for improving the condition of the inlets on the coast of said State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Maryland in favor of an appropriation by Congress for a light-boat near the mouth of Patapsco river, a light-house on Greenbury's Point in Annapolis river, and a light-house on Flat Cap at the mouth of Annamessex river, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY STOREKEEPERS.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on [illegible] be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill for the purpose of increasing the pay and giving a suitable rank to the military storekeepers of the army.

POST ROUTE.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Clarksville, the county seat of Johnson county, Arkansas, to Rock Port, the county seat of Hot Spring county, in said State, via Spadra Bluff, Mormon's Bluffs, Shoal Creek, Dardanelle Springs, Danville, Jones', McAllister's on Fourche Lefare, Townsend's on Head of Saline, and Hot Springs.

CHARITY HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the document presented the 10th inst., relating to the Charity Hospital at New Orleans; and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AFFAIRS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Charles Fremont, reported the testimony taken before the committee in relation thereto; and observed that it contained much valuable information which ought to go before the public. He, therefore, moved that it be printed, and that twenty thousand copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate; which was agreed to.

GRANT OF LAND TO LOUISIANA.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to grant to the State of Louisiana certain lands for internal improvement, reported it without amendment.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. FELCH, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to apply certain sections of the public domain towards the completion of the Clinton and Kalamazoo Canal, in the State of Michigan, reported it without amendment.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States, reported the same without amendment, and submitted a special report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Barclay and Livingston, and Smith, Thurgar, and Company, reported it without amendment.

RECOMMITTED.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of S. Morris Wain.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

MINISOTAH.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DOUGLAS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish the Territorial government of Minisotah; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, to amend an act entitled, "An act in amendment of the acts, respecting the Judicial system of the United States;" and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

Mr. CASS gave notice that he would call up the ten regiment bill to-morrow, at one o'clock, and he hoped the Senate would be prepared to act upon it without delay, as it was desirable that it should be speedily passed.

Mr. MASON observed that when this bill was last before the Senate he had obtained the floor, with a view of expressing his opinions upon the various subjects which had been presented, when it should next be before the Senate. Since that day, however, the bill had not been before the Senate, and circumstances had occurred, pretty well known to the public, which rendered it unnecessary that the discussion should be continued in the range which it had hitherto taken. He was, therefore, very willing to yield the floor, if Senators upon the other side would forego their intention further to discuss the bill, and let it be put upon its passage. He knew of nothing which had transpired to render the measure unnecessary.

Mr. CASS said it was the unanimous opinion of gentlemen on his side of the Chamber that to halt now in our military operations would be fatal. Their wish was that the bill should be passed before the adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that if gentlemen on the other side, holding the majority, were determined to press the passage of this bill to-morrow, those on his side must yield to the force of superior numbers. He trusted, however, that such a course would not be pursued, but that the privilege which had been enjoyed by gentlemen on the other side of discussing the bill fully, would also be extended to them, to afford an opportunity of explaining why they thought the bill unnecessary.

Mr. MASON inferred from the observations of the Senator from Georgia, that it was the opinion on that side of the Chamber, that the bill was now unnecessary. He should feel it his duty, therefore, to occupy the floor to-morrow to show that the necessity for the passage of the bill still exists.

Mr. ALLEN suggested to Senators on the other side, who seemed disposed to continue the debate upon the bill, that they might avail themselves of materials for the discussion, by taking up and adopting the resolution which he had offered this morning for rescinding the rule requiring a portion of the business of the Senate to be transacted in secret session. They could then introduce topics which it would not otherwise be in order for them even to allude to.

Mr. MANGUM did not exactly comprehend the extent and scope of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Ohio.

Several Senators called for the reading of the resolution, and it was read by the Secretary. [The resolution, which is to rescind the 40th rule, is given heretofore.]

Mr. MANGUM observed that he would not interpose his vote to a resolution to consider the particular matter which had been alluded to in open session, if gentlemen on the other side saw proper to take such a step. He would place the responsibility upon gentlemen representing the Administration upon that floor, and if they saw fit to adopt such a course, he would not interpose his negative. As to the resolution which had been read, so wide in its scope, he would take occasion to give his views upon it when it should come up.

Mr. ALLEN moved that the resolution be now taken up.

Mr. MANGUM would not himself interpose any objection, but under the rule the resolution must lie on the table if a single member objected.

Mr. BERRIEN said there was a grave question involved in this resolution, and it should not be acted on hastily. He therefore moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. ALLEN suggested to the Senator from Georgia, that the resolution could be postponed until to-morrow, without an adjournment.

Mr. BERRIEN had taken that mode of postponing the resolution. If, however, there was a desire for a longer session, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that nothing could induce Senators upon that side to act with precipitation upon a matter of such importance.

Mr. CAMERON was opposed to the consideration of the resolution to-day, though when it came up he might be found with the mover. Too much time had already been wasted in the discussion of the ten regiment bill, and he hoped there would be no more delay in regard to it. The necessity for its passage was as great now, or greater, than ever.

Mr. NILES hoped the Senator would withdraw his objection and let the resolution be taken up.

Mr. CALHOUN thought there was an intimate connexion between the ten regiment bill and the subject which had been alluded to, which pertained to Executive business. He hoped the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee would not, therefore, persist in his determination to press the passage of the bill. As to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, he was utterly opposed to it—even if so modified as to embrace only the present subject for Executive consideration. It would be opening the door to a dangerous precedent, and would throw down the barrier which the constitution had wisely placed round the consideration of questions involving peace or war.

Mr. MANGUM hoped he was not understood as approving even the consideration of the one particular subject which had been alluded to, in open session. He did not approve of it. He had merely observed that if those representing the administration chose to take the responsibility of such a course, he should not interpose his negative to it. He thought it was a question for them to settle, and upon them would rest the responsibility.

Mr. CALHOUN had not understood the Senator from North Carolina as approving it,

Mr. CASS desired to say one word. There was a greater necessity now than ever for the passage of the bill. Suppose a treaty had been negotiated, it was very well known that there was not a quorum of the Mexican Congress at Queretaro to ratify or reject such a treaty. And supposing we should ratify a treaty, if there be one, it is well known that there is no stability in the Mexican government, that it is here to-day and gone to-morrow, and therefore no certainty that it would be ratified by the one which might exist when it should reach Mexico. Besides, if we relax our military operations, it might disincline them to ratify any treaty. The passage of the bill will cost us nothing, for we need not raise the troops if they are not wanted. But we should make a demonstration here to act upon the fears of the Mexican rulers, and thus force them into peace.

Mr. MANGUM rose to a point of order.

Mr. CASS was aware that he was not in order, there being no question before the Senate. Other gentlemen, however, had been permitted to go out of order, as he had been personally alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina, he hoped he would be allowed the same privilege.

Mr. MANGUM said that was not his point of order. It was, whether the Senator was not, in some sense, affording "aid and comfort to the enemy," by making remarks here which would be published and might reach their ears, about making a feint—a movement for effect—to operate upon their fears, the knowledge of which would tend to defeat its aim.

Mr. CASS was not for making a feint: he was for effective operations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said he should object to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio to-day, and he would therefore move that the Senate adjourn;

Which was agreed to without dissent.

And the Senate adjourned

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1848.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

Mr. BERRIEN presented resolutions passed by the legislature of the State of Georgia, in favor of the establishment of mail routes from Blairsville to Mount Yonah; from Dalton to Dahlonega; from Rome to Jacksonville, Alabama; from Hawkinsville to Darien; from Boxville to Dublin; from Griffin to Newman; from Raysville to Lincolnton; from Strother's, Wilkes county, to Washington; from Hadeyondale to Reidsville, and from Traveller's Rest to Florence, in the state of Georgia; which were referred to the Committe on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of the state of Georgia, approving the gallantry and patriotism, displayed by the American troops in the battles in Mexico, and expressing their high sense of the value of the Military Academy at West Point, as an Institution for acquring military knowledge; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of the state of Georgia, recommending to the favorable consideration of Congress, the plan proposed by Asa Whitney, for constructing a rail-road from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean; which were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BERRIEN presented the petition of Mary E. D. Blaney, widow and administratrix of George Blaney, deceased, praying that certain monies, the private property of her deceased husband, claimed and taken by the government as public funds, may be restored to her; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of Isabella Cole, executrix of William Cole, deceased, praying indemnity for injuries done to a vessel and cargo, belonging to her late husband, by the Peruvian authorities; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Newell, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Isaac C. Elston, and of the petition of James M. Kibbin.

SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the relinquishment of the sixteenth section in certain cases, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof, reported it without amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Richmond, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

SUSPENSION OF MILITARY OPERATIONS IN MEXICO.

Mr. ALLEN asked that the resolutions offered by him yesterday be taken up, and added: as the resolution asking the Executive to put the Senate in possession of any information which it may be able to communicate with regard to an armistice will not give rise to debate, I ask for its consideration now.

The resolution was read.

Mr. SEVIER.—It is not my purpose to go into a discussion of that resolution now; and I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. ALLEN.—I desire to know the object of the motion which has just been made. If it be intended by it to make a final disposition of the resolution, I shall ask the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. SEVIER.—I have no objection to calling up the resolution hereafter, but I object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. ALLEN.—I ask for the yeas and nays, sir.

The call for the yeas and nays being seconded, they were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bagby, Calhoun, Dix, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hunter, Jameson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Niles, Sevier, Simmons—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atchison, Bayles, Bright, Bucher, Butler, Berrien, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Clay, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, of Maine, Dickinson, Dodge, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Turney, Upham, and Yulee—25.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

A reading of the resolution was called for, and it was read.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have nothing to say on the resolution. It tells its own tale.

Mr. SEVIER.—I am somewhat amazed at this disposition amongst Senators to discuss this subject. I shall vote against the resolution, and ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—If in order, I would move to attach the usual proviso to the resolution—"provided nothing therein shall be deemed incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. CLAYTON, (in his seat.)—That is proper.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have no objection to the amendment.

The call for the yeas and nays being seconded, they were ordered.

Mr. BREESE.—I move that the resolution be transferred to the executive journal.

Mr. ALLEN.—Perhaps it would satisfy the Senator if a motion were made to close the doors on the legislative, as well as the executive business of the Senate. That would be the same motion, only it would be general instead of particular.

Mr. MANGUM.—Can that motion be entertained after the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is not yet too late to offer a motion.

Mr. BREESE.—I will withdraw the motion, as I understand that perhaps it is not quite in accordance with the usage to offer it now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Has the resolution been amended as proposed by the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The amendment proposed was adopted by the mover of the resolution. Proceed with the call.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bayles, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Clay, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Georgia, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Turney, Upham, and Yulee—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Calhoun, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Lewis, Niles, Sevier, Simmons, and Sturgeon—9.

So it was

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, whether the active operations of the arms of the United States in Mexico have been, and how are suspended by an armistice, and if so, by whose agency, and in virtue of what authority, such armistice has been effected. Provided, nothing therein shall be deemed incompatible with the public interests.

THE ACT OF '99.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio as not desiring the consideration of the other resolution at this time?

Mr. ALLEN.—There is one, sir, a mere resolution of inquiry, directed to the Judiciary Committee, which I should like to have considered, as I presume there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The resolution will be read.

The resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire, and report whether in addition to the act of January 30, 1799, for the punishment of certain crimes therein specified, any further legislation be necessary in order more effectually to protect the rights and interests of the people of the United States against the consequences which may result from the assumption of any individual or individuals without authority to act in the name or behalf of the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, with any foreign government, or department, or officer thereof or any individual or individuals assuming to be such foreign government, or department, or officer thereof, and especially in matters of peace and war, was read by the Secretary.

The question having been taken on its adoption, it was decided in the affirmative without a count.

EXCLUSION OF SLAVERY FROM ACQUIRED TERRITORY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. BALDWIN on the 3d instant:

Resolved, That no territory [illegible] the United States on account [illegible] shall ever be [illegible] whereof such [illegible] involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, shall be forever excluded from the [illegible].

Resolved, That in any cession of territory that may be acquired as the result of the war with Mexico [illegible] in their negotiation with Mr. Trist, to provide for the protection of the inhabitants of the ceded territory [illegible] to which they are entitled, and which [illegible] as a right, and which would have been promptly claimed by the people of the United States, and which would have been promptly claimed by the world as the basis of our institutions, be disregarded or denied.

Mr. SEVIER called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I hope that the Senator will withdraw the call, as I was about to suggest a postponement of the resolutions.

Mr. FOOTE.—I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I am not desirous of discussing the resolutions on this occasion. Probably there would not be an opportunity for discussion before we will be called on to attend to a matter of another, and a mournful character. The resolutions are antagonistic to ———

Mr. FOOTE.—Is it in order to discuss the resolutions?

Mr. BALDWIN —— to those introduced by the Senator from Alabama, and—

Mr. FOOTE.—I rise to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The motion to lay on the table is not debateable.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I did not intend to debate the resolutions, or to make any remarks, except by the courtesy of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE.—This is not a question of courtesy.

Mr. BENTON.—I ask the indulgence of the Senate, whilst I suggest that we should not at this time proceed to consider these resolutions; nay, that we should not even think of them, and allow them for the present to lie upon the table.

Mr. FOOTE.—That is all I contemplated.

Mr. BALDWIN.—If it should be determined by this motion, that a final disposition should be made of the resolutions, I would ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BENTON, (in his seat.)—It is not so intended.

Mr. BALDWIN.—If the resolutions are to be merely passed over informally, I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—It is not my intention to go into a discussion of these resolutions. My sole object is that they be passed over informally.

Mr. BALDWIN.—The subject has been already discussed by the Senator from Florida, (Mr. YULEE,) and certainly it cannot now be intended to make a final disposition of the resolutions by the motion to lay them on the table.

Mr. FOOTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Oh! no.

The call for the yeas and nays being seconded, they were ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Withdraw the call.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am perfectly willing to withdraw the call if the Senate so desire.

Mr. RUSK.—Then I shall renew the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Proceed with the call.

Mr. BALDWIN.—If they are informally passed over I have no objection.

Mr. FOOTE.—I rise to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The motion to lay on the table is not debateable. The Presiding Officer does not understand that the motion for the yeas and nays has been withdrawn.

Mr. MANGUM.—I think that the motion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from Mississippi has not withdrawn his call, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Of course the call cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Proceed with the call.

Mr. NILES.—The call can be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAGBY.—I regret exceedingly the introduction of this subject this morning, no person having been apprised of it. If these resolutions had come up in the ordinary course of business—

Mr. BADGER.—I rise to a question of order. The question is on laying the resolutions on the table, and the yeas and nays have been ordered. Is the question debateable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is not.

Mr. BAGBY.—I consider it to be my duty, with the indulgence of the Senate, to state that when these resolutions were introduced by the honorable Senator, I had a conversation with him in reference to these and a set of counter resolutions brought forward by myself, and we came to this understanding, that after the pressing practical business of the Senate was over—referring particularly to the Ten Regiment Bill—he would ask the indulgence of the Senator to fix some day when his propositions and my counter propositions would both receive the action of the body. If called on to vote to lay these resolutions on the table, I shall be compelled in these circumstances, either to vote against my feelings or to violate the understanding which I had with the Senator from Connecticut. That understanding I certainly shall not violate. I shall keep my part of the treaty in good faith, whatever construction may be put on the vote which I am about to give. I hope, therefore, that even now, the motion to lay on the table will be withdrawn or be reconsidered, in order that the resolutions may be passed over informally, with the understanding that they will not be pressed till some future day more or less remote.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I beg to say, with the indulgence of the Senate, that I was about to state, when I was interrupted by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that there had been this understanding between the honorable Senator from Alabama and myself, and I had supposed, indeed, that the amendments offered by the Senator from Florida, (Mr. YULEE,) would be postponed till the day which might be fixed for the discussion of our resolutions, although there was no understanding to that effect. It is certainly not my wish at all to violate the understanding which existed between the honorable Senator from Alabama and myself, and I hope the resolutions will be passed over in such a manner, that they may be taken up at some future day by the order of the Senate, and then be fairly and fully discussed.

Mr. RUSK.—I ask the indulgence of the Senate one moment. This is known to be an exciting subject. It possibly may shake our constitution and the Union from its circumference to its centre. There is a time for all things. A dispensation of Divine Providence has fallen upon us which, it seems to me, should restrain the throwing in of firebrands, calculated to excite the angry passions and ill feelings of men. I regret that these resolutions were introduced at all. I regret exceedingly that they have been introduced to-day. I hope that they will be laid on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Gentlemen surely understand that these resolutions have not been called up by me on this occasion. There was a perfect understanding in the outset between the Senator from Alabama and myself; but I ought to state that the first resolution is in the very words of the joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, and was introduced in obedience to the requisition of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. ALLEN.—I shall vote to lay these resolutions on the table, now and forever; and with all resolutions on the same subject I shall adopt a like course. In order to make a final disposition of the subject now and forever, so far as this Senate is concerned, I now move to lay the resolution on the table and call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER.—That motion has already been made, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—"Question."

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Proceed with the call.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Bermen, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Mis-

ington, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Moor, Pearce, Rusk, Sevier, Sturgeon, and Turney—35

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Baldwin, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Greene, Miller, Niles, Spruance, and Upham—11

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

A RECESS SUGGESTED.

Mr. MANGUM.—For the purpose of arresting further business at this time, I would suggest that the Senate now take a recess till we receive the formal announcement from the House.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Go on with business.

Mr. MANGUM.—Of course if the suggestion do not meet with general concurrence, I shall not press it.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims on the petition of Mary M. Telfair; and, in concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner be denied.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions on the petition of Isaac Davenport; and, in concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the prayer of the petition be not granted.

JACQUES MOULON.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Jacques Moulon, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT ADAMS.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: I am directed to notify the Senate of the death of the honorable JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts, who departed this life in the Capitol at fifteen minutes past seven o'clock, yesterday evening; and to communicate the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

The resolutions from the House of Representatives having been read—

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said: Mr. President: By the recent affliction of my colleague, a painful duty devolves upon me. The message just delivered from the House proves that the hand of God has been again among us. A great and good man has gone from our midst. If, in speaking of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, I can give utterance to the language of my own heart, I am confident I shall meet with a response from the Senate. He was born in the then Province of Massachusetts, while she was girding herself for the great revolutionary struggle, which was then before her. His parentage is too well known to need even an allusion; yet I may be pardoned if I say that his father seemed born to aid in the establishment of our free government, and his mother was a suitable companion and colaborer of such a patriot. The cradle hymns of the child were the songs of liberty. The power and competence of man for self-government were the topics which he most frequently heard discussed by the wise men of the day; and the inspiration thus caught gave form and pressure to his after life. Thus early imbued with the love of free institutions, educated by his father for the service of his country, and early led by Washington to its altar, he has stood before the world as one of its eminent statesmen. He has occupied, in turn, almost every place of honor which the country could give him, and for more than half a century, has been thus identified with her history. Under any circumstances, I should feel myself unequal to the task of rendering justice to his memory; but, with the debilitating effect of bad health still upon me, I can only, with extreme brevity, touch upon some of the most prominent features of his life. While yet a young man he was, in May, 1794, appointed Minister Resident to the States General of the United Netherlands. In May, 1796, two years after, he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary at Lisbon, in Portugal. These honors were conferred on him by George Washington, with the advice and consent of the Senate. In May, 1797, he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the King of Prussia. In March, 1798, and probably while at Berlin, he was appointed a Commissioner, with full powers to negotiate a treaty of amity and commerce, with Sweden. After his return to the United States, he was elected by the Legislature of Massachusetts, a Senator, and discharged the duties of that station, in this chamber, from the 4th of March, 1803, until June, 1808, when differing from his colleague and from the State upon a great political question, he resigned his seat. In June, 1809, he was nominated and appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. Petersburgh. While at that Court, in February, 1811, he was appointed an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge Cushing, but never took his seat upon the bench. In May, 1813, he, with Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, was nominated Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of Russia, and a treaty of commerce with Russia. From causes which it is unnecessary to notice, nothing was accomplished under this appointment. But afterwards, in January, 1814, he, with Messrs. Gallatin, Bayard, Clay, and Russel, were appointed Ministers Plenipotentiary and Extraordinary to negotiate a treaty of peace and a treaty of commerce with Great Britain. This mission succeeded in effecting a pacification, and the name of Mr. ADAMS is subscribed to the treaty of Ghent. After this eventful crisis in our public affairs, he was, in February, 1815, selected by Mr. Madison to represent the country and protect its interests at the Court of St. James, and he remained there as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary until Mr. Monroe became President of the United States. On the 5th of March, 1817, at the commencement of the new administration, he was appointed Secretary of State, and continued in the office while that gentleman was at the head of the administration. In 1825 he was elected his successor, and discharged the duties of President for one term, ending on the 3d of March, 1829. Here followed a brief period of repose from public service, and Mr ADAMS retired to the family mansion at Quincy, but was elected a member of the House of Representatives from the district in which he lived, at the next election, which occurred after his return to it, and took his seat in December, 1831: he retained it by successive elections to the day of his death. I have not ventured, on this occasion, beyond a bare enumeration of the high places of trust and confidence which have been conferred upon the deceased. The service covers a period of more than half a century, and what language can I employ which will portray more forcibly the great merits of the deceased, the confidence reposed in him by the public, or the ability with which he discharged the duties devolved upon him, than by this simple narration of recorded facts? An ambitious man could not desire a more emphatic eulogy. Mr. ADAMS, however, was not merely a statesman, but a ripe, accomplished scholar, who during a life of remarkably well directed industry, made those great acquirements which adorned his character, and gave to it the manly strength of wisdom and intelligence. As a statesman and patriot, he will rank among the illustrious men of an age prolific in great names, and greatly distinguished for its progress in civilization. The productions of his pen are proofs of a vigorous mind, imbued with a profound knowledge of what it investigates, and of a memory which was singularly retentive and capacious. But his character is not made up of those conspicuous qualities alone. He will be remembered for the virtues of private life—for his elevated moral example—for his integrity—for his devotion to his duties as a christian, as a neighbor, and as a head of the family. In all these relations few persons have set a more stedfast or brighter example, and few have descended to the grave where the broken ties of social and domestic affection have been more sincerely lamented. Great as may be the loss to the public of one so gifted and wise, it is by the family that his death will be most deeply felt. His aged and beloved partner, who has so long shared the honors of his career, and to whom all who know her are bound by the ties of friendship, will believe that we share her grief, mourn her bereavement, and sympathise with her in her affliction. It is believed to have been the earnest wish of his heart, to die like Chatham, in the midst of his labors. It was a sublime thought, that where he had toiled, in the house of the nation, in hours of the day devoted to its service, the stroke of death should reach him, and there sever the ties of love and patriotism, which bound him to earth. He fell in his seat attacked by paralysis, of which he had before been a victim. To describe the scene which ensued would be impossible. It was more than the spontaneous gush of feeling which all such events call forth, so much to the honor of our nature. It was the expression of reverence for his moral worth; of admiration for his great intellectual endowments, and of veneration for his age and public services. All gathered round the sufferer, and the strong sympathy and deep feeling which manifested itself showed that the business of the House (which was instantly adjourned,) was forgotten amid the distressing anxieties of the moment. He was soon removed to the apartment of the Speaker, where he remained surrounded by afflicted friends till the weary clay resigned its immortal spirit. "This is the end of earth?" Brief but emphatic words. They were among the last uttered by the dying Christian. Thus has closed the life of one whose purity, patriotism, talents, and learning have seldom been seriously questioned. To say that he had faults, would only be declaring that he was human. Let him who is exempt from error venture to point them out. In this long career of public life, it would be strange if the venerable man had not met with many who have differed from him in sentiment, or who have condemned his acts. If there be such, let the mantle of oblivion be thrown over each unkind thought. Let not the grave of the "old man eloquent," be desecrated by unfriendly remembrances, but let us yield our homage to his many virtues, and let it be our prayer, that we may so perform our duties here, that if summoned in a like sudden and appalling manner, we may not be found unprepared, or unable to utter his words, "I am composed." Mr. President, with this imperfect sketch of the character and services of a great man, I leave the subject in the hands of the Senate by moving the resolutions which I send to the Chair:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the message from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a token of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate will attend the funeral of the hour appointed by the House of Representatives, and wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn until Saturday next, at the hour appointed for the funeral.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. BENTON.—Mr. President. The voice of his native State has been heard through one of the Senators of Massachusetts, announcing the death of her aged and most distinguished son. The voice of the other Senator from Massachusetts is not heard, nor is his presence seen. A domestic calamity, known to us all, and felt by us all, confines him to the chamber of private grief while the Senate is occupied with the public manifestations of a respect and sorrow which a national loss inspires. In the absence of that Senator, and as the member of this body longest here, it is not unfitting or unbecoming in me to second the motion which has been made for extending the last honors of the Senate to him who, forty-five years ago, was a member of this body, who, at the time of his death, was among the oldest members of the House of Representatives, and who, putting the years of his service together, was the oldest of all the members of the American Government. The eulogium of Mr. ADAMS is made in the facts of his life, which the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. DAVIS,) has so strikingly stated, that from early manhood to octogenarian age, he has been constantly and most honorably employed in the public service.—For a period of more than fifty years, from the time of his first appointment as minister abroad under Washington to his last election to the House of Representatives by the people of his native district—he has been constantly retained in the public service, and that, not by the favor of a sovereign, or by hereditary title, but by the elections and appointments of republican government.—This fact makes the eulogy of the illustrious deceased. For what, except a union of all the qualities which command the esteem and confidence of man, could have ensured a public service so long, by appointments free and popular, and from sources so various and exalted. Minister many times abroad; member of this body; member of the House of Representatives; Cabinet minister; President of the United States; such has been the galaxy of his splendid appointments. And what but moral excellence the most perfect; intellectual ability the most eminent; fidelity the most unwavering; service the most useful, would have commanded such a succession of appointments so exalted, and from sources so various and so eminent? Nothing less could have commanded such a series of appointments; and accordingly we see the union of all those great qualities in him who has received them. In this long career of public service Mr. ADAMS was distinguished not only by faithful attention to all the great duties of his stations, but to all their less and minor duties. He was not the Salamitian galley, to be launched only on extraordinary occasions, but he was the ready vessel, always launched when the duties of his station required it, be the occasion great or small. As President, as cabinet minister, as minister abroad, he examined all questions that came before him, and examined all in all their parts, in all the minutiæ of their detail as well as in all the vastness of their comprehension. As Senator, and as a member of the House of Representatives, the obscure committee room was as much the witness of his laborious application to the drudgery of legislation as the halls of the two Houses were to the ever ready speech, replete with knowledge, which instructed all hearers, enlightened all subjects, and gave dignity and ornament to debate. In the observance of all the proprieties of life, Mr. ADAMS was a most noble and impressive example. He cultivated the minor as well as the greater virtues. Wherever his presence could give aid and countenance to what was useful and honorable to man, there he was. In the exercises of the school and of the college—in the meritorious meetings of the agricultural, mechanical, and commercial societies—in attendance upon Divine Worship—he gave the punctual attendance rarely seen but in those who are free from the weight of public cares. Punctual to every duty, death found him at the post of duty; and where else could it have found him, at any stage of his career, for the fifty years of his illustrious public life? From the time of his first appointment by Washington to his last election by the people of his native town, where could death have found him but at the post of duty? At that post, in the fullness of age, in the ripeness of renown, crowned with honors, surrounded by his family, his friends, and admirers, and in the very presence of the national representation, he has been gathered to his fathers, leaving behind him the memory of public services which are the history of his country for half a century, and the example of a life, public and private, which should be the study and the model of the generations of his countrymen.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and, in accordance therewith,

The Senate adjourned.

[On Saturday the Senate met and proceeded to the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, and afterwards adjourned.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1848.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. MILLER presented resolutions passed by the legislature of the State of New Jersey, in opposition to a repeal of the act of March 2, 1837, concerning pilots; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Levi Wells, a pensioner of the United States, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YULEE presented a petition of citizens of Orange county, East Florida, praying the establishment of a post office in that county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition of Archibald Smith, Jr., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COURT MARTIAL IN THE CASE OF LIEUT. COL. FREMONT.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, a copy of the proceedings of the general court martial in the case of Lieut. Col. Fremont.

NOTICE OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that, on to-morrow, he should ask leave of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the purchase of American hemp for the use of the navy.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Asahel Kingsley, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST TO ALABAMA.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill authorizing payment of interest on the amount advanced by the State of Alabama to the general government, pending the Creek hostilities in 1836 and 1837, reported it without amendment.

WILLIAM B. STOKES.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Stokes, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

Bill for the relief of Fernando Fellanux.

Bill for the relief of Peter Engle, senior.

And no amendment being made they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That they pass, and that their respective titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bills.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. YULEE.—With the permission of the Senate, I will trespass a moment upon its time. I have been waiting an opportunity for a week past, to bring to the notice of the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. FOOTE,) a report of proceedings in this body, in which he is made to alledge "misquotation" of authorities by me. Being quite satisfied that such was not his intention, I have thought it proper to enable him to correct it in his place. He will find the passage I refer to, in the copy of the New York Herald, which I hand him.

Mr. FOOTE.—I think I can explain the matter without at all calling in question the accuracy of the reporter. I did accuse the Senator from Florida of "misquotation," not, however, exactly in the sense in which he seems to apprehend it. In the course of the hurried remarks made by me, on the occasion to which allusion has been made, I did say that I was perfectly prepared to demonstrate, that the authorities cited by the Senator, whether musty or modern, were either wholly inapplicable; or being applicable, were, according to all the rules of fair and legitimate interpretation, altogether hostile to his positions. In this way I accused the Senator of misquotation, and a more unfortunate case of misquotation, it has rarely been my lot to witness. I accompanied the accusation with a suggestion, that I did not charge the Senator with having, in the language of the poet,

Cases of misquotation, we know, are not unfrequent at the bar. Often, a lawyer's authorities are turned totally against him, and the sword is wrenched from the hand of the combatant, and he himself made its victim. In the present case, I intended to show that the weapons of the Senator, could be turned against himself, and I am prepared to demonstrate that his citation of his authorities has been peculiarly unfortunate. But, of course, I did not charge the Senator with erroneous reading of the authorities. I did not accuse him of any interpolation of words or sentences. I simply intended to express the idea, that his authorities from Puffendorff, down to the most modern, Judge Martin of Louisiana, so far as they were at all applicable, could be wielded to the utter destruction of the dangerous views propounded by him, which were in my opinion, most illiberally advanced, under all the circumstances of the case, and were calculated to do much serious public detriment to distinguished gentlemen of the North, who had girded on their armor for the defence and vindication of the constitutional rights of the South. The Senator has, however, tempered his phraseology in his printed speech, and made himself to "coo as gently as a sucking dove," although it is well known he was a "roaring lion," throughout his spoken speech.

Mr. YULEE.—I understand the Senator to say, that he did not mean to use "misquotation" in its ordinary sense of misrecital, but only as meaning misapplication. With this I am content; and will be happy to hear how the Senator, when he comes to the discussion of the question, will sustain his proposition that the authorities I cited are not pertinent to my argument. Upon this issue I am willing to go before the Senate and the country. But before I sit down I will correct the Senator in his impression, that my remarks have undergone any change in the matter of them, since delivered. The argument is preserved as nearly as possible, under the circumstances—quite as nearly as is usual in this or other deliberative bodies. I did omit certain matter which I had read from newspapers of the day, in illustration of what I charged to be the ultimate views of the advocates of tee two plans of adjustment I was commenting upon. These were omitted from my printed speech because, among other reasons, unnecessary to the argument, and because demanding more room than my printer thought could be spared. The Senator from New York (Mr. DICKINSON) knew that such was my purpose.

Mr. FOOTE.—[being supplied with a dictionary, read the definition of the word "quote," and added:]—The Senator will thus find that the meaning of the word "quote" is given, "to cite."—All I intended to say was, that the authorities cited by him were either injudiciously or erroneously cited, and were not calculated to afford him "aid and comfort" in the discussion. The Senator from Alabama, now in his seat, (Mr. LEWIS,) will bear me witness that both he and I concurred, that the manner and matter of the speech of the Senator from Florida as delivered, were, under all the circumstances, lamentably harsh and unkind to some of the best friends of the South, at the North. In the printed speech, however, (and I am quite happy to say so) there is not, from beginning to end, a single expression which can be construed into even an approximation of harshness. Therefore, I am warranted in saying that, there must be something overpoweringly harsh in his manner of expressing himself, or that I did not understand the terms which the Senator used. Certainly I listened to the remarks of the Senator with attention, and so did other gentlemen. I am willing to appeal to members of this body for a decision of the question, whether the Senator has not mingled a great deal more honey in his phraseology as printed, than he appeared to be willing to infuse into his speech as delivered!

Mr. LEWIS said he regretted his friend from Mississippi had given so much consequence to anything he might have said, as to the manner of the Senator from Florida. He certainly had not said that the manner of that gentleman was harsh and offensive, for he was not present when that gentleman made those remarks. In reply to the suggestion from another source, that such remarks were harsh, he (Mr. L.) had expressed his regret as he had also regretted before any remarks were made, that the Senator from New York had not amended his resolutions as he (Mr. L.) had hoped and believed he was willing to do.

Mr. FOOTE.—The explanation of the Senator from Alabama confirms what I have said, and shows that even rumor and the general impression with regard to the remarks of the Senator from Florida, were as I have stated. I make these remarks because it was thought by some that I dealt rather unkindly with the Senator from Florida in my rebuke; and certainly I should have been guilty of gross discourtesy, had I rebuked him for using language so calm and honied as that which appears in the printed speech.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I rise to a question of order. There is a great deal of important business to be transacted in the morning hour, and as this dispute appears to be altogether a personal matter between the two gentlemen, without any point on either side, so far as I am able to perceive, I ask that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the morning business.

Mr. YULEE.—More time has been consumed than I anticipated. The Senator says that he does not mean the matter is different, but that there is less severity of tone. I will only say that so far as the Senator supposed there was any personal unkindness in my language or manner on the occasion referred to, he is totally mistaken. I entertained no unkind feelings towards the Senator from New York, (Mr. DICKINSON,) or any one who took an interest in the discussion, and could not therefore have manifested any. If I had been personally unkind, certainly the Senator aggrieved, whoever he might be, would have noticed it for himself. Perhaps my manner was very earnest and warm. That is my nature. My manner such as it is, no doubt admits of improvement.—The manner of many of us might be improved, if "the gift" were given us—

"To see ourselves as others see us."

I will now ask the Senator, as he seems to be quite opposed to the doctrines of my speech, what is the precise point of difference between us. Does he hold that a citizen of the United States could be excluded from residing upon territory of the United States with his slave property?

Mr. FOOTE.—"I shun no question, and I wear no mask"—and my sentiments on that subject are well known.

Mr. SEVIER.—I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business and after some time so occupied, the doors were opened, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, requesting me to [illegible] copies of [illegible] according to the report of the United States Senate Manual [illegible] and [illegible] which may be in the State Department, and not deemed [illegible] [illegible] I transmit herewith [illegible] Executive document [illegible] session.

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1848.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Joseph Loranger, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, it was Ordered, That Ross Winans have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, it was Ordered, That Zachariah Cox have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. RUSK gave notice that to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to provide for transcribing certain State papers of the late Republic of Texas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill granting the franking privilege to Mrs. Louisa Catharine Adams, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives has signed an enrolled resolution [illegible] to be signed by the President of the Senate.

SIGNING OF A RESOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Scott, and the troops under his command, for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO MRS. ADAMS.

The bill from the House of Representatives, granting the franking privilege to Mrs. Louisa Catharine Adams, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered. That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ALABAMA AND FLORIDA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BAGBY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill in relation to the boundary line between Alabama and Florida; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Bethiah Healy, submitted a report accompanied by a bill granting a pension to Bethiah Healy.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of David H. Leeper, reported a bill to confirm to the legal representatives of Joseph Dutailles the location of a certain New Madrid certificate; which was read and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, accompanying the petition of Joseph Dutailles, be printed.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE FREMONT COURT MARTIAL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON, requesting the President to communicate the proceedings of the General Court Martial, in the case of Lieutenant Colonel Fremont; and it was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted on the 23d instant, by Mr. Allen, to rescind the 40th rule, and conduct all business of the Senate hereafter in open session.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the resolution upon the table, and upon this resolution he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows, viz:

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bright, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, Turney.—13.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

REMOVAL OF THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN, on the 23d instant, to remove the injunction of secrecy from the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN then said that in the face of the vote just given, it would be manifestly ungenerous to take up the resolution, and he therefore asked that it be passed over informally. He would prefer availing himself of some occasion when the Senate had more time to devote to such subjects than at present, for the discussion of the whole question, and he proposed to make the discussion turn on this resolution.

Mr. MANGUM objected to passing the resolution over informally, on the ground that it would not be strictly in order. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table, as a definitive disposition of it in open session.

Mr. ALLEN desired to make one observation. He desired that all who wished an opportunity of discussing the question would vote against the motion, with the understanding that he would not press the resolution till a more convenient time.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill to change the name of the steamboat "Charles Downing" to "Calhoun," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have also passed the bill of the Senate authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made under certain Indian treaties, to alienate the same in fee.

They have also passed the joint resolution of the Senate for the relief of Betsy McIntosh, and the bill of the Senate to make attachments which are made under process issuing from the Courts of the United States conform to the laws regulating such attachments in the Court of the States, each with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

RESOLUTIONS, ETC., OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a donation of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to Keokuk in the State of Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREESE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, in favor of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean, on the plan proposed by Asa Whitney; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State, in Congress, to protest against the relinquishment of the Provinces or States conquered by, and in possession of the United States, without indemnity; and, also, to protest any law which shall be intended to prevent the citizens of slaveholding States from taking their property with them, in emigrating to said acquired territory; which were read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HOUSTON presented documents relating to the claim of Manuel Ravena, for compensation for the schooner Francisca, which he states was illegally seized by the Collector at Galveston; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented a petition of citizens of Baltimore, praying the establishment of reduced and uniform rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That Isaac Elston and James M. Kibben have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Portsmouth and Newcastle, New Hampshire, praying that the duties on fish may be made specific, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of citizens of Massachusetts engaged in the fisheries, and on presenting it observed that the petitioners say, that by the present tariff of the United States the duty on fish is such as to give to the British interests employed in that pursuit a great advantage over those of the United States. The British fishermen coming out from all the fishing grounds from the neighboring shores of Canada, Nova Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, are lighter and cheaper vessels, have a decided advantage over them. They, therefore, pray that the present duty on the article may be altered from the ad valorem assessment which now prevails, and that the duty may be made specific.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YULEE submitted additional documents relative to the claim of the administrator of James Edwards, deceased, which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. YULEE submitted an additional document relating to the claim of Isaac Varnes; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

PUBLIC DOCUMENT.

Mr. BRADBURY submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report what the cheapest of the President's annual message, accompanied [illegible] by the Senate to be printed, and have not yet been printed, and how many copies.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. BRADBURY said: I offer the resolution for the purpose of obtaining information not only for ourselves, but for the public. Every day's mail brings inquiries as to when these documents can be expected to be published. And at the rate at which we are now going on, it really seems to me that we shall not get more than the half of them by the next session of Congress. The delay is, no doubt, in some measure, owing to the size of the document; I desire, however, that the cause should be stated in an official form, so that the public may be informed.

Mr. DIX.—I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but merely to state, that meeting one of the public printers accidentally, a day or two ago, I inquired why the documents had not been sent to me, and ascertained that the delay was occasioned by the engraving of certain maps, which accompany the document. The printing is completed, but the engraving is not yet finished.

Mr. BRADBURY.—My purpose is merely that the public shall be informed of the cause of the delay, and if the committee report that fact, it is all that is desired.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Maine, whether it would not be as well to modify the resolution. I understand that the delay is occasioned as it has been remarked by the Senator from New York, by some difficulty in relation to the preparing of the maps which accompany the documents. I saw the printer this morning, and learned from him that he was waiting for the maps, which had been sent from the engraver's without having been folded, and he had to employ persons to perform that duty. It might help the matter if the resolution was extended so as to enable the printer to employ and pay a sufficient number of persons to fold the maps, which in fact, is the sole cause of the delay.

Mr. BRADBURY.—The resolution simply proposes an inquiry, and I would prefer that it should be acted on.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. DIX submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible]

NATIONAL ENGINEERS.

Mr. DIX submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

[illegible]

JOHN PAUL JONES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones, reported the same, with a recommendation that the Senate concur therein.

HEZEKIAH THISTLE.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom were referred the petition of Hezekiah Thistle, and the petition of Herrick Aiken, submitted adverse reports, which were ordered to be printed.

ATTACHMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate to make attachments which are made under process issuing from the Courts of the United States conform to the laws regulating such attachments in the Courts of the States; and it was

Resolved, That the Senate [illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

PRIVATE BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate for the relief of Betsey McIntosh; and it was

Resolved, That the Senate [illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives to change the name of the steamboat "Charles Downing" to "Calhoun," was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 2d of January, 1848, I communicate herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying documents, containing the correspondence of Mr. Wise, late Minister of the United States at the Court of Brazil, relating to the subject of the slave trade.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, March 2, 1848.

The message was read.

Ordered, That it be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. DAYTON presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey in favor of the construction of a rail road from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean, on the plan proposed by Asa Whitney.

Mr. DAYTON said, in presenting these resolutions, he desired to say a few words. On previous occasions he had, in response to instructions from political adversaries, disclaimed the binding force of any such instructions. These resolutions emanated from a Legislature composed of a large majority of political friends. They are not intended as instructions, but advisory. In this view, said he, they are entitled to my most deliberate and respectful consideration, and they shall receive it. But I know, that the body by whom these resolutions were passed will ask no more than this of me. Without having given to the subject any careful consideration, I may be pardoned for saying that, as at present advised, my impressions are altogether against the scheme of Mr. Whitney as unwise and impracticable. These opinions will be carefully reviewed when this question shall be presented; and if, consistently with my views of official duty, I can conform myself to the wishes of a body whose wishes I am ever bound to respect, it will give me pleasure. But if, on the contrary, I remain of my present opinions, I shall be under the ultimate necessity of responding in this matter to political friends, as I have heretofore responded to political opponents.

Mr. DAYTON thereupon moved that the resolutions be laid upon the table and printed for the use of the Senate; and the motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC MEETING IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of the county of Saratoga, New York, approving and sustaining the measures pursued by the government in the prosecution of the war with Mexico; which were read and laid upon the table.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented a memorial of Surgeons in the Army and Navy of the United States, praying the adoption of measures for preventing the importation of spurious and adulterated drugs and medicines; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Alfred White, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Alexander Ladd; and that it lie on the table.

ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to lay before the Senate Colonel Cooper's report and map, heretofore ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill for the relief of Charles Cappell; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed the bill from the Senate to provide additional Examiners in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed three enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT signed the following bills:

An act to amend an act, entitled "An act in amendment of the several acts regulating the Judicial system of the United States;"

An act granting the franking privilege to Louisa Catharine Adams.

An act authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made under certain Indian Treaties to alienate the same in fee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1848.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the act of 24th March, 1847, regulating passenger ships and vessels, tabular statements showing the number and description of passengers who arrived in each collection district of the United States during the year ending the 30th September, 1847; which was laid upon the table.

Also, a report on the Commissioner of Patents, made agreeably to law, showing the operations of the office during the year 1847.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF FLORIDA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of Florida, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representative of that State in Congress to use their efforts to procure certain amendments to the pre-emption laws in favor of the actual settlers on the public lands in that State; a resolution passed by said Legislature, in favor of the enactment of a law making provision for the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers who were killed in battle in the existing war with Mexico; and a memorial and resolution of the Legislature aforesaid, in relation to certain alterations in the route of transporting the mail from Chattahoochie to Pensacola in that State; which were laid upon the table.

PETITIONS.

Mr DIX presented documents in relation to the removal of the Port of Entry from Plattsburg to Rouse's Point, in the State of New York; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the petitions of inhabitants of St. Charles county, Missouri, praying that the purchasers of certain school lands in that county may be confirmed in their titles, and that other lands may be set apart for school purposes, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William G. Davis and Mary Ann, his wife, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1848.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DICKINSON.—It is not often that I trouble the Senate with noticing any errors that are committed by the reporters for the public press; but I have observed an erroneous statement in regard to certain resolutions, which I had the honor to introduce—resolutions which were passed at a public meeting held in Saratoga county, New York—which I cannot permit to go abroad, without contradiction. I make the correction, however, more in justice to others, than myself. I remarked at the time I presented them, that they were resolutions which were passed upon the old battle ground of Saratoga, and that they took ground in favor of the Mexican war. I have seen it stated in many of the papers, that the resolutions are against the war! They will speak for themselves, and the report of what I now say, will correct the error.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. MILLER presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, affirming the declaration of the sentiments of the Chicago convention, in favor of the improvement of the harbors and navigable rivers of the country, through the action of the General Government; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the petition of John Erickson, asking compensation for his services as engineer in planning and superintending the construction of the steam machinery of the United States steamer Princeton; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOOTE presented the petition of the heirs of Col. James Mayson, asking compensation for the services of said Mayson during the Revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, of Volney E. Howard and others, asking to be relieved from certain bonds held against them by the United States in payment for certain lands which had been previously located; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, of Luke Lea and David Shelton, asking for a grant of land in Mississippi, for the purposes of experimenting on turpentine; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of certain enlisted men of the ordnance corps, asking to be placed on the same footing in reference to re-enlistments as other soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Ambrose H. Abbott and other citizens of Maine, asking the establishment of a mail route from Bangor to Augusta, through Frankfort, Monroe, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Moses D. Hyams and others, asking to be allowed to change the name of a vessel from "Roger Bontemps" to Palmetto; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON in presenting the petition of James F. Haliday and other printers of the District of Columbia, asking the establishment of a national printing office at the seat of Government, remarked:—I have been requested by some of the old established printers of this city to present a petition on the subject of the public printing. The petition proposes what has been often talked about: the establishment of a public printing press, which shall be under the direction and control of Congress. It sets forth reasons in favor of the proposition, reasons founded upon the long experience of these men, and consequently of the greater value, in a practical point of view. I am not entirely certain in what manner the British Parliament have their printing done, but I am certain of one thing, and that is, that the printing that is done for them is the best that is done in the world. They use the best paper, and the best type, and have the best press-work that is executed anywhere, and their documents are made up in the best form for use, that is—the quarto form—avoiding the inconvenience of the thick and unwieldy octavos which soon break to peices with their own weight. I sent to the Library for a volume, and one was brought to me, taken quite at random, no particular selection being made, and I desire to place it upon the table of the Secretary that Senators may look at it and see the kind of work that is done for the British Parliament and compare it with the work that is done for us. I desire Senators not only to examine the works but to feel its weight, and they will perceive its superiority over that which is done for Congress. This is a matter which deserves attention; it is, I think, worthy of consideration whether, while all the useful arts are in as high a state of perfection in America as in any portion of the world, there may not be some improvement in the manner in which our public printing is executed. I will lay the volume upon the Secretary's table, and move that the memorial, brief but full of reasons, be printed and referred to the Joint Committee on the Public Printing.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL GRICE.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Grice.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

OPERATIONS OF GENERAL SCOTT.

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 7, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DOWNS presented two petitions of citizens of Louisiana, praying the establishment of a navy-yard at the mouth of Red river in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BREESE presented three petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying the establishment of a Mail route from Waterloo to Sparta in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, additional documents relating to the claim of Polly Taylor for a pension, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DIX presented a petition of owners and consignees of vessels in the port of New York, praying the enactment of a law to facilitate the landing and warehousing of the cargoes of vessels arriving from foreign ports; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of Solon Borland, in behalf of certain Arkansas mounted volunteers who were taken prisoners by Mexican troops, praying that they may be allowed full pay and subsistence during the time of their captivity; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FELCH presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying a grant of public land for the construction of a road from Green Bay to Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Lorenger, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

FEES OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a fee bill for the officers of the United States courts, in the cases in which he serves, rendered in the Supreme Courts thereof, exercising such discretion as to them may seem just and proper.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Geo. V. Mitchell, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Steele, reported a bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States in a certain Indian reservation in the State of Alabama, which was read and passed to the second reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1848.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE WITH LIBERIA, ETC.

Mr. SEVIER submitted a geographical and commercial memoir, by Aaron H. Palmer, on the present state of Liberia, Manchuria and the Asiatic Islands of the Northern Pacific Ocean, showing their productions, trade and commerce, and the importance of establishing commercial intercourse between the United States and those countries; which was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF INDIANA.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, in favor of the enactment of a law making compensation to the Adjutant General of that state, for his services in raising and organizing two regiments of volunteers for the service of the United States in the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of S. B. Arden, praying that certain periodical publications may be exempted from postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a petition of citizens of Fellowsville, Preston county, Virginia, asking Congress to consider the expediency of endeavoring to effect such change in the laws as shall appropriate the proceeds of the public lands in aid of the extinction of slavery, and appointing commissioners, whose duty shall it shall be, under such conditions as Congress shall prescribe, to purchase and emancipate female children born prior to 1856, and making annual appropriations on a pledge of said public lands with a declaratory act that from and after 1856 there shall be no hereditary slavery, and all born after that date shall be free; he moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MASON.—I am not aware of the quarter from which this petition comes, nor am I acquainted with the rules of the Senate in regard to petitions of this description, but my impression is that according to the practice of the Senate, it should lie upon the table.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the motion to receive was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I can only say that the petition comes from some of the gentleman's constituents—whom I have not the honor to know—and who reside some where in the interior of the State of Virginia, and that they renew a proposition which was made twenty years ago from the middle states. If the gentleman will take the responsibility of saying what shall be done with the petition, I shall be quite satisfied.

PATENTS.

On motion by Mr. TURNEY, it was Ordered, That fifteen hundred additional copies of the report of

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 43.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1848, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed four enrolled bills, and an enrolled resolution, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1848, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CALL ON THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, rose to make an inquiry of the Chair, whether any reply had been received to a resolution submitted by him and adopted on the 30th of December. The resolution to which he had reference, was a call on the War Department for information as to the number of troops called into the service in Mexico since May, 1846, the number discharged, and the number killed and wounded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied that the resolution had not been answered.

Mr. JOHNSON then gave notice that unless an answer should be received in the course of a few days, he would renew the call.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives supplementary to the act entitled "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," approved June 17, 1844, reported it without amendment.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. YULEE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning school lands in the State of Florida; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States, and for other purposes," passed 8th August, 1846, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives directing the mode of settling the claims of Charles G. Ridgely, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of David Thomas, of Philadelphia, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Reynald, alias Nick Hillary, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Nancy Tompkins, and for the relief of Stephen Champlin, were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Calvin Emmons, and for the relief of E. G. Smith, were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Mitchell, and for the relief of John Manly, were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Bent, St. Vrain and Company; for the relief of William Hogan, administrator of Michael Hogan, deceased; for the relief of James McAvoy; for the relief of Charles Benns; for the relief of William Ralston; and for the relief of Bennet M. Dell, were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee of Claims.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BERRIEN expressed a desire that the bill which had for its object, the relief of the Supreme court from the pressure of business, might now be taken up. The Supreme Court was about to adjourn, and it was important that the fate of the bill should be ascertained before the adjournment of the court, as in the event of its passage, the provision would be made for an additional term during the present year in the hope of relieving the docket. He moved a postponement of the prior order, that the Senate might at once proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. ASHLEY rose only for the purpose of saying, that when the bill referred to by the gentleman from Georgia, was taken up it would, in his judgment, be found to demand the mature consideration of the Senate before it should be passed. He had reported the bill by the direction of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, but the majority of that committee had directed him whenever the bill came up, to offer an amendment, with the view of bringing the whole subject before the Senate, that it might receive a proper consideration. The majority of the committee believed that the bill would produce greatly more injury to the mass of the community than if the law remained as it was. The bill left one whole class of claims utterly unprovided for, and made no provision whatever for cases of appeal from the District to the Circuit Court.

Mr. DAYTON suggested that, as the bill had not been yet taken up, it might be as well before proceeding farther, to bring it up. He therefore moved to take up the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY remarked, that he was aware that the bill had not yet been taken up, and his object was to present some reasons why it should not be taken up at that time. It would be quite impossible to get through with the bill during the morning hour.

Mr. SEVIER said that he had given way to the Senator from Georgia, under the impression that there would not be any discussion; but as it was apparent that the bill could not soon be disposed of, he would move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. BENTON rose, but yielded to—

Mr. BERRIEN, who remarked, that he had now fulfilled his duty by calling the bill to the notice of the Senate, in which the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations had kindly acquiesced. He was of course not at all desirous to delay other important business; and, therefore, he would withdraw his motion to take up the bill.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn it be to Tuesday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury, made agreeably to law, exhibiting certain contracts and expenditures during the periods and for the objects therein mentioned.

Also, the petition of Joseph M. Merriwether, and a petition of a number of citizens of Arkansas in his behalf, praying to be allowed the right of pre-emption to a tract of land; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the memorial of H. N. Denison, praying the payment of an accepted draft, drawn by James Reeside, mail contractor, on the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Emeline Owens, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CALHOUN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Robert M. Harrison, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That William Storke Jett have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

COMPENSATION TO WITNESSES.

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, provision can be made by law for the payment of the compensation to be allowed to witnesses who may be attending the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, in obedience to subpœnas issued by the clerks of said courts, and to report by bill or otherwise.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. ASHLEY gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to bring in a bill to regulate the fees in the several courts of the United States.

INDIANA BONDS.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill authorizing the surrender of certain bonds held by the United States to the State of Indiana, reported the same with amendments, and submitted a special report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

THE LOAN BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions, reported it with amendments.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848, reported it with amendments.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Alfred White, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. DICKINSON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the petition of Volney E. Howard, and the memorial of Isabella Cole, executrix of William Cole, deceased, submitted reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. UNDERWOOD asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the unpaid claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State and Continental lines of the revolutionary army; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed the 9th instant the following bills and resolution:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act in amendment of the acts respecting the public lands of the United States."

An act granting the franking privilege to Louisa Catharine Adams.

Joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield Scott, and the troops under his command, for their distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the campaign of 1847.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed the 9th instant the following bills and resolution:

An act for the relief of the administratrix of Elisha L. Keen, deceased.

An act for the payment of the claim of Walter R. Johnson against the United States.

An act to make allowances which are made under process issuing from the courts of the United States conformable to the laws regulating such allowances in the courts of the States.

An act concerning the courts of the United States in, and for the district of Michigan.

A resolution for the relief of Betsey McIntosh.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848.

The bill having been partially amended—

Mr. HALE inquired of the chairman of the Finance Committee, whether the item of five thousand dollars for expenses in the issue of Treasury notes, was intended to be appropriated to the payment of officers now receiving salaries?

Mr. ATHERTON replied that he did not so understand it. The appropriation for this purpose, if he were correctly informed, amounted in the whole, to forty thousand dollars. There was amongst the papers accompanying the bill, a statement of the disbursements during the current fiscal year, under that appropriation, amounting to thirty-eight thousand dollars. The sum appropriated being thus nearly exhausted, it was estimated by the Treasury Department, that an additional appropriation of five thousand dollars would be necessary. He then sent to the desk a statement of these expenditures, which was read by the Secretary.

Mr. HALE then moved a proviso, that no part of this sum should be paid to officers receiving salaries for issuing or signing Treasury notes.

Mr. ATHERTON said he had not the slightest objection to the amendment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MANGUM then said, that with the permission of the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, he would move that the bill before the Senate be passed over informally, with the view of making another motion.

Mr. ATHERTON assented.

Mr. MANGUM then moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The motion being agreed to, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The doors having been reopened, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for the current year.

Mr. HALE said, that as he had ascertained that a similar provision had been inserted in the loan bill, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill by striking out the item allowing a Charge to the Papal States and inserting "minister plenipotentiary," and to increase the appropriation from $22,000 to $31,000.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

Mr. CASS then said:—This bill will, it is now evident, lead to a somewhat protracted discussion, and I therefore hope, that it will be passed over informally, and that the Senate will take up the ten regiment bill. I shall not trouble the Senate with any remarks in support of this suggestion, but merely express the hope, that gentlemen will acquiesce in the propriety of adopting it.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I hope that further debate on the ten regiment bill will not be prosecuted until a certain matter now pending, and to which I may not at present further refer, shall have been decided in one way or another. I have no disposition to defer the consideration of the bill, but in my judgment it is important that the matter to which I have alluded should be decided before this military bill be taken up.

Mr. CASS.—I do not understand at all how any motion in secret session can have any relation to this bill. There is no necessity to affect mystery where there is none. The whole world knows that a minister goes shortly to Mexico.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The whole world knows what?

Mr. CASS.—That somebody goes to Mexico with a certain paper. There are two very special reasons why we should act on this bill promptly. We should be prepared for the most vigorous prosecution of the war if that paper should be rejected by Mexico. We all know that the government of Mexico is tottering and unstable—we all know the difficulties to which it is exposed—and therefore we ought to be prepared, in the event of the failure, to ratify the treaty. We know of what elements the Mexican nation, like all other nations, is composed. We ought to satisfy them that we intend to prosecute the war with the utmost vigor in order to hold out powerful motives for the ratification of the treaty.—When asked the other day if my object was to frighten Mexico, I answered that it was by all means. It is a great deal more humane to frighten than to fight the Mexicans. It is also more economical. The object of all wars is to compel a treaty of peace; and that great object is best to be attained by satisfying your enemy of the injuries to which they must inevitably be exposed by continued resistance. Our true policy now obviously is, to adopt promptly the most vigorous measures, with the view of inducing the government of Mexico to ratify the treaty, and the people of Mexico to observe it when it is made. Who can deny that if the intelligence of the passage of this bill accompanied the treaty, it would exercise an all-important influence in the ratification of the treaty? The next best thing for us to do is, the prompt passage of the bill. I trust it will be promptly passed, and as I should hope, unanimously.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I merely desire to know to what treaty the honorable gentleman alluded?

Mr. CASS.—I am really at a loss to know why any mystery should be affected in this matter. I suppose that there is somewhere a certain paper, and that the world knows all about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Does the Senator make any specific motion?

Mr. CASS.—I move that the prior order be postponed, and that this bill be taken up.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The object of the Senator may be perhaps obtained, and the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts be removed, if the motion just made be withdrawn, in order that I may be allowed to submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CASS.—I have no objection if that hasten the conclusion of the matter, and enable gentlemen to vote upon it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I move then that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Before the question is put, I beg that the gentleman will withdraw his motion, in order to allow me to make one. A good deal of important business, and some of it of rather an urgent nature, as I am informed is before the Committee on Foreign Relations. We have, this morning, removed the head of that committee by appointing him to another office, and the gentleman next to him on the list of members of the committee declines taking the place of chairman. I suppose that the usual course—at all events, that it is entirely proper, that the gentleman who stands next, the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] should be appointed to that place. I move that he be appointed.

It was then

Ordered, That Mr. HANNEGAN be appointed chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the place of Mr. SEVIER, and the vacancy in the committee be filled by the appointment of the PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. MASON was accordingly appointed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is necessary to make some disposition of the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Let it be laid over informally.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I am of course unwilling to insist on the consideration of this bill, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs wishes to go on with the regular order of the day; and I would give way for that purpose. But I should very much regret that the Senate should, for any other purpose, postpone the consideration of this bill, on which speedy action is necessary, as some branches of the public service must suffer in case its passage should be delayed. The ten regiment bill has of course the right of priority, and to it I am prepared to yield. But I now rise to give notice that I shall to-morrow request the Senate to resume the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CASS.—I have already stated my own views, and will cheerfully consent to the request of the gentleman so far as regards myself. My great object is to obtain the immediate passage of the bill.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed till to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I renew my motion.

The motion being agreed to, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1848.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR BUTLER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. ANDREW H. BUTLER, resigning his seat in the Senate of the United States; which was read.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the VICE PRESIDENT be requested to inform the Executive of the State of Arkansas that the Hon. ANDREW H. BUTLER has this day resigned his seat in the Senate.

REPORT FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, made agreeably to law, accompanied by a statement from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1847.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, praying the adoption of measures for the reestablishment of Peace between the United States and Mexico; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the United States' army may be recalled from Mexico and peace established with that republic; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania praying the establishment of a mail-route from Providence to Tolton in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Leonard Gray, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of citizens of Clarke county, Alabama, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Wilderness Post Office to Mott's Post Office in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of T. L. Smith, praying a grant of land to the Eufaula and Geneva Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Eufaula to Pensacola; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMPENSATION TO JAMES MOORE.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate allow and pay out of the Contingent Fund of the Senate to James Moore, the usual per diem compensation that is now allowed and paid to the messengers and door-keepers of the Senate for services performed by the said messengers from the 7th October, 1846, to the present time.

TEXAS BONDS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Dawson, James Schott, and Elisha Dana Whitney, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the petition of Leslie Combs, submitted a report which was ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the widow and legal representatives of Reuben Lassiter, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered be printed.

BILLS FILED.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Mitchell, and for the relief of John Manley, reported them without amendment.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DOUGLAS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish the Territory of Nebraska; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMERICAN HEMP FOR THE USE OF THE NAVY.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution to promote the purchase of American hemp for the use of the American Navy; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed bills of the following titles:

An act relating to the collection district of New Orleans; and for other purposes:

An act to change the name of Photius Kavanaugh to that of Photius Fisk;

In which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate to provide additional examiners in the Patent Office and for other purposes; and

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

COMMODORE PARKER.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Commodore Foxall A. Parker of the United States Navy: and

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Sarah Stokes, widow of John Stokes; for the relief of Esther Russell; for the relief of Jonathan Moore, of the State of Massachusetts; for the relief of Robert Ellis; and for the relief of Catharine Fulton of Washington county, Pennsylvania, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bills from the House of Representatives relating to the collection district of New Orleans and for other purposes; and for the relief of the Red River Railroad Company, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Stalker and Hill; and for the relief of Reuben Perry and Thomas P. Ligon, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the benefit of Benjamin White, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Anthony Bessee; and for the relief of Charles Cappell, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of G. F. de la Roche and W. P. S. Sanger, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bills from the House of Representatives to change the name of Photius Kavasales to that of Photius Fisk; and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States, and for other purposes," passed 8th August, 1846, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives for the relief of George R. Smith, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BAGBY gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to bring in a bill relating to the public lands.

JOHN PAUL JONES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

CLAIMS ON MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution to create a board to ascertain and determine the amount of each of the claims of the citizens of the United States against Mexico; and

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

Mr. CASS then moved that the prior orders of the day be postponed, and that the bill making provisions for an increase of the regular army be taken up; which was agreed to.

The question pending being the motion by Mr. BUTLER to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

"That the regular army shall be increased as follows, to wit: To each company of artillery, infantry, and regiment of riflemen, there shall be added [——] privates, and to each of the regiments aforesaid, a second lieutenant, a well qualified non-commissioned sergeant, and two second lieutenants, respectively. Provided, That the additional force shall be required to serve during the war with Mexico, but may be sooner discharged by order of the President."

The yeas and nays were demanded, by Mr. BREESE, and being seconded, were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Cuthbert, Davis, of Mass., Dayton, Greene, Hale, Mangum, Phelps, Underwood—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Barrow, Bradbury, Breese, Cameron, Cass, Dix, Dodge, of Iowa, Dodge, of Wis., Downs, Fitzgerald, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Johnson, of La., Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—25.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. CALHOUN said: I had no anticipation that this bill would be put upon its passage to-day. I have had no opportunity of being heard upon it, and I desire to offer my views before it be passed. With this view, I hope it may be laid over till to-morrow. I move that it be laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. CASS.—I have merely to observe that if the gentleman wishes to offer some remarks on the bill, I will hear him with great pleasure. But the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] has the floor.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I had forgotten that, and of course I do not desire to be heard before the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MASON.—When this bill was under the consideration of the Senate, some three weeks since, the debate was made to embrace the entire subject connected with the origin of the war, and its conduct on the part of the government of the United States. It was my purpose then to have gone into the debate to the extent to which it had then proceeded. But since that time events have transpired—perfectly well known to the country—which would, in my judgment, render it inexpedient, if not impossible, to present views intended for a totally different state of the case. What these events are, I may not be perhaps permitted to allude to here, further than as they have gone forth to the country on well accredited rumor. But, sir, I have not yet heard that a peace has been made with Mexico. If such be the fact, I am uninformed of it. That a negotiation may be pending may be true—that an armistice exists between the two contending armies may be true. But if that be true, it exists only on a rumor, which, as I have said, is so well accredited as to render it in bad taste to speak of one who was an enemy in the terms in which I should have been disposed to do on a former occasion. I have said that so far as I am informed there is as yet no peace with Mexico. Now if such be the fact, where is the policy—where is the wisdom of refusing to pass this bill? If negotiations, with a view to peace, are pending, have we not had such experience of the character of that foe with whom we were once, and may be again, engaged in warfare, as teaches us the necessity of all proper precaution now? Do we not know that if Mexico be brought to listen to the terms of peace, it will be because she has been prostrated and rendered powerless by the force of our arms? Do we not know that up to a very late period, with a perfect consciousness that it must be madness to resist longer, the spirit of every party in Mexico was averse to a peace? A spirit of infatuation seemed to pervade them to the last moment, when they were forced to submit to the stern lesson of inferiority. Now who can doubt—I submit to Senators around me and to the country—who can doubt that if Mexico should acquire fresh confidence from any occurrences here, nothing would be so likely to be seized upon by her, as a determination on the part of this Senate to stop where we were, and refrain from making any further provision to carry on a war? We have learned that Mexico is a wily and a faithless foe. What was her conduct with regard to the mission that was sent to her, on her own invitation before the war began, and which was promptly acceded to with the view of preventing hostilities? She invited a minister and promised to receive him. He was sent—sent speedily in order to evince the earnest desire on the part of this government to prevent a war. The discourteous reception with which that minister met is known. The Mexican government denied that his mission was even anticipated! Procrastinating, delaying, Mexico sought refuge in every possible expedient, and attributed our indulgence to pusillanimity and weakness. The minister was instructed to remain and to preserve the equanimity of his temper in all his intercourse with Mexico, to avoid a collision, and, if possible, to adjust by negotiation the difficulties pending between the two countries. But our minister was compelled to return from his bootless mission. Again, how was it after the war had commenced, and when our armies were thundering at the gates of Mexico? A faithless armistice was proposed. Mexico sought a suspension of hostilities with a view to negotiation. It is now known to history that in violation of the stipulations of that armistice, every hour was employed in strengthening their defences with a view to carrying on the war.—Such is the character of this foe. Now, whether there be or be not a peace resulting from the negotiation now spoken of as pending, is a tale yet untold of time; and he is a bold man, who, knowing what is now known, will venture to form a deliberate judgment that peace will follow. My own decided impression, then, is, that every consideration of prudence and wise policy demands that this bill should pass, and pass immediately. I had made up my mind not to enter into the subject matter of the former debate. It would be unsuited to the occasion to do so. I hope that the time has gone by for the discussion of that question, but the time has not gone by for those military measures which should be prosecuted promptly, in order to evince such a determination on our part as will compel the Mexican government to declare an honest and bona fide cessation of hostilities. I have risen merely for the purpose of expressing that opinion. I trust that there will not be any debate further than that indicated by the Senator from South Carolina; but should there be any new debate, I may enter into it when it arises.

Mr. BADGER moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CASS.—I hope that the Senate will not agree to that motion. It appears to me that there is business of vastly more importance to be acted on in open session.

The yeas and nays were demanded on the question, and being seconded, were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Cuthbert, Davis, of Mass., Greene, Hale, Johnson, of La., Mangum, Phelps, Underwood—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Barrow, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Dix, of Me., Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, of Iowa, Dodge, of Wis., Downs, Fitzgerald, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—26.

The motion was therefore not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, rose and remarked, that not being present when the question was put, he had voted under a misapprehension; he did not know that the vote was taken on the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] or he would have voted for it; that from what had recently occurred, he could not now believe that the additional regiments contemplated by the bill under consideration, would be required at all; under existing circumstances, therefore, he preferred that provision for an increase of the United States army should be made in the manner proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, by filling up the old regiments. He would not, however, in consequence of the large majority against the proposition, move a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. MANGUM.—I move to postpone the farther consideration of this bill till this day fortnight. It is true I have very little hope that this motion will prevail; and yet I cannot well suppress the expression of my great surprise—I might almost say my astonishment, that this bill is pressed at this time, in the spirit which has been manifested in the circumstances by which we are now surrounded. It is probable that there are many other gentlemen who desire to be heard on this subject, and yet it is perfectly well known that the phases of public business have undergone a very great change, although we are inhibited by circumstances from explaining the how or wherefore. It seems to me that as a matter of taste, not to speak of policy, it cannot but be regarded as most extraordinary to press this bill in this spirit at the present moment. At all events, allow a week or two weeks to elapse and then dispose of the question. It would be very important, it seems to me, that we should go into Executive session before we are called upon to take the vote upon the question now before us. But it is refused to go into Executive session—refused by an overwhelming majority of this body. And yet gentlemen are to be tongue-tied; they are to be prohibited from making any reference to matters which are of essential importance in the consideration of this very question. We are called on to occupy the same ground as was presented six weeks ago, although it is known that the ground is changed. We are to be put absolutely in duresse by the manner in which this question is now brought forward. It is of great and obvious importance that we should be enabled to refer to things as they are. It certainly strikes me as the most extraordinary proceeding I have ever witnessed, when we are called upon to act on this subject as if we stood precisely on the same ground that we did six weeks ago. Not a battle has been fought since last fall. Our troops repose in Mexico perfectly at their ease. We have forty thousand men there, and there is not a thousand armed men in the whole republic of Mexico to oppose them. There is not even the rumor of an assault; and yet in that state of things, and when you can fill up the regiments now organized to sixty thousand men, we are called upon and pressed to send ten thousand additional troops to Mexico! Why, sir, is it not apparent that that augmentation of our military force can have no reference to the Mexican war, whatever bearing it may have upon Executive patronage? I impute none but patriotic motives to the honorable chairman of the Military Committee, but so far as regards the acceleration of peace, or the termination of the war—so far as regards any purpose for which those ten regiments might be required in Mexico, I think if we were permitted to go into this subject, and as we all know it now to exist, it would be utterly impossible to discover even the shadow of propriety for such a procedure at this time in all the circumstances of the case. At all events, if this question is to be pressed against my convictions of propriety—against my conviction also, that it would be in violation of the pretty well established usage of this body, it will change essentially my views and conduct upon another question that will come before us. I hope, judging from what I have seen heretofore, that these considerations will work out such a conviction upon the minds of at least a sufficient number, that we may be allowed to speak fully of all we know, and all that is pertinent to the matter now under consideration, and is submitted to us for discussion in open session. I cannot believe that if this appeal were put properly before the President and heads of departments, embracing the consideration of another question which must be acted on in another capacity, and which must bring upon them embarrassment in its full weight, that all warlike operations and movements would be suspended for the present. But the truth is, that when parties become harnessed, to use a cant phrase, they generally "go it blind." I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to let us have an opportunity of speaking to this subject in open day, and with all the light which can be brought to bear upon it. I appeal to the magnanimity—to the sense of justice of Senators on the other side of the chamber—and I hope that there is no necessity of making any appeal to a single Senator on this side—to free those who wish to speak on this subject, from the duresse and the chains in which they are now placed. I cannot believe, that if the matter were properly considered, there would be a persistence in this course at this time. The going into Executive session is refused by a very large majority ———

Mr. BENTON.—Will the Senator hear one word? I voted against going into Executive session, because a bill of the highest importance is pending, which we wish to take up.

Mr. MANGUM.—If the bill to which the honorable Senator alluded be called up, and it is, as I hear, of importance, I shall certainly be in favor of proceeding with it.

Mr. CALHOUN, (in his seat.)—Move to lay this bill on the table.

Mr. MANGUM.—I will vary my motion, but may have occasion again to renew it. I move that the bill lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator from North Carolina has expressed a good deal of surprise—

Mr. HALE.—Is this motion debateable?

Mr. CASS.—Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. MANGUM.—Certainly.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator has expressed surprise that this bill which has been under consideration for a period of three months, should be pressed to a vote. I confess that I cannot understand the grounds of the gentleman's surprise. The bill has been discussed to the fullest extent on both sides of the chamber during the last three months, yet the gentleman from North Carolina talks of haste.

Mr. MANGUM.—It has been in dry-dock for three weeks; and the Senator will recollect that the signs of the times have changed.

Mr. CASS.—It has been in the dry dock for three weeks! Well, it is now time that it was afloat upon the ocean. But I have not the slightest conception of what it is to which the gentleman alludes when he speaks of gagging. He seems to suppose that we must go into executive session before we proceed to act upon this bill. Well, I can only conjecture the bearing which an executive session can have upon this subject. It is supposed out of doors that we have ratified a certain instrument—that the two great parties of the Senate have been divided—that we stood pro and con—and that we want to explain ourselves—unusually, for what that has to do with this bill passes my comprehension. It is simply a question whether we shall raise this additional force for two purposes; first, to be ready for the immediate prosecution of hostilities in the event of the rejection of the treaty by Mexico—quite a possible result from the unstable nature of her government, and the irritated feelings of her people; and perhaps I might say, that it is a probable result, at all events every thing admonishes us of the necessity of being prepared; and second, that we may send out with our minister the vote of preparation—the intelligence that, in the event of a refusal of the treaty, we are ready to prosecute the war with the utmost vigor. Our own eagle presents the illustration of our policy—the olive branch and the arrows—the one to be used if we may, the other if we must. I trust that this bill will be passed by the unanimous vote of both houses. If it should be thus passed immediately, I have no more doubt than I have of my own existence, that we should have peace. Without the passage of this bill, I do not undertake to say how long peace may be deferred. But I repeat, suppose the supposition is correct, and that you go on to ratify this paper, I might rather say as the public says, to negotiate ———

Mr. MANGUM.—I hold that that supposition is entirely out of order. It is not to be entertained in open session that any thing at all has been done in secret session. I make a question of order.

Mr. CASS.—I have only to say then, that if we have not a right to suppose anything here, I do not know what right appertains to a Senator.

Mr. MANGUM.—I might suppose a thousand things might have happened in a correspondence, and the supposition might conform exactly to the fact, and if that be in order, I see no sort of objection to opening this discussion without any further action. But if I happened to be mistaken ———

Mr. CASS.—The Senator himself introduced the whole thing distinctly and openly so that no one could misunderstand him. Unless we affect a spirit of mysticism unbecoming us and the occasion, it is utterly impossible to avoid allusions to what is known to all.

Mr. MANGUM.—I renew my motion. It is with no purpose of embarrassment that I make this motion.

Mr. ALLEN.—I should like to know the object of laying the bill on the table.

Mr. MANGUM.—That the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] may call up the appropriation bill.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator from Missouri has not, as I understand, intimated such a design.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Proceed with the call.

The ayes and noes were demanded, and being seconded, were taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bateman Bell, Benton, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Cutlenden, Dayton, Greene, Hale, Jeamon, of Louisiana, Mangum, Miller, Phelps, Underwood, Webster—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Atherton, Bagby, Barton, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Cameron, Cass, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, of Iowa, Dodge, of Wisconsin, Downs, Felch, Foote, Huntington, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Pearce, Sturgeon, Tallmadge—27.

The question again recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BALDWIN.—I regret that this bill should be pressed at this time for many reasons, some of them known to Senators, but which I am not at liberty to state in open session. I can perceive no reason for its passage, and am utterly opposed to it. There is not only, in my judgment, no necessity for this augmentation of our forces in Mexico, but hardly a plausible apology even, for the Executive patronage it will create.

All our advices from Mexico show that the war is virtually at an end. There are no more battles to be fought—no new trophies to be acquired. Our sister republic, with institutions professedly based on the same principles as our own, to whom, in her early career, the warmest sympathies of the American people were extended, now lies prostrate and crushed to the earth by our invading army. Her government, driven from place to place, has hardly been able to find a resting spot where it could remain long enough even to consider the question of peace. She exhibits the sad spectacle of a nation of seven millions of people dissociated and disorganized, with scarcely a form of government existing, and all the functions of her general and local administration conducted or controlled under the influence of martial law.

Our gallant army, sir, has only paused in its career of victory because it has found no enemy to oppose its progress; and instead of being employed, at the present moment, in waging battle against an enemy, it is occupied in the ignoble employment of collecting military contributions for its own support from an impoverished people. They have not only seized upon the revenues which have hitherto been relied upon for the support of the government of that republic, but they have also seized upon all the means appropriated to the support of her municipal institutions, and diverted those means from their proper use. Are we to send new troops to Mexico to aid in this employment—is there any necessity for additional troops for such a purpose? What army is there in Mexico for our troops, now there, to combat? What resistance are they meeting with? If there be any reliance to be placed upon the rumors which we have to-day from Mexico, an armistice now exists, rendering entirely unnecessary any addition to our military force, at the present time. Sir, the country is looking to peace; the people in every part of it are anxiously desiring, and hoping for, peace; they are expecting any thing, rather than an augmentation of our present forces in Mexico. Nay, sir, I believe that, at this moment, the people of the United States are expecting that instead of augmenting our forces, measures will be taken for withdrawing the troops already there, as speedily as may be, consistently with the public interests. Nobody out of this Hall has anticipated a movement of this description. Why the streets and avenues of this city are filled with officers returning from Mexico, because they have found no further employment there; and a portion of those who remain finding no enemy to fight with, seem to be turning their hostilities against each other. For what useful purpose, I ask again, can this large armed force be raised and sent to Mexico? Is it, sir, for the purpose indicated in the message of the President? Are we called on to send this large force to Mexico,—not for the purpose of compelling that government to do justice to our injured citizens, but to dismember itself and cede to us a portion of the territories of the republic? If so, it is for an object which does not meet with my concurrence, and one which I cannot give my vote to sustain. I want, sir, none of the Mexican territory; my constituents do not want it; I do not believe the country wants it. The country desires peace, and a settlement of the existing controversy with Mexico, upon fair and just terms of indemnity for the injuries that have been done to our citizens. If Mexico has inflicted any wrong for which the honor of this country required that she should be punished, surely we have obtained our full measure of redress. If we are called on to prosecute this war for any legitimate purpose, it is simply to obtain redress from the Mexican republic for wrongs done to our citizens. Now, I believe these wrongs can be redressed without sending an army to Mexico in addition to the large force already there. I believe that Mexico would be ready at any moment to accede to such terms as this government may dictate, having for their object simply a just indemnity for the wrongs committed by her. If there is any reluctance on the part of that government to make a peace upon the terms proposed by us, that reluctance will arise, not from any unwillingness, under existing circumstances, to provide for our just claims, but from an unwillingness to cede to us, for a price to be paid to her, a portion of the territories and people of that republic, without their consent, to be governed by us.

I am not willing thus to acquire territory from Mexico, whether it be deemed an acquisition by conquest or by purchase; for, sir, our government has hitherto prided itself on having adopted the principle of demanding nothing but what is right, and submitting to nothing that is wrong. Will any Senator say, that it is not demanding something which is not right to go beyond the fair and just claim which we have against Mexico, and compel her to cede to us, by a forced sale, a portion of her territory? On what principle can this be justified? On what principle can the President ask us to send additional troops to Mexico, for the purpose of driving a bargain with her, in the purchase of her territory? And yet this we must infer to be the object of the President, from the language made use of in his message. Indeed, he states explicitly that his object is the acquisition of territory, and that Congress have participated in this desire, or they would not have made to him the liberal grants they have made of men and money, in compliance with his request. Sir, is it our object to acquire territory? Is this the object of Congress? I am not now addressing myself to the Senate as a co-ordinate branch of the treaty-making power, but as a co-ordinate branch of the Congress of the United States; and I ask whether it is the intention of the Congress of the United States to prosecute the war against Mexico for the purpose of compelling her to cede to us a portion of her territory for such price as we may choose to offer? This is the question. And it addresses itself to us as members of the legislative department of the government, and not as a co-ordinate branch of the treaty-making power.

Sir, for what purpose was this war declared? The constitution, which authorizes Congress to declare war, seems to contemplate, by the language it uses, a declaration of the causes and purposes for which the war is to be waged. The language in the constitution was used in reference to the common usage of nations, in ancient as well as in modern times. At the commencement of a war, it has been usual to set forth its causes and purposes by a public declaration. Hence, when the constitution says that Congress shall "declare war," it must be deemed to intend that Congress shall not merely enact that the fact exists, but shall set forth by a declaration such as the usage of nations sanctions, the causes of the war, and the purposes for which it is waged. A mere commencement of hostilities of armies brought suddenly into conflict with each other, without the prior act of the government of either party, does not constitute war. It must first receive the sanction of some authorized declaration; and in the case of the Mexican republic and our own, it must have received the sanction of one or the other of those governments before a state of war could exist. What, sir, was the immediate origin of this war, and how did it commence? unquestionably it was owing to the advance of Gen. Taylor to the Rio Grande. And the Executive in ordering that advance, appears to have deliberately determined that any hostile act, or menace even, of hostilities, to which it might lead, on the part of the Mexican forces on the other side of the river, should be regarded as amounting, in effect, to a declaration of war by the Mexican government; and the Secretary of War therefore instructed General Taylor when he was about to approach the Rio Grande with the American army, that if he was attacked or menaced so as to render it proper, in his judgment, to repel the assault, he was not to act merely on the defensive, but to carry on "aggressive operations," "and, if deemed practicable and expedient, to take and hold possession of Matamoras and other places in Mexico." That, sir, was the language of the Secretary of War when ordering General Taylor to advance to the Rio Grande, while Congress was in session, and peace was subsisting between the United States and Mexico; a measure, of which it is apparent he contemplated at the time aggressive war as the probable result. Unquestionably, sir, it would not have been the duty of General Taylor, if attacked or menaced by a hostile army, simply to ward off the impending blow, and await another attack. The principles of self-defence would have justified him in every measure deemed necessary for the protection and security of his command.

But by what authority, I ask, was he authorized by the Executive, in anticipation of his advance to the Rio Grande, to do more this? not only to do all that might be necessary or proper for defence, but to engage in "aggressive operations" in Mexico? and yet it must be obvious to all who will read the correspondence, that from the time General Taylor was ordered to move to the Rio Grande, every step he was directed to take was with the view and expectation that it might lead to hostilities; and in that event, to the prosecution of an aggressive war. I will not now occupy the time of the Senate by referring minutely to the correspondence showing this to have been the design of the government, but no one can read it with attention and mistake the object. I refer particularly to the letters of the Secretary of War to General Taylor under date of August 30th, 1845, of January 13th, and March 2d, 1846.

Now I deny that it was in the power of the Executive department of the government to authorize the commanding general to engage in "aggressive operations." Everything that was necessary to repel the attack of a foreign enemy or to defend the army of General Taylor, it was the duty of the Executive to authorize the commanding general to do. But to carry on "aggressive operations" implies something more; it implies a determination on the part of the Executive department, to avail itself of the first movement of hostility or menace, as a justification for open and aggressive warfare for other purposes, upon the territories of a sister republic. This, sir, pertains to Congress, and to Congress alone. Would Congress at that time have declared this war for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction from the Mexican republic of the claims of our citizens? No one believes it. It would be inconsistent with the whole course of policy that has been pursued, and the conventions that have been formed and acted upon by both governments with regard to these claims. In 1839, the two governments entered into a convention for the adjustment of the claims of our citizens. In 1843, there was another convention, and in 1844, another, which was only left incomplete by the interruption of diplomatic relations, occasioned by the annexation of Texas. Sir, at the very time that this government was taking steps for the annexation of Texas, the Mexican government, according to the statement of our own minister at Mexico, was adopting all the means in its power to enable it to meet its engagements.

And but for the consequences which resulted from the annexation of Texas to this Union, there can be little doubt that the terms of that convention would have been faithfully fulfilled. Although it is unquestionably true, that the Mexican government has committed many and flagrant wrongs upon our citizens—wrongs which have been aggravated by her long and unreasonable denial of justice, during a period when she had the ability to make satisfaction for them, I am nevertheless of the opinion, that Mexico also, was not without just cause of complaint against our own government, in respect to the measures which were pursued against her earnest remonstrances, for the annexation of Texas, while at war with that republic. And, in my opinion, these causes of complaint have a material bearing upon the question, as to the terms which it would be honorable for us to demand, and just for Mexico to yield, in the settlement of this controversy. When Texas was annexed to this union, and when the preliminary steps for annexation were taken, we had a treaty of peace with Mexico which bound us in good faith to do nothing to violate its letter or spirit. I have said, that at the time of the annexation of Texas, in disregard of the remonstrances of the Mexican minister, there is reasonto believe that Mexico was exerting herself to the utmost of her power, involved as she was with her immense debt, of $150,000,000, to come to an honorable adjustment and satisfaction of our claims. In September 1844, the American minister at Mexico, wrote to Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, that the two last instalments were paid, and—

"That he was inclined to believe that that government would thereafter be more prompt in meeting its engagements under the treaty, than it had heretofore been—and if it should turn out otherwise, it will be owing to a real inability to raise the means."

And in a letter dated, July 2, 1845, he says, that in an interview with Santa Anna, on the 12th of September—

"He assured him that he had caused arrangements to be made, which would enable the government to meet the future instalments promptly as they fell due."

And Santa Anna, himself, in a letter to Charles Callaghan of New York, dated Havanna, November 19, 1845, declares—

"That as the treasury, at the period when he entered into office, was but a skeleton, he imposed a forced loan on the whole nation, so that each and every one of the citizens, should contribute according to his means, to the payment of a debt which had already become sacred to Mexico."

Our recognition of the independence of Texas was rightful, and gave no just cause of complaint to Mexico. She was in fact independent, and whether so de jure or not, it was not for us to inquire. But it was no less the right of Mexico, if she deemed it proper, to continue her war with Texas, till it should be terminated by a satisfactory treaty of peace. And our treaty obligations of friendship with Mexico were incompatible with an alliance with her enemy, much more with her incorporation into the Union.

Such was the opinion of President Van Buren and his administration in 1837, when the first proposition was made for the annexation of Texas:

"Sir Long," said Mr. Forsyth, in his note to General Hunt, "as Texas shall remain at war, while the United States are at peace with her adversary, the proposition of the Texan minister plenipotentiary, necessarily involves the question of war with that adversary. The United States are bound by treaty of amity and commerce, who knows how many years to come, to maintain peace and friendship with Mexico. Mexico, on various occasions, and especially since the date of the Texan proposition, has manifested a sensitiveness, and a determination to resent any attempt on the part of the United States to violate the spirit of the treaty for the purpose of the conquest, or dismemberment, of Mexico. Under these circumstances, I have only to express to you my conviction that the proposition of the Texan minister plenipotentiary, if taken into consideration, as this would imply a disposition on our part to espouse the quarrel of Texas with Mexico, and consequently would be tantamount to a declaration of war against the uniform policy and the obvious interest of the United States."

When in 1845, the United States, regardless of these considerations, and of the remonstrances of the Mexican minister, identified her interests with those of Texas, while the latter republic was at war with Mexico, it cannot be denied that Mexico had some cause to suspend her diplomatic intercourse. The grievances of which she complained were deeply felt by her people—the more deeply, because the avowed object of the United States was to perpetuate the domain of slavery over the immense and fertile regions which Mexico had declared should be forever free. This was clearly avowed in all the correspondence of our government with the public functionaries of Texas; and indeed it was distinctly declared by Mr. Upshur, then Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Murphy, of the 8th of August, 1843, that few calamities could befal this country more to be deplored than the abolition, under British influence, of domestic slavery in Texas.

What could be adopted in a higher degree to excite feelings of deep and settled hostility in the minds of the Mexican people, than to witness the consummation of the dismemberment of their republic by the annexation of Texas to the Union, for such a cause?

Yet, notwithstanding the war continued between Mexico and Texas—notwithstanding the right of Mexico to resubjugate Texas if she could, had been distinctly acknowledged by our government—the annexation of Texas was deemed so important for the protection of the peculiar institutions of the south, that the United States were willing to effect it even at the hazard of war. Its value was deemed incalculable, and the emergency too pressing to wait for consent.

But though the annexation of Texas gave just cause of complaint to Mexico, as an act incompatible with our treaty stipulations, it did not in my opinion create, though it gave occasion for the war, which now exists between Mexico and the United States. Texas, from the time of her annexation, ceased to be a power capable of holding relations of peace or war. Her separate existence was merged in the Union; and it was for Mexico to decide, whether she would regard a measure which deprived her of the power of resubjugating her revolted province, or of treating with her on the terms of separation, as an act of war on our part or not.

She had a substantial interest in that question. Her revolted province—for Mexico was at that time indebted to a vast amount, an amount estimated by Mr. Slidell at $150,000,000, and Texas as a member of the confederacy was justly bound for her share, as well for the claims of our own citizens, most of which originated long anterior to the separation of Texas. By the annexation of Texas, and her incorporation into this Union, the necessary result was that she lost the character of a nation capable of holding relations with foreign governments, and became so merged in our own, that Mexico lost the power of enforcing upon her a just contribution for the payment of her share of the indebtedness of the republic. Did it follow that because Texas had good cause of revolt against Mexico, good cause to recede from the confederacy of which she had been a member, that she could so leave it as to throw the whole burthen of the public debt upon the remaining states? No, sir, such a claim could be set up by Texas no more than by any state in this Union under similar circumstances. When, therefore, we received Texas into this Union we received her under such circumstances as between us and Mexico—a nation with whom we were at peace—as imposed, at least in my view, an obligation upon us to adjust this matter in regard to the liabilities of Texas, upon fair and equitable terms. It on a question of policy connected with the institutions of the United States—if for the protection or extension of the peculiar institutions of any section of our country—the annexation of Texas to the Union was deemed essential, if the emergency was so pressing and the fear of foreign influence so great as to induce us to risk the hazard even of a war to effect it—surely the government of the United States should be prepared to treat with Mexico in a spirit of liberality. They were so prepared, and I entertain no doubt that it was the design of the government at that time, to deal with her justly and liberally—so far forth as an injury of this character could be repaired by a pecuniary consideration. I have said before, and I will repeat it, I do not believe that the government of the United States at that time intended that war should be the result. I believe they intended to satisfy Mexico for the injury they had done her by the annexation of Texas, and to do it without any interruption of the amicable relations which then existed between the two governments. I believe that to have been the intention of this government originally, whether it was so when Mr. Slidell was sent to Mexico or not.

In regard to the instructions given to Mr. Slidell I am not at liberty to speak, except so far as the President, in his message to Congress, has informed us. The President says that Mr. Slidell was authorized to come to a fair settlement upon liberal terms; those terms of course were never communicated to the Mexican government, because they refused to recognize Mr. Slidell in the capacity of a resident minister, in which he was sent—instead of that of a commissioner ad hoc, in which character alone the tottering government of Herrera had agreed to receive him. Sir, it is a remarkable fact that at the very time, November, 1845, when Mr. Slidell was sent, as a minister of peace, to renew our diplomatic relations with Mexico, ostensibly with a view to an amicable adjustment, the administration also sent Capt. Gillespie "to watch over American interests in California." And if we are to reason as to motives from results, it was with a view to a revolutionary movement in that department, with the ultimate design of annexing it to the United States. Now, if the mission of Mr. Slidell was really a mission of peace, if it were designed as such, it seems to me that the course pursued by the administration in sending General Taylor to the Rio Grande and Capt. Gillespie to California are indicative of a very different spirit on the part of this government, though without any act of the American Congress to warrant it. It wears the appearance, certainly, of an intention on the part of the administration to bring on a war. As the result of that policy the country became involved in war. I am not now going to enter minutely into the manner in which the war commenced. I look at the general causes which were brought to bear upon the policy of the two governments and to the results which they produced. But when war was declared by Congress in consequence of the conflict which ensued between the two armies stationed on opposite sides of the Rio Grande, the question arose what were the equitable and just terms for settling the controversy. Texas, before she came into the Union as we have been informed, was at one time prepared to stipulate for the payment of five millions of dollars to British bondholders towards the payment of the public debt, if Mexico could be induced thereby to recognize her independence. Coming into this Union she is relieved from this obligation, and Mexico is left to bear the burden of the whole debt, including the claims of our citizens, which was before a common charge upon all the departments of that republic. Mexico has a right then—a right which justice requires this government to recognize—to expect, that, in any estimate that may be made of her claims at the inception of the war, the obligations of Texas for the liabilities of Mexico, at the time of her annexation to the Union, should be fairly considered. Well, sir, what else is there that Mexico could fairly claim to have taken into the account? The President has declared that to the United States the annexation of Texas was a boon of incalculable value. Was the same equally true of Mexico? If to the United States, was it not also a loss to Mexico?—a loss to be fairly considered in the adjustment of the controversy? Now, I believe that when the instructions given to Mr. Shannon shall be communicated to us, it will appear that our government were then willing to adjust in a spirit of liberality, the incipient controversy with Mexico, and thus obtain her assent to the annexation of Texas without the long and bloody conflict. Now what do we ask?

What were the limits of Texas at the time of her annexation? I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that Texas had no title which she could transfer to the government of the United States beyond her original limits, and the territory then in her immediate and actual possession. Texas revolted as a department of the Mexican government. She rightfully revolted, and maintained her independence within the boundary which originally pertained to her. She claimed but she acquired beyond she must have acquired by conquest. And to the validity of such a title, it is essential that the whole of the territory thus claimed must have been in actual possession, and under the absolute control of the conquering party, and abandoned by the power which originally claimed it. So far as the unoccupied territory is concerned, the possession and title are presumed still to pertain to the government to which it belonged but she claimed to have Congress have been passed, since the war commenced, recognizing it as a part of the State of Texas.

Now, sir, in the settlement between the United States and Mexico, I ask if we obtain a relinquishment of all claims which the government of Mexico and the department of Tamaulipas may have to this territory between the Rio Grande and the Nueces, and also, in addition to this, the right to the navigation of the Rio Grande which General Taylor was instructed not to attempt to enforce, shall we not have a fair equivalent in value to the claims of our citizens now reduced in amount to a little more than five millions of dollars? In addition to this, a large amount has been collected by the army in Mexico from the revenues of that republic, and from contributions levied on the people, by order of the President, which ought to be regarded as a fund for the payment of the awards in favor of our citizens for which the taxes thus seized and appropriated without lawful authority, were pledged by the convention of January, 1843.

These, sir, are my views in regard to what is just between the United States and the Mexican republic in the settlement of this controversy. As to any claims of territorial cession, for which a price is to be paid in money to Mexico, I deny, sir, either that this government has a right to demand such cession, or that it would be proper or lawful for Mexico to make it. Mexico, it is conceded, has no public domain. The departments of New Mexico and California which the President desires to dissever from the Mexican republic, and in right of conquest or cession, to annex to our own, are members of that confederacy in the same manner as the States of this Union are united in our own. What then is their relation to that republic? In the message of the President of December 8, 1846, he says:

"In the year 1824, Mexico established a federal constitution under which the Mexican republic was composed of a number of sovereign States, confederated together in a federal union similar to our own. Each of these States had its own executive, legislature, and judiciary, and for all except federal purposes, was an independent of the general government, and that of the other States, as is Pennsylvania and Virginia under our constitution."

That constitution is now in force. It confers no power on the republic to dismember itself or to cede away its confederate States. I have, heretofore, had occasion to refer to the law of nations on this subject, as stated by Vattel, and other European publicists of approved authority. I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I refer to the solemn acts of some of our own State Legislatures, and to the opinions expressed by some of our most eminent statesmen. On the 9th of February, 1830, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts declared by solemn resolution:

"That the government of the United States has no constitutional right to cede any portion of the territory of the States composing this Union to any foreign power, or to deprive any State of any land or other property without the consent of such State previously obtained; and that any act purporting to have such effect would be wholly null and void, and in no way obligatory upon the government or people of either of the said States."

The Legislature of the State of Maine on the 28th of February, 1839,

Resolved, "That the Constitution of the United States does not invest the General Government with unlimited and absolute powers, but confers only a special and modified sovereignty, without authority to cede to a foreign power any portion of territory belonging to a State without its consent."

The same doctrine after a full discussion in the cabinet council of General Washington, by Mr. Jefferson and General Hamilton, was framed and maintained in the instructions to Messrs. Carmichael and Short, prepared by Mr. Jefferson as Secretary of State on the 18th of March, 1792, in which the right of this government to dismember itself and to cede a portion of its territory to another government is emphatically denied.

I will not occupy the time of the Senate by adverting more particularly to documents which have heretofore been alluded to, and are well known to the Senate. But, sir, I ask for what purpose do we want Mexico to cede to us this territory. What great national interest requires the cession? Has Congress ever passed an act authorizing the Executive government, to purchase it, or obligating itself in any manner to prosecute the war for the acquisition of territory? Has Congress declared any great public object to exist rendering it necessary or proper to acquire possession of this territory. No, sir, the only act that Congress has passed on the subject is contained in the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas, prescribing as a condition of her admission into the Union, that the State be formed subject to the adjustment by this government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments. Did Congress at that time expect an enlargement of her territory? If so, why was Texas required to concede the right to this government to settle the question of her boundary with the government of Mexico. If the government of the United States then intended to assert an indefeasible right to the territory extending to the Rio Grande surely they would not have required the consent of Texas to the settlement of the boundary. No, sir, it was the expectation of Congress, at that time, that this question might be settled by taking less than Texas had included in her claim, by constituting what is called "the stupendous desert," between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, the boundary; and therefore it was required that Texas should give her consent. But has Congress in any manner sanctioned the project of adding New Mexico and California to the States of this Union? Is Congress prepared to carry on a war for the purpose of compelling Mexico to cede them. This, sir, is a question which, in my judgment, pertains to Congress, in co-operation with the treaty-making power, to decide, and not to the Executive alone. For I hold that the government of the United States cannot, for any purpose, add territory from a foreign nation unless it be for the accomplishment of some great national purpose, recognized by the constitution as one for which it is the duty of the government to provide. If it be deemed necessary for the purposes of defence, or for the protection of any great national interest for which Congress is authorized by the constitution to legislate, that foreign territory should be annexed, it is for Congress to decide whether such necessity exists before the Executive can be justified in treating for its acquisition. But for the purpose of bringing new States into the Union, or of extending our free institutions to a foreign population, the acquisition of territory is not warranted by the constitution.—If the power exists in the government of the United States, it is a power which must be found in the constitution, either as specifically granted or as essential or proper to carry into effect other powers which are granted. It may be essential to the security of a nation that a lawless and dangerous neighbor should not only be punished, but deprived of his point of attack. It may be essential to the preservation of a nation—to prevent its dismemberment—that additional territory should be acquired by peaceful negotiation, as was done in the case of the purchase of Louisiana. The immense and fertile regions of the west had no outlet for their commerce. The inhabitants were discontented and restless, and it was evident they could be retained in the Union only by the acquisition of the right to navigate the Mississippi. That right could only be obtained by the purchase of Louisiana. Mr. Jefferson availed himself of a fortunate opportunity to acquire it, though he did not regard the purchase as justified by any power conferred by the constitution. It was approved by Congress, and ratified by the acquiescence of the American people.

The acquisition of Florida was justified on a similar principle; and Texas was received into the Union by an act of Congress on the pretence, whether well founded or not, it is not my purpose now to inquire—that it was essential to the protection of a national interest.

But for the annexation of New Mexico and California to the Union, no such necessity exists. Their territories are comparatively of little value, and their acquisition is connected with no great public interest. New Mexico has been settled more than two hundred years. The soil, except on the immediate borders of the Rio Grande, is barren and unproductive. Her population is of the most degraded character, and is believed to have attained the maximum which the country can support. It is a population having no bond of sympathy to unite them with our own, and totally unfitted to be invested with the power of aiding in the government of this Union, and the regulation of the great commercial interests of the American people. Every acre of land within the limits of New Mexico capable of being applied, by irrigation, to agricultural purposes is already occupied. The climate is such as to prevent those modes of cultivation which are congenial to the habits of our people. The country is fit only for the residence of a Mexican or Indian population, such as has occupied it from its earliest settlement.

In regard to California, with the exception of the Bay of St. Francisco and the valley of the Sacramento, all who have explored that region agree that the territory is worthless. Its interior, says Col. Fremont, is little known. It is called a desert, and from what I saw of it, sterility may be said to be its prominent characteristic. It is peopled but miserably and sparsely. Humanity is there in its lowest form; the rabbit is the largest animal known in this desert; the wild sage tree their only wood. In extent it is said that it cannot be less than four or five hundred miles in each direction. Now, I ask, if we could compel Mexico to sell, or cede to us without buying, those territories, for what national purpose do we want them? Have we not an immense quantity of fertile land which has been for years in the market? The rich valleys of the Mississippi and the Missouri and other tributary streams are yet, to a great extent, unoccupied, and will be for years and years to come. Why do we want to purchase these immense wastes and add them to our already extended territories? Sir, it has been truly said that this government would not, in fifty years, be able to realize fifty thousand dollars from any land it could sell in those territories. San Francisco may indeed be valuable for purposes connected with commerce, but that place could be much more advantageously acquired by pacific negotiation. But in what, I ask, does the acquisition of these territories by purchase differ from acquisition by conquest? Suppose them to be valuable and that we were about to pay for them more than they were worth. The Mexican republic, as we learn from their public documents, have manifested very great reluctance to ceding any portion of those territories. They urged that the population of New Mexico was loyal to their government, and that it was incompatible with the principles upon which their confederacy was based, and with the dictates of common justice to that people to cede them with their territory to the United States. How can this doctrine be gainsayed by us? She is a sister republic, constituted on the same principles as our own. How does a cession forced from Mexico for a price, with the presence of our armies in her midst, differ in any respect from conquest?

I am, then, opposed to sending this additional force to Mexico, because I am opposed to the only purpose for which, in my judgment, such a force can be required. I hold a war of conquest for the purpose of acquiring dominion over another people, to be utterly inconsistent with the genius of our government, and the principles on which it is founded. But, sir, if I could resort to it in any case, I would scorn to do it at the expense of a feeble enemy like Mexico. How much more honorable would it be for this great nation to lift up our sister republic, now crushed to the earth by the power of our arms; and in a spirit of magnanimity and generosity to say to her, we will ask you for nothing but justice. To the extent of the just claims of our citizens we desire reparation and indemnity; but we scorn to take advantage of the position in which the fortune of war has placed us, to extort a bargain, or assert a claim to which, on the principles of your own constitution and ours you have no power to yield. But, sir, so far from it being a desirable object to acquire these territories, to be incorporated as states into our Union, if it were left to me to decide upon the acquisition, I would pay millions to get rid of them, rather than pay a dollar for their possession. Not only will the acquisition be injurious to us by bringing new states into the Union, with a population utterly unfitted to the exercise of power in our government, but it will necessarily introduce causes of domestic disquiet and disunion, which will agitate this country from one end of it to the other. The free states, sir, will never consent to any further extension of the inequality of slave representation. The question of freedom or slavery in these territories must, therefore, speedily come up to be discussed and settled, as a great political question—a question of power arising out of the compromises of the constitution, of the most exciting and agitating character.

What great national interest requires this vast accession to our territories? Have we not already so increased our domain, that the old thirteen States have become almost insignificant in their dimensions, in comparison with its vast extent? Why should we, then, compel a foreign people to dissever the ties of allegiance which bind them to the government of their choice, to associate them with one that is alien to all the sympathies and habits of their race? Sir, there is no principle of public policy or of justice that requires it, and in my judgment it is not warranted by the constitution of the United States. But look at the enormous and the expense that such an acquisition of territory will necessarily entail upon us. Many fierce and warlike tribes of Indians now roam over the vast regions between the western border of New Mexico and the Pacific. Their predatory habits have led them into almost continual conflict with the neighboring Mexican population. These, it would become, at once, our duty to restrain or subdue. An addition to our standing army of at least 5,000 men, at a cost of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of dollars would immediately become necessary. And who can fail to see that, with a standing army kept up for such a purpose, amidst a restless border population, we should soon become involved in other controversies with the neighboring Mexican population, leading to other wars of acquisition and conquest?

How will justice be administered to our people when these large additions are made to our territory? The constitution has provided but one Supreme Court; and that court is now unable to administer justice to its numerous suitors, short of two or three years from the time when their suits are entered on its docket. New systems of laws will have to be learned, and administered by our judges, and it will be utterly impossible for that court, however incessantly it may be occupied, to fulfil the great duty, imposed by the constitution, and which it was one of its highest purposes to secure—of the speedy administration of justice to the people of the United States. Sir, the capacity of a government to administer justice to the people in its court of dernier resort furnishes a natural limit to its territory. Ours has already surpassed that limit.

If we compel Mexico to cede to us the portions of her territories which the President now desires, where, I ask, are we to stop. To what new wars will the desire for foreign conquest lead us next? To what new acquisitions will the attention of our people be directed? To Canada? To Cuba? or to the conquest of other States of the Mexican republic, bringing with them fresh causes of domestic disquiet and disunion?

If the lust of dominion is to go on unchecked, and conquest is to be hereafter deemed a legitimate mode of acquisition—if this principle—asserted in a resolution now pending before the Senate—is to be regarded as established American doctrine, with the sanction of statesmen who have hitherto denounced it as destructive to our institutions, no power will hereafter exist in the government to restrain the cupidity of our citizens. New wars will be stimulated, and while the old States of the Union will be shorn of the influence they once possessed, in the government established by our fathers, "to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity," we shall go on, under the guidance of the representatives of a people who never drank at the fountains of the Revolution, conquering and to conquer, till our "manifest destiny" is fulfilled. What that destiny will be, it requires no prophet to foretell.

In whatever view I have been able to consider this question, I can perceive nothing to commend to my judgment, the policy of sending an additional army into Mexico, to compel that conquered republic to cede to us the territory which the President requires.

But, sir, if such an object were desirable, have we not now in Mexico an army capable of enlargement, under its present organization to 60,000 men? Have we not officers enough, without employment, now traversing the country at their leisure, to perform the duty of enlistment? Have we not regiments enough, already formed, to which volunteers who desire to make sacrifices for their country on the altar of patriotism, may attach themselves? What need, then, of passing the present bill for the creation of additional regiments. Sir, I can see no other object to be gained by it, but the distribution of an immense amount of Executive patronage, to which I am utterly opposed. It already endangers the liberties of the country.

Mr. ALLEN then said: In looking to the proceedings of the Senate, I find that this bill was taken up on the 30th of December; that the discussion on it was opened on the 3d of January—more than two months since; the Senate in the meantime having been occupied in its consideration, with the exception of the last two weeks, which have been spent in executive session. Now, sir, it does seem to me that there ought not only to be an end but a speedy end put to this subject. I believe that when the discussion was suspended on account of the other matter, of which I am not at liberty to speak, almost every gentleman of this body who intended to speak at all upon the bill, had spoken fully. I believe that the best thing which can be done to accomplish the end which all profess to desire—the final and diplomatic termination of this war—would be to vote for a conditional augmentation of the military force of the country; and that vote to accompany the minister who will bear the despatches to Mexico. That is my opinion. I am of opinion that if this vote be not taken, and if what may transpire here shall be permitted to transpire with the presumptive evidence that the country is disarmed, and is disarming, that nothing beneficial will be the result. That is my deliberate opinion. I think that a vote now—to-day—or, at least, to-morrow, upon this bill is absolutely necessary to the welfare of our interests in Mexico; and entertaining this opinion, and in consideration of the time already consumed in this discussion, looking also to the advanced period of the session, and the increasing desire on the part of all Senators that the session should not be protracted throughout the whole year, I do hope that to-morrow, at the very farthest period, the vote of the Senate will be taken on this bill. It is in vain to say that gentlemen have not had an opportunity of being heard. There has been sufficient opportunity for all to be heard. It is in vain to say, that any recently occurring events change the reasons upon which the President recommends this bill. Although I am not one who, for the sake of patronage desires this augmentation, yet I would much rather that the augmented patronage which this bill will give the Executive should be created, than that the public interests of the country should be put in peril, and be perhaps permanently endangered, as I believe they will be, by further procrastination of the action of the Senate. I believe that we should treat, armed, and not disarmed—that we should treat with manifest readiness to meet any emergency which failure of negotiation might bring about, and not treat with a declaration in advance, that if Mexico refuse to make peace we cannot prosecute the war any farther. I believe that some evil has already been done, and on another occasion, unfortunately, the same opinion the Senate—in consequence of relaxing the muscles of the country in this struggle. I do not want to see a greater degree of lassitude in this contest, until we know that this war is not only concluded, but concluded by a treaty of peace. I do not wish to have a cessation of war without a treaty of peace, because that would be to protract the struggle indefinitely, and without any great and fixed object on the part of the government. According to the views which I expressed on another occasion, peace might have, as I thought, been obtained more speedily under other circumstances, and other auspices; but in no circumstances does the history of the experience of other nations or common reason lead us to any other conclusion than that warring nations should make peace before they disarm. If there be an armistice, it is an armistice that acts upon us alone, and not upon Mexico, because she is disarmed. We are the armed party; and every hour that this war remains unclosed by a treaty is an hour of detriment to the interests of this nation. Gentlemen may exclaim, What! do you mean to scare Mexico by arming anew! Why, we mean to impress Mexico emphatically with this important truth, that if she does not choose to make peace, she has no other alternative but war—that we are not going to sound a retreat when it is ascertained that she is not prepared to sign a peace. This is the sentiment with which she should be impressed. She should be distinctly advised that what has been done, has not resulted from our weakness, but from our sense of justice and our sense of moderation. Therefore, we should manifest no weakness, but stand armed till she signs; and if she do not sign, manifest to her the fact that we are armed. That, sir, is my opinion, as one who believes that in the present state of affairs peace is desirable. What I might have said six weeks ago is one thing, and what I say in the present state of our relations with Mexico is another thing. I say that in the present state of these relations peace is desirable; but I say also, that in order to attain greater certainty of peace, we should not disarm before the peace is signed, but stand prepared with all the readiness of battle.—Now this bill, if it pass, will do no more than sanction the President in making a contingent augmentation of the army as a precautionary measure. That is all. If peace come, the troops will not go; if peace do not come, the troops ought to go. It is a plain proposition. If there be a peace, the soldiers will not march; if there be no peace, the soldiers should march. We can therefore inflict no injury on the interests of the country by the passage of this bill; and I desire, having of course no right to speak in behalf of others, that we will not let to-morrow pass without the final action of the Senate upon this bill. In the meantime, there can be several speeches made. If necessary we can sit here all night. But let it be understood and firmly resolved, that the vote will be taken before we adjourn to-morrow. I shall be glad if this suggestion meet the general concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. President: I do not rise to address the Senate at any length, or to discuss the general merits of the measure now under consideration; having heretofore enjoyed ample opportunity of expressing my views upon the importance of strengthening our army in Mexico, at least to the extent proposed by the bill before us. It is no part of my design either to follow the Senator from Connecticut along all the circuities of his rambling and roundabout discourse upon matters and things in general and the Mexican war in particular. Only two observations have I to submit to all that has been enunciated so solemnly by the Senator from Connecticut upon the present occasion; which, as a whole, however conspicuous its merits in other respects may be, will be confessed by the members of this body to be at least devoid of the charm of novelty. And first, I will remark for a moment upon the singular attitude which the Senator from Connecticut has chosen to occupy in this debate. He is not for the war, Oh, no! he is utterly opposed to it. He is not for peace upon the highly honorable terms which we know it to be in our power to secure from Mexico. He is opposed to all indemnity from Mexico, because he holds the war to be unjust on our part; and yet I cannot believe that the grandson of the illustrious Roger Sherman would be willing to see the war terminated in a manner calculated to imprint ineffaceable disgrace upon the escutcheon of the republic. What does the Senator desire? What would he advise us to do? What objects does he propose to us as worthy of attainment? Indeed I am wholly at a loss on these points, though I have certainly listened to the Senator with attention whenever he has spoken. Is he quite certain that he entirely understands himself upon this grave and complex subject? If he does, then I must say that he has been most unhappily indistinct in the language adopted by him as the vehicle of his thoughts; and, after puzzling myself most painfully in order to come to a thorough comprehension of the Senator from Connecticut, I have been forced at length to the conclusion, that his intellectual powers are involved in a most profound and melancholy hallucination in regard to every thing appertaining to this Mexican war, its origin, progress, and probable results.

The Senator from Connecticut concluded his speech with the avowal of a motive for his opposition to this war which I regretted very much to hear: he says that if the war be further prosecuted it will involve the acquisition of much additional territory, to which acquisition he is averse, because he fears that Connecticut might lose a portion of her relative consequence and present influence in the councils of the nation. He does not alledge that the republic would receive detriment from the amplification of its territorial domain. He does not apprehend the least injury to this noble partnership of sovereign States from that cause. He does not fear the downfall of free institutions, or the disruption of the Union. He must know that the nation will be greatly strengthened by extending her territorial surface from sea to sea, and by being enabled to possess herself of all the incalculable advantages which will arise from the ownership of a fertile and extensive domain upon the coast of the great Pacific, with boundless mineral resources, and such ports and harbors as no commercial nation has ever before enjoyed. All this the Senator from Connecticut knows as well as any member of this body; and to all this, as a patriot, he can possibly make no objection. But he fears that Connecticut may loose some of her present influence! How is this to take place? The Senator does not explain himself satisfactorily.—Will not her influence and authority as one of the sovereign members of the confederacy be extended over a more ample territorial surface? Will not her consequence increase with the increase of our national resources? Will she not grow in the growth of the nation, and strengthen in her strength? Has the acquisition of Louisiana, or Florida, or Texas, injured Connecticut in any respect whatever? Has she less respectability on account thereof? I suspect that the Senator has fallen into a serious mistake about this matter, and a mistake, too, which is quite surprising considering that he is himself a son of New England. Can the Senator suppose that the amount of influence which the different States of the Union exercise in the management of national concerns is in exact proportion to their territorial magnitude? Is he of opinion that the influence which New England has always wielded in the national councils in the determination of questions involving the honor and happiness of the republic has borne any proportion whatever to the number of square miles contained within her territorial limits? At least, I have thought far otherwise. I have supposed New England to be respectable and respected, influential and entitled to influence, on very different grounds. She deserves veneration, and her voice is ever listened to with respect, because of the glorious events of her past history; because of her noble institutions for securing the freedom and advancing the true dignity of man as a rational and responsible moral being; because she has been, in all generations, the patroness of the arts and sciences, and the conservatress of all useful learning; because her shores supplied the earliest refuge to civil and religious liberty; because her soil was moistened with the earliest blood which was shed in our war for independence; because of her numerous great and good men, now and at all times;—her examples of high-souled and fervid patriotism, elevated disinterestedness, pure and refined morality, and true Christian charity. Certain neighborhoods of New England have lost standing and influence of late, I am persuaded, simply because those who dwell therein have become unmindful of the examples of their ancestors, and have permitted faction to control them, instead of patriotism—a desire for sectional advantages to supercede the ambition to promote the general good and the true honor of the whole nation. My life on it, sir, let Connecticut be in all things what she should be, let all her sons truly emulate the glory of their sires, let them heartily unite with their fellow countrymen in other portions of the Union in sustaining the national honor in time of war, and aid in maintaining a just, disinterested, and liberal policy in the management of our domestic concerns in seasons of peace, and we shall hear no longer any complaints in this hall about Connecticut having lost her influence and political consequence.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If no gentleman desires to speak on this bill, I should be glad to have an opportunity of stating my views on it to-morrow. The reasons which compel me to vote against the bill have been mistaken. I intended even if the treaty—

Mr. MANGUM.—Will the Senator yield the floor for a moment. I see that the usual hour of adjournment has arrived.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have only one word to say. I had intended to vote against this bill in any event; and I must say, that an occurrence which has recently taken place, rather strengthens my intention to vote against it. I have had no opportunity, however, of expressing myself on the subject, and have occupied very little of the time of the Senate, and if it should please the Senate to postpone the consideration of the bill till to-morrow, I should regard it as an accommodation.

On motion

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1848.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, in favor of extending the port of New Orleans so as to embrace the City of Lafayette, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of members of the Bar of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying that the circuit duties of the Judges of the Supreme Court may not be suspended; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, submitted additional documents relating to the petition of John Johnson and others; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented two memorials of Isaac Newton, proposing to contract with the government for establishing a line of mail steamers between New York and Havre; and between New York and Vera Cruz; and between New Orleans and Vera Cruz; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the memorial of Grinnell, Minturn and Company and others, merchants and importers in New York, praying the reimbursement of certain import duties paid by them, and the enactment of a law making allowance, in the payment of duties, for wastage on merchandize arriving in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of importing merchants in St. Louis, Missouri, praying to be relieved from the operation of certain restrictions, imposed by the existing tariff, on merchandize imported in that city through the port of New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of James G. Carson, praying the confirmation of his title to certain lands in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the corporation of the City of Washington, praying certain amendments of their charter; which was referred to the Committee of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the petition of Lewis Kennedy, and Henry Gaither and Co., praying permission to erect saw-mills on a certain tract of land belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of the chiefs and delegation of the Wyandott nation of Indians, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BURNING OF THE MISSOURI.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to indemnify the officers, seamen and marines of the United States steam frigate Missouri, for the losses sustained by them by the destruction by fire of the said frigate at Gibraltar, on the 2d August, 1843.

AFFAIRS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CLARKE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of "a despatch to the United States consul at Monterey, T. O. Larkin, Esq.," forwarded in November, 1845, by Captain Gillespie of the marine corps, and which was, by him, destroyed before nearing the port of Vera Cruz.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the correspondence between the minister of the United States at London, and any authorities of the British government, in relation to a postal arrangement between the two countries.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the vacancy in the Committee on Indian Affairs, caused by the resignation of Mr. SEVIER, be filled by the appointment of the Presiding Officer.

MEDALS AND CERTIFICATES.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution authorizing medals and certificates to be given to officers and soldiers of the regular forces and volunteers for gallant conduct in battle during the war with Mexico, reported it with an amendment.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives further to supply deficiences in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848.

The question pending being upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BENTON, to strike out the words "the Papal States," in line 84, and after "Ecuador," in line 86, insert "and for a minister plenipotentiary to the Papal States," and strike out "twenty-two" and insert "thirty-one"—

Mr. ATHERTON remarked that the Senator from Missouri not being in his seat, he would ask leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON then moved to amend the bill by inserting, at the close of the 63d line, "For contingent expenses in the office of the Treasurer of the United States five hundred dollars;" which was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved further to amend the bill striking out, in the 138th line, the word "two" and inserting "three;" which was agreed to.

Mr. BREESE moved further to amend the bill by inserting between lines 100 and 101, "for compensation to eight additional clerks to be employed in the General Land Office, four of them at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum each, and the remaining four at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum each, the sum of two thousand two hundred dollars;" which was agreed to.

The question then being upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BENTON, in reference to the mission to the Papal States—

Mr. BENTON.—The amendment speaks for itself. Its object is to make the mission to Rome a full one. I desire that we should send to Rome, once the head of the political world, and for so long a period the head of the religious world, a minister who might be charged with other duties, so that in point of expenditure the amount would not exceed that of two chargeships, the duties of which would be discharged by an agent of a rank more becoming the station and the objects to be accomplished.

Mr. BADGER.—I have myself been unable to see any necessity for establishing either a chargeship or a full mission to the Papal States. The President is his message, recommends the establishment of such a mission for two reasons; first, on account of what he calls "recent interesting political events;" and second, because attention to the commerce of the country requires it. Now, with regard to the latter view, for more than seventy years, if we have any commerce with the Papal States, we have found it adequately protected without having been under the necessity of establishing such a mission. Sir, the commerce of the United States with the Papal States must be very small indeed. In fact, it is so small that it has never been the subject of distinct statement, so far as I am aware, in any accounts that we have had from any of the departments of the government in regard to our intercourse with foreign nations; and the exports of the United States to the whole of Italy, including the Papal States scarcely amount to one million of dollars a year. We have in the Papal States three consuls. The probability is, that the whole amount of the commercial intercourse of the United States with these States does not amount to one hundred thousand dollars a year; and it seems to me, that so far as the commercial interests of the United States are concerned, it would be paying the largest insurance that has been known in commercial dealings, if we incur the expense either of a full mission or a chargeship for the purpose of affording some incidental benefit or protection to a commerce not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars a year already under the charge of three American consuls. It seems to me very obvious that this consideration has very little weight.

But what is the other reason assigned by the President? The recent political events which have taken place in the Papal States under the direction of the present Pope. In what possible mode, I ask, do these political events make it necessary that we should send a minister to Rome? How are we connected with these political events? What influence is it expected that our minister can exercise over these events or the party connected with them; or, in what way will this mission, politically considered, be of service to this country or to the Papal States? What is the character of these political events which are now in progress at Rome? Nothing has taken place which in the least embraces any alteration in the form of government that has always obtained in those States. The present Pope is the same absolute master of his people, that all his predecessors in time past have been. He has surrendered none of the absolute powers which adorn and strengthen the tiara which he wears. He has erected no barriers against the abuse of those powers either by himself or by his successors. He stands now an autocrat, possessed of and exercising a supreme authority over all his subjects, who are absolutely dependent on him for every privilege they enjoy—for eery right which they exercise—for every relaxation which has been extended to them from the rigid severity of former days. He is nothing in the world, in comparison with his predecessors, but a good and kind master of his subjects, who are emphatically his vassals. He has made no reform—he has made no surrender of any of the principles of arbitrary power—he has not evinced any disposition to abridge the limits of his authority in the slightest degree. The uncontrollable authority of that sceptre which he wields is the same unquestionable and unquestioned dominion which has been exercised by his predecessors. Now, sir, what on earth can induce us at this time to establish this mission to the Papal States? Do we expect to sustain his Holiness in pursuing the course which he has adopted? Do we intend to extend to him our countenance and support? Why, in that point of view, I think if may be seriously quesioned whether we do not greatly over-estimate the position which we occupy, and whether his Holiness will consider himself at all obliged by our countenance and support.

In what way, then, is this mission to benefit this country? There is no commerce to be protected—none at least that has not always beenamply protected by the consuls of other United States in the Papal dominions. There is nothing in the world in the present political condition of Rome which makes such a mission of the slightest importance to us or to her, considered in regard to those political relations which may subsist between us and her as two independent States. Well, that being so, is not the United States now commencing in the establishment of this mission, a system, to which we have been heretofore entire strangers? Is not this mission in the view of it which I have presented, merely a religious mission on the part of the United States to the first Bishop of Europe? Certainly it is, sir. Although his Holiness is not only the first Bishop—the universal head of the Roman Catholic Church,—but annexes to that the character of a secular prince, it must always be recollected that the Papal States are but the appanage attached to his episcopal see, for the purpose of giving support and dignity to his religious character and office. It is as a spiritual ruler that he exercises his influence over his dominions. As a secular prince, simply and merely, he would be nobody. It is his Holiness that governs. It is the universal Bishop of the church that rules in the Papal States. His counsellors are the principal Bishops, Priests and Deacons of Christendom. His ministers are priests. His ambassadors are priests. The whole machinery, control and direction of his government stamp it as being in every respect a spiritual dominion. Now I admit that that consideration would furnish no reason why the proposed mission should not be established, if there were any great interests of the people of this country to be protected, or any great object connected with their welfare to be achieved by it. But so far as I am aware there are no such considerations of policy to be urged in this case. This is simply the sending forth of a mission from the United States to the first Roman Catholic Bishop of the world.

To such a mission, sir, I, for one, am opposed. I wish for our Roman Catholic citizens of this country, precisely what we all enjoy, the absolute and unqualified possession of all our religious rights. They may make themselves dependent upon, or believe themselves to be dependent upon, and to be bound in spiritual submission to any head of their church they please, here or elsewhere; but rely upon it, the establishment of this mission will be considered by the great Protestant interests of this country as one, undertaken for the purpose of giving a new character to that particular church, of which the sovereign Pontiff is the head. It will be regarded as placing him and his church in this country upon a far different footing from that which is occupied by other religious denominations; and it will be felt throughout the extent of this land that the government of the United States has instituted, in reference to this particular church, a proceeding entirely dissonant from its past policy; and that it has departed, in no small degree, from the principles of universal toleration and that non-intervention in religious matters which the constitution has prescribed. When we look, sir, at the small amount of the commerce of the United States with the Papal States; when we consider the absence of everything like an effort on the part of his Holiness the Pope to introduce the principles of free government in the Papal States, the idea will force itself on the minds of all, that were it not for the thousands of foreign Roman Catholic voters in the United States, the efforts of his Holiness to ameliorate the condition of his subjects would have met with less sympathy, and the commerce of the United States with the Papal States would have attracted less solicitude from the occupant of the White House.

I cannot vote, sir, either for the full mission or the chargeship. I regard the establishment of either as involving a needless expenditure of money; and if not fraught with mischief, to be at best altogether useless.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I would just submit to the gentleman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, whether it would not seem a little disparaging to the other important and respectable powers of Europe to whom diplomatic agents of a lower grade are sent, if this amendment should prevail. Neither our political nor commercial relations with the Papal States bear the least proportion, I suppose, to those we sustain to Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, or Naples, to whom ministers of a lower grade are now sent. Now, when arranging our diplomatic agents with those powers, including Austria, one of the greatest powers of the continent of Europe, why should we pass them by with ministers of the second grade, and give one of a higher grade to the Papal States?

Mr. BENTON.—In proposing to substitute for a chargeship a full mission to the Papal States, I had not in view the commerce we might have in the Tyber. Our commerce is not much greater, I believe, in the Roman Tyber, than it is in our own Tyber! The Senator from New York [Mr. DIX] says he has been there, and that our commerce there is greater than that on our own Tyber, and I yield to his superior information on the subject. But, sir, it was not in that point of view that I made the amendment, but solely in a political point of view. In sending a minister of the first grade to that city, with which grand recollections must forever be associated—which was once the mistress of the world, and has been the head of the Christian church for a long period—I look not only to the "eternal city" itself, but to the whole of Italy, which is most wonderfully scant in diplomatic representatives from the United States. We have a charge at Naples, and from that point we pass over all that was Rome, at one period even of her best days, and go into cis-alpine Gaul, before we find another diplomatic representative of the United States. At the foot of the Alps we have another chargé, and he has just got there, or is perhaps yet on the way. I believe we go to Turin before we find another. Here is a gap from the gulf of Tarentum to the foot of the Alps, in which we do not find a single diplomatic representative of the United States; an extent of country containing how many millions? It embraces all Italy, with twenty millions of people, divided, to be sure, into several powers, but without a single diplomatic agent of the United States. Now, in sending a minister to Rome, the head of the Italian States, I consider that we would have a diplomatic agent who would be in substance, if not in form, a representative of the United States in Italy itself. It is in that enlarged point of view that I have looked with some degree of interest to the establishment of this mission to Rome of a minister of the highest rank. It is certain that the political movements alluded to in the President's message, are not confined to the city of Rome, and it is, in my opinion, eminently expedient and proper that a full mission should be established. Having thus expressed the views by which I have been influenced in offering the amendment, I leave it with the Senate.

Mr. CASS.—As the morning hour has expired, I trust that this bill will be passed over informally, and the ten regiment bill will be taken up.

The bill was then passed over informally.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making provision for an addition to the regular military force.

Mr. CALHOUN.—After a very careful examination, I have not been able to find a single argument, which, in my opinion, would justify the passage of this bill, at this time, and under existing circumstances. I cannot but feel that those who have come to a different conclusion, have overlooked the actual condition of the Mexican government, and of the people of Mexico, in supposing that this bill was necessary either to intimidate, or to coerce that government into a ratification of the treaty recently acted upon here. If that government were strong and vigorous, if the people of Mexico were united in resistance to us, and capable of sustaining a war in the event that the treaty shall not be ratified, there might be strong reasons for passing this bill. But such is not the case. On the contrary, the very opposite is. The government itself is little more than a shadow, without an army and without revenue; the people in a state of distraction, with a large and powerful party in opposition to the government, and for a continuance of the war, not in hostility to us, but in hostility to their own government, which they desire should be overthrown. The government itself exists by our forbearance, and under our countenance; they have been induced to treat with us from the dread of their annihilation, and we to treat with them from the same considération. For, strange as it may appear, the very motive that induced Mexico to treat with us, induced us to treat with her. She dreaded her annihilation, and so did we. It is difficult to say which would be subjected to the greatest evil in consequence of such annihilation. The danger is, not that the Mexican government, in the event of the rejection of the treaty, would be able to resist, but it is, that it may perish before she can ratify it. But, if I am mistaken in all this, one thing is clear, without these ten additional regiments, we have the means of intimidating or coercing that government to any extent we please; a single brigade may annihilate it. But even if we should chose to avoid this, we hold another power in our hands, that is ample to induce her to ratify the treaty, provided there be any hesitation on her part. We would in that case, have but to tell her that we will adopt the boundary agreed upon in the treaty, and thus save ourselves the vast sum of twenty millions of dollars, which rumor states that we are to give for the ceded territory. This consideration alone is sufficient, provided the Mexican government can maintain itself until she shall have acted upon this treaty, with the amendments that may have been made to it by this body.

In this view of the subject, I regard the passage of this bill, if it be intended either for the purpose of intimidation or of coercion, to be entirely useless—an unmeaning bravado. But if it were merely useless, as much as I may be averse to it, my aversion would not be near so great as it now is. It is worse than useless; it is mischievous, and will prove mischievous both here and there. Mischievous here, for if this body, conversant with all the secret proceedings in reference to the treaty, and supposed by the country to be fully informed of every thing in relation to the subject, should pass the bill now before it, it will be received by the public as an apprehension on our part, that there is great danger that the treaty will not be ratified, and the effect upon our commerce, and upon the money interest of the country will be highly injurious. It will be mischievous there, for the real danger that the Mexican government has to fear, is this: there is a large party in Mexico called Puros, which is unwilling to see a peace concluded between the Mexican government and this country; unwilling, because they are our friends or enemies, but simply for the reason that they wish to see that government annihilated, and the power placed in their hands. Now if the impression produced there by the passage of this bill should be, that there is danger that the treaty will not be ratified, it will arouse and animate that party to double exertion in order to fulfil their object.

But I consider it not only useless, not only mischievous in the light which I have indicated, but it will be a costly bravado. I take it for granted that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not intend simply that this bill shall pass this body—that would be unworthy of his character—he then expects that it will also pass the other branch of Congress and become a law, and that the force will be raised and be employed, if the treaty should fail, in carrying on the war with Mexico. Well, if the bill passes—and I must consider it in that light—in that case, what will be the result? There will be no difficulty in getting officers and men; they will have no apprehensions of going to Mexico or fighting future battles; the enlistment will turn out to be a money speculation; each recruit will receive for his enlistment, his bounty in land amounting to 160 acres, his bounty in money equal to twelve dollars, the usual issue of clothing amounting at the present price to about twenty one dollars. Estimating the bounty in land at one dollar and a quarter an acre, it would make the whole $2,000,000. These items alone would be equal to two millions, three or four hundred thousand dollars.—Add to this, the pay and emoluments of the officers, the pay to the soldiers, and the expense for subsistence, and that for recruiting the whole service, will be found to be not less than three millions of dollars, to which the passage of the bill would subject the government. To this must be added the vast patronage which the appointment of five hundred officers, and this great additional expenditure would confer on the President, and that too, on the very eve of a Presidential election, when the patronage of the government is brought into the highest degree of activity. Such increase of patronage is a great evil, as every man of every party will readily acknowledge, if he would candidly express his sentiments; for, if there is anything on which all are agreed, it is that Executive patronage is already enormous, and ought not to be increased.

Now, I submit to my friends on this side of the chamber, who have indicated a disposition to pass this bill, whether they are willing to incur this heavy cost, and subject the country to this great evil by passing this bill, which I have shown to be a useless bravado, unbecoming a great and magnanimous people.

But I not only object to the passage of the bill at this time and under existing circumstances, but I take higher ground. I am opposed to the bill under all circumstances. I would have voted against it if a treaty had not been made, and for reasons that, to myself, are conclusive, and which I will now proceed to state.

Sir, we all know the origin of this bill; it was reported early in the session and originated in the message of the President recommending a vigorous prosecution of the war; and its leading and main object was to carry that recommendation into effect. If, then, we pass this bill we give, according to my humble conception, a pledge to the Executive and to the country, that if the treaty fails we will resort to a vigorous prosecution of the war. I, for one, am unwilling to give this pledge; unwilling, because I think it ought not to be given, and unwilling, because, if given, I am of impression it never will be redeemed.

It ought not to be given, for reasons which I have assigned fully on a former occasion, and which I shall only briefly repeat on this. A vigorous prosecution of the war would be the annihilation of the Mexican government, leaving no government with whom to treat. The effect of that would be the entire subjugation of the country, throwing upon us one of two alternatives, either to create a government by our own authority with which to treat—and this I trust no one who duly appreciates the true principles of our system of government will ever adopt—or to hold it under our subjugation as a conquered country, to be governed as provinces, or to be incorporated into the Union.

Now, as I am utterly opposed to this, for reasons which I stated at large on the occasion referred to, and which it is not necessary here to repeat, I, for one, cannot give this pledge. Nor can I give it, because I have not the least expectation that it would ever be redeemed. The sentiment of the whole country is remarkably changed in reference to the war. There was at that time a large party in the country who were in favor of taking the whole of Mexico. I have but to appeal to the proceedings of public meetings, and to declarations repeatedly made in the public journals, to prove this. But that sentiment is changed, and why is it changed? Because the people were not aware, at that time, of what would be the consequence of a vigorous prosecution of the war. It was an appeal to their manly pride. But as soon as they saw the consequences—that the result would be as I have stated, they drew back, and put the seal of their reprobation upon it, not only for the present, but, I trust, forever. With this strong disapprobation of the war on the part of the people, it would be an idle dream to suppose that in the event of a failure of the treaty, this war would ever be renewed to be carried on vigorously.

But, it may be asked, what shall be done? My answer is plain and simple. Only one thing can be done. To fall back and take the line of the treaty, to tell the Mexican people that we intend to hold it, that we are satisfied if they are. Nor can it be objected that it costs more, for it would take fully as large an army, and at as great a cost to protect Mexico under the treaty against the Indians falling on our side of the line under the treaty, as to protect ourselves against the Mexicans by assuming the line without the treaty, not to take into estimate the twenty millions of dollars which would be saved by adopting the latter.

The whole affair is in our own hands, whether the treaty fails or not, we still have the complete control if we act with wisdom and firmness, and avoid what I detest above all things, a system of menace or bravado, in the management of our negotiation. I had hoped that that system had been abandoned forever. It nearly involved us in a war with England about Oregon. It was only prevented by the wisdom and firmness of this body. It was resorted to in our negotiations with Mexico, and the march of the army under General Taylor to the Rio Grande, was but intended to sustain it. Unfortunately, the circumstances prevented the Senate from interposing as in the case of Oregon, and this war was the consequence.

But, Mr. President, the vigorous prosecution of the war, is not the only object of this bill. It is the primary, the principal one. But there is another one—secondary it is true; though not much less important. This bill was intended in part, to carry into execution a system of imposts and taxes, which the President of the United States had imposed upon Mexico. The army, including the force to be raised by this bill, was intended to be used for collecting the duties and imposts; for that purpose it was to be spread all over Mexico, as has been officially announced.

Now, I hold that we cannot pass this bill without sanctioning the act of the President in this respect, and that, I for one, never can do, because I am under a deep conviction that the President has no right whatever, to impose taxes internal or external, on the people of Mexico. It is an act without the authority of the constitution or law, and eminently dangerous to the country. Thus thinking, that neither the constitution nor law gives him any such authority, I would not be true to my trust, if I were to vote for the bill. I would have been glad to have avoided it, at the present time. My friends around me know that I was anxious that this bill should not be pressed upon us now, not that I desired to shun the responsibility of the expression of my opinions, but because I preferred postponing it until after the treaty was ratified, and when there could be no cry of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. But it is forced upon me, and if there be any responsibility in expressing my opinion at this time, it ought of right to fall, not on me, but upon those who, without any necessity, have forced this bill upon us.

But to return to the thread of the argument. I ask, where can the President find the authority for imposing these taxes? Can it be found in your constitution? If so, point it out. Can it be found in your law? If so, point it out. No such authority is to be found in either. But it may be said it is comprehended under the implied powers of the Executive—that is, the powers necessary and proper to carry out those expressly delegated to him. If so, point out the power which it is intended to carry into execution. But let me say to gentlemen in advance, if you do this you will not remove the difficulty. If you should succeed in showing that it is an implied power, which I hold to be impossible, you must still point out an act of Congress to authorize its exercise. The framers of the constitution, in their great sagacity, have taken care to insert a provision in the constitution investing Congress amply with the power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution, not only its own powers, but those vested in any department or office of the government. I refer to what is usually called the residuary clause which provides "that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers, (that is, powers invested in Congress,) or powers vested in any of the departments or officers of the government."—Then, if it is an implied power, it becomes a Congressional power by this express provision, and must have the sanction of Congress for carrying it into effect.

But it may be said that the President is commander-in-chief of the army in Mexico, and that it is an essential part of the power of the commander-in-chief to impose a system of taxation in the enemy's country. It, indeed, it be an essential part of the power, it cannot be separated from it without destroying the power itself, and it must of course belong to him as commander-in-chief in the United States, as well as in Mexico, or in any other conquered country. But it is manifest that it cannot exist within the limits of the United States, because the constitution expressly invests the same, not in the President, but in Congress. But to this it may be said, there is a distinction between exercising the power in the United States, and exercising it in Mexico, or any other place beyond the boundary of the United States, where our army may be operating. To this I answer by asking, why so? What makes the distinction? What possible reason can be assigned why the power may be excercised in the one and not the other? Who can answer these questions?

But if it is the case, if the President can exercise in Mexico a power expressly given to Congress, which he cannot exercise in the United States, I would ask where is the limit to his power in Mexico? Has he also the power of making appropriations of money collected in Mexico without the sanction of Congress; this he has already done—has he the power to apply the money to whatever purpose he may think proper, and among others to raise a military force in Mexico without the sanction of Congress? That also he has already done. But if there be no limitation, then his powers are absolute and despotic in Mexico, and he stands in the two-fold character of the constitutional President of the United States, and the absolute and despotic ruler of Mexico. To what must this conclusion lead? What may he not do? He may lay taxes at his pleasure either as to kind or amount; he may establish the rules and regulations for their collection; he may dispose of them without passing the proceeds into the treasury to any object or for any purpose he may think proper, and is not liable or responsible to Congress, or any other authority in any respect whatever in doing all this. He may, of course, raise armies, and pay them out of the proceeds of the taxes; he may wage war against the neighboring countries to the south of him at his pleasure, and extend his authority by force of arms, to whatever extent he may desire; or he may equip a fleet and assail the islands of the South Sea; or he may direct it against Japan, or any other country he may think proper. Nay, farther; he may turn his army against his own country, and make it the instrument of its subjugation. Against all this there is no remedy, and can be none, if he has the power which must necessarily result from the principles which would invest him with the power of laying taxes.

But, it may be asked, what are the limitations upon his power as commander-in-chief? The answer is an easy one. His power is to command the army. Let us put a true value upon words. To command in chief, is to have the supreme control in conducting and directing the army in its military operations. Such is its power, and only power. It is a restricted one, of which the constitutional legislation of the country furnishes many evidences. The very act which recognizes war with Mexico vests him with the power of using the army and navy for its prosecution, clearly indicating that the power of using them for that purpose required the authority of law. If we look back into all the declarations which have been made by this government, we shall find that they all, in like manner, confer the same power on the President. Besides, if we turn to the laws in reference to suppressing insurrections, it will be found that they expressly authorize the President to use the militia and the army for the purpose—showing, in like manner, the prevailing opinion heretofore that the sanction of law was necessary to use a military force for this purpose as well as for carrying into effect a declaration of war. Such also is the case in reference to repelling invasion. If there be any power which one would suppose would belong to the President as commander-in-chief, it would be that of establishing rules and regulations for the government of the army; but if we turn to the constitution, we shall find even that power is conferred by express provision upon Congress; all going to show within what narrow limits the constitution and the laws restrict the power of the President.

But it may be asked, has the conqueror no power to impose taxes upon a conquered country? Yes, he certainly has. When an army invades a country and subdues it, in whole or in part, the conqueror has a right to impose taxes and collect them. But the question occurs under our system of government, who is the conqueror? I answer, the people of the United States are the conquerors. It is they who have conquered Mexico; not the President, not the generals, not the army. They are but the instruments by which the conquest has been effected. And it is the people of the United States that have the right to impose taxes. But who represents the United States—who is their organ through which they act? I answer, this government, the federal government, consisting of the Executive, the legislative, and the judiciary departments. The question then is, to what extent the President represents exclusively the United States in the conquered country? The answer is, to no other extent than as commander-in-chief; in all other respects almost Congress is the sole representative, and to them especially belongs, by express delegation, the power of laying and collecting taxes, and of appropriating them to such objects as the constitution warrants, unrestricted, extending as far as the United States' authority extends, without restriction or distinction. Now, whenever a country is conquered, even in part, and held by the conquering power, the sovereignty of the country thus held is for the time suspended, and that of the conquering substituted in its place; and, of course, in our case the authority of the government in its departments attaches to it as if it was a part of the United States itself, each in its appropriate sphere. The opposite doctrine which would make the Executive the sole and exclusive power, in such portions of the country, is entirely destitute of authority, and would lead to all the most dangerous and monstrous consequences which have been traced out. All this is so clear that it is surprising that it has been overlooked or that there should be any division or diversity of sentiment in reference to it.

The taxes which are the subject of these remarks, were imposed by the President in the interval between this and the preceding session of Congress, and this is the first opportunity I have had to express my opinion in reference to the authority by which they were laid. And I avail myself of this occasion to put in my solemn protest against the power. If it should become a precedent hereafter, it, in connection with the authority which the President has assumed in making this war, would lead to the establishment of a fatal error in reference to the power of this government as it relates to war. It will to that extent, elevate the power of the Executive in practice as far above the legislative as the latter is elevated above the former by the constitution, and lead, almost necessarily in the end, to establish despotic authority in the Executive branch of the government. It must be borne in mind that we are a warlike people, rapidly increasing in number and population, well fed, well clothed, and having an abundance of leisure. Like all such people we seek excitement, and there is no description of excitement more enticing to the young and ardent than war. It is difficult to prevent such a people from rushing into war, and if wars should frequently hereafter occur in consequence, and the precedents set by this be not reversed, nothing can prevent the Executive power from overshadowing the constitution and the liberties of the country. We now have an opportunity to reverse that precedent by giving a strong and decided vote against the passage of this bill.

It may be proper for me to remark in conclusion, that I am aware that there are some doubtful questions as to the exact extent of the power of the President as commander-in-chief of the army of the United States, and particularly that of making requisitions and establishing temporary governments, such as have been established in New Mexico, and California. I will not now enter upon the investigation, but my impression is, in case of making requisitions over the portion of the country in which the authority of the United States is even temporarily established, or erecting temporary governments in such portions of the conquered country, the President has acted without authority of law or the constitution. In coming to this conclusion, I am willing to allow to the President, as commander-in-chief, many and great powers; but they are such as arise out of exigencies immediately connected with the operation of the army or its safety. Among them I include the power of seizing upon supplies of all descriptions when they become indispensable to the use of the army, or to batter down towns, and to remove all obstacles, when necessary, for his security or success. But when he comes to act over portions of the territory subject to our control, he exercises power not belonging to him. But to the legislative department of the government, Congress may indeed give him authority by law, to levy contributions or to establish temporary governments. But it is one thing to exercise it on his own authority, and another to exercise it under authority of law. By the one he is placed under the control of law, while by the other, he places himself above the control of law.

I have now expressed my opinion. In all I have said, I trust I have put myself above party feeling or personal considerations. I am actuated by the single motive to contribute to correct the errors of a political character which have been committed in the origin and the prosecution of the war, and to guard, as far as in my power, against the dangerous precedents which they were calculated to establish if not noticed or exposed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—I desire to express my views on this bill, but, I presume, that at this advanced stage of the day the Senate can hardly be expected to have patience to listen to the discussion, and I am not disposed to trespass upon them, unless it is understood that the vote is to be taken to-day.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I hope that the bill will be passed over informally in order to allow the gentleman from Georgia an opportunity of expressing his views.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I would suggest that the wishes of my colleague might be gratified by the Senate passing this bill informally over, and resuming the consideration of that bill which was laid aside on the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CASS.—I am extremely anxious to meet the wishes of the Senator from Georgia, but really I am opposed to relapsing into the former mode of discussion by one speech each day.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I do not think that there is any danger of the result apprehended by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee. I believe all parties will concur in deprecating that; but there is a very important bill—the bill supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for the current fiscal year—which awaits our action. I hope that by the general assent of the Senate the wishes of my colleague may be gratified, and that this bill will be laid aside informally in order that the consideration of that one to which I have just alluded may be resumed.

Mr. ATHERTON.—This bill has already been a very long time before the Senate, and it is certainly important that it should be acted upon in order that the bill to which the honorable Senator alludes, and others may be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. FOOTE.—Allow me to suggest that my honorable friend from Georgia will now proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON then addressed the Senate at length on the question of the war, and in support of the bill. A full report of his remarks is given in the Appendix.

Mr. BERRIEN then moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CASS.—Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for a moment? I do hope that the Senate will terminate this discussion to-morrow. If not I must be constrained to vote against the adjournment.

SEVERAL SENATORS assented to the informal understanding that the discussion on the bill should terminate to-morrow.

Mr. BRADBURY said he hoped that a motion would be made for the reconsideration of a bill which involved a large amount of money, and although in one section of it a provision was made which to a very considerable extent met his approval, yet there was a principle involved in the second section, the adoption of which he would regard as very dangerous—a principle which would in this single act take from the treasury nearly a quarter of a million of dollars, and which in its final operation would be broad enough to bankrupt the treasury of any government that was ever created. It virtually assumed that when we have existing claims against a foreign government ———

Mr. CASS.—Will the honorable Senator excuse me? What is the question?

Mr. FOOTE.—It is on the passage of the ten regiment bill.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I desire simply to move a reconsideration of the bill. It passed without a division.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am sure that the Senate desires to see the Senator accommodated. All that is necessary to be done is that the Senate, by general consent, allow him to make a motion to reconsider the bill, and the then Senate will be in possession of the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to adjourn.

By general consent the motion of the Senator from Maine was then considered and agreed to; and then,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1848.

PETITION.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John Hogan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Sarah Stokes, widow of John Stokes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles M. Gibson, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BADGER gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill in relation to the true intent and meaning of the acts authorizing the exercise of the franking privilege.

AFFAIRS IN CALIFORNIA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. CLARKE:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of "a despatch to the United States Consul at Monterey, T. O. Larkin, Esq.," forwarded in November, 1845, by Captain Gillespie, of the marine corps, and which was, by him, destroyed before entering the port of Vera Cruz.

The resolution having been amended by the addition of the words "if a communication of the same be not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interests," was agreed to.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. NILES, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the correspondence between the minister of the United States at London, and the authorities of the British government, in relation to a postal arrangement between the two countries.

ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. Westcott, on the 3d instant, and it was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That one thousand additional copies of the reports of Lieutenant Emory and Colonel Cooke, and the accompanying map and illustrations, heretofore ordered to be printed by the Senate, be furnished for the use of the Senate.

OCEAN MAILS.

The bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and Foreign countries, and for other purposes," was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday, the 3d day of April next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill requiring all moneys receivable from customs and from all other sources, to be paid immediately into the Treasury without abatement on deduction, and for other purposes, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

DISPOSITION OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE.

The above named bill from the House of Representatives was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

On motion by Mr. CASS, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, on its third reading, to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BERRIEN addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill; a full report of his remarks will be given hereafter.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Although laboring under deep depression, I still feel it my duty at as early a moment as I may be able, to address the Senate upon the state of the country, and on the further prosecution of the war. I have listened, sir, silently but attentively, to the discussion which has taken place upon this bill, and upon other connected subjects in this Senate; and it is not my purpose to enter into the historical narrative, or the historical argument which has accompanied its discussion on the one side or on the other. New events have arisen, bringing new questions; and since the resumption of the discussion upon this measure, two or three days ago, these events have been alluded to, first by the honorable Senator who conducts this bill through the Senate; and, again, by the honorable Senator before me from Carolina. By both these honorable members these events have been declared to be well known to all the world; and by one of them, [Mr. CASS,] it was remarked that there need be no affectation of mystery. Since these statements were made I have heard the gentleman from South Carolina express his views on the question. I have heard him on various and momentous subjects—on many interesting occasions; and I desire to say, sir, that I never heard him with more unqualified concurrence in every word he uttered. The topics which he discussed were presented, it appears to me, in their just light; and he sustained his own views in regard to them with that clearness and power of argument which always characterize his efforts in debate. I thank him. I thank him especially for the manly stand he took upon one point, which has not been so much discussed here as others—I mean the plain, absolute unconstitutionality and illegality of the executive government in attempting to enact laws by executive authority, in conquered territories, out of the United States. Sir, whether the power exists in the President or not, may be inferred by answering another question—does he wear a crown? That's the only question. If he wears a crown—if he is the king of the country—if we are his subjects, and they who are conquered by the arms of the country become his subjects also, and owe him allegiance, why, then, according to well established principles, until the interference of the legislature, but no longer even then, he may conquer—he may govern—he may impose laws—he may lay taxes—he may assess duties. The king of England has done it, in the various cases of conquest, from the conquest of Wales and Ireland, down to the conquest of the West India islands, in the war of '56, and in the wars growing out of the French revolution. The King of England has done it; done it by royal prerogative; done it in the government of his own subjects, existing in or inhabiting territories not under the protection of English law, but governed by him until Parliament puts them under protection of English law. Now, sir, there was laid before us at the commencement of the session, a system of legislation for Mexico, as for a conquered country. Let us not confound ideas that are in themselves separable and necessarily distinct. This is not the question; whether he who is in an enemy's country at the head of an army, may not supply his daily wants; whether he may not seize the granaries and the herds—if he choose so to conduct the war—of the enemy in whose country he is—that is one thing, but the question is here; whether sitting in the Presidential House, by an act of mere authority, when the country is conquered and subdued, the President of the United States, may by, and of, and through his own power establish in Mexico a system of civil law.

We have read, sir, and some of us have not forgotten it, in all books of authority treating of the law of nations, that when a country is conquered or ceded, its existing laws are not changed till the competent authority of the conquering power changes them. That I hold to be the universal doctrine of public law. Well, here is a system of levying taxes—repealing old laws—and making new ones; a system behind that, of which I read with pain and mortification, for I find in this communication of the Secretary sanctioned by the President, that our brave troops, (as they are always called, ten times in every page,) were directed to lay hold on all the little municipal treasures—all the little collections for social purposes, that carried on the interior, the municipal, what we should call the parish concerns of Mexico! They were directed to seize them all! The War Department issued orders to chase the government of Mexico like a partridge on the mountain, from city to city—to give it no rest for the sole of its foot—to exterminate it; and another order issued from the Treasury Department at the same time, directed this seizure of all these small and petty sums of public money. I am obliged, therefore, to the gentleman from South Carolina for having brought this subject to the attention of the Senate.

I am happy in having an opportunity of expressing my repugnance to all the doctrine and all the practice. Where will it lead to? What does the President do with this money? Why, he supports the army! But this money never passes under any appropriation of law. The constitution of the United States says that the Executive power shall have no appropriations for military purposes for more than two years. But here there is a standing appropriation, put at the disposition and discretion of the President of the United States of all the money he can collect by this system of personal, Executive legislation over seven millions of people, and that under the constitution of the United States! If the statement of this case does not attract the attention of the community, —in short, if the question is not argued before an American Senate when it is stated, it is beyond my power to illustrate it by any further argument.

Sir, while I rejoice that the honorable member from South Carolina has done so important a service as to put this question in a proper and a clear light before the community and the Senate; and while I agree, as I have said, in all that he has uttered on the topics which he has treated; that topic which was upon my mind and my conscience more than all the rest, was a topic which he did not treat, and in regard to which I fear I may not expect—would to God that I could expect!—his concurrence, and the strength of his arm; I mean the object, plain and manifest, original in the inception of this war, not always avowed, but always however the real object; the creation of new States on the southern border of the United States, to be formed out of the territory of Mexico, and the people inhabiting the territory of Mexico. If after a service of thirty years in these councils, he could have taken a lead—if his convictions of duty, I mean to say, could have allowed him to take a lead and make a stand for the integrity of the United States—even with these large recent accessions, which I am willing to consider are brotherly accessions, that I have no disposition to reject, discourage or discountenance in the existing circumstances of the case—if, I say, sir, that at the end of our common service, now for thirty years, the honorable member could have seen his line of duty to lie in such a direction that he could have taken a stand for the integrity of the United States—these United States, into whose service he and I entered in early life, with warm and equally warm patriotic affections—the love of a known country, a defined country, an American country—if he had found it consistent with his duty to have taken such a stand, and I had perished in supporting him in it, I should feel that I had perished in a service eminently connected with the prosperity and true honor of the country.

Mr. President, I am obliged to my friend from Georgia for having taken that view of some topics in this case, with his usual clearness and ability, which will relieve me from the necessity of discussing those subjects which he has taken up. I feel, sir, the great embarrassment which surrounds me, brought about by those events which have taken place and been adverted to in the Senate. It has been stated by the gentleman to whom I alluded, [Mr. CASS.] that the whole world knows that a treaty has come hither from Mexico—that it has been acted upon here, and is sent back—that a member of this body, occupying a prominent position in its deliberations and conduct, has been sent out as a minister with full powers to make explanations—of course not explanations of what was done in Mexico, but explanations of what has been done here. There has been such a paper here—I allude to none of its particulars, although following the example of the honorable member from Michigan, who says that all the world knows there is a treaty, I might say all the world knows, too, exactly what the treaty is, for the details are as well known as the principal fact. I feel, sir, as I said, a new embarrassment. On the events that have occurred here within three weeks, political friends to some extent differ, and that goes nearer to my heart than any dart that political adversaries could direct.

The war is odious. Generally speaking, taking the whole country together, the war is odious in a high degree. The country is distressed. A treaty has been offered, it has been here and it has been sent back. Now, I feel, sir, that there has been manifested throughout the country a very strong desire, for the sake of peace, that this treaty, or any treaty, should be ratified. The business of the country is disorganized and distressed. Men know not what to calculate upon. The occupations of life are embarrassed. The finances of individuals, as well as of the country, are much deranged; the circumstances of individuals placing them in great exigency and necessity of immediate relief; and there has come up a strong expression in favor of any treaty on any terms, if it will bring peace. Now, sir, I am not for any treaty on any terms, though it bring peace. In my judgment, with entire diffidence therein, and entire deference to the better judgment of others, I think that this indiscriminate demand of peace in any circumstances and on any terms, is either an effusion of ecstatic delight at the prospect of getting rid of an abominated war; or else it is the result of a feeling for which I have not so much respect—that we are to take this, whatever it may be; or I will rather say, that we are to take whatever may be offered, lest our masters should give us harder terms. It is either the effusion of joy at the prospect of putting an end to the war, or else that negative resolution could—

I believe, sir, that the press on all sides, with very few exceptions—perhaps uniting for once—have for the last three weeks pressed the Senate, by their daily counsels and advice, to take the treaty whatever it may be. All these considerations which seem to me to spring from the first impulse and not from the sober second thought of the people, appear to be designed—I will not say designed, but calculated, as they have been calculated—to press forward the councils of the Senate; and to induce these councils to take any bit of parchment, or any bit of paper which could be called or concluded to be a treaty—to clench it, and confirm it, with our eyes blindfolded? No, sir—with our eyes dead, sightless as the eyes of a marble statue, to all the future!

On these subjects, sir, to the extent to which it may be proper for me to discuss them, I wish to declare my sentiments once for all; not going back to the origin of the war—not re-examining orders of the Executive—not pausing to consider, as my honorable friend from Georgia has done, the various stages in the progress of the campaigns, in which it might seem to have been, and I think he has proved that it was, the duty of the Executive to consider the propriety of arresting the war—without attempting any of this sort of disursive dissertation upon the case, I nevertheless desire to express my opinions upon the state of the country—upon the farther prosecution of the war—and upon that most important, and, if not vital, most interesting question, the revenue and the ability of the country in the present existing legislation of Congress to supply the public demands. An understanding however, was entered into yesterday, to which I was a party, that the question upon the final passage of this bill should be taken to-day. I do not propose to depart from that understanding. If I had strength, which I have not, and health, which I have not, there is not time, without pushing the Senate into a very late session, to say what I wish to say. I will, therefore, with the permission of the Senate—and I hope not without the concurrence of the honorable member who is at the head of the Finance Committee, postpone what I have farther to say upon this subject, until the early part of next week, when I understand the Loan Bill will be before the Senate. This measure is to raise men—that measure is to pay them. The object, therefore, of both is one—the farther prosecution of the war in Mexico. What I have to say then, may as well be said appropriately on one bill as the other, and therefore I shall not now detain the Senate, but if an opportunity should be offered, upon the earliest introduction of the Loan Bill, I shall claim the privilege of expressing myself on the several points, which I have now mentioned to the Senate.

Mr. CASS.—Mr. President: Before I proceed to the more serious part of my undertaking, I beg to make a few remarks somewhat personal to myself. And I am induced to do so in consequence of an allusion made the other day by my honorable friend from Delaware, for I am sure he will permit me to call him such, and which I frankly confess, I did not take in very good part. The Senator said I was, or had constituted myself the champion of the administration, and that I had blown a trumpet and uttered a note of defiance—that I had thrown down a glove which he, in the spirit I presume of chivalry, had taken up. Now, sir, all this is incorrect. I gave no challenge; I assumed no championship; I uttered no note of defiance. The very thing which the Senator from Delaware supposes I did, was the very thing I feel I could not have had the folly to do. I said, on the introduction of the army bill, that in proposing it I should not touch any of the disputed points, which divide our two great political parties, but I thought from appearances which could not be misapprehended that these would be introduced by others. I said further, that the discussion of the great topics of the day, respecting the war, could not be avoided, though I had hoped they would be postponed till this necessary bill was passed; but that at any rate, however severe might be the attack, I trusted it would be as earnestly as easily repelled. This is the substance of my remarks, sir, and I must say to the honorable Senator from Delaware, that he has not a little surprised me by deducing from them the conclusion that I had constituted myself the champion of the administration, and that I had brought on a controversy by the very terms with which I disclaimed any such intention. Why, sir, I knew all this would come, and so did every member of the Senate. I knew that the course of the administration would be severely assailed on the other side of the chamber, and my conviction was not the less certain that it would be promptly met on this side and easily repelled. But I trust I did not say, certainly I did not think, it would be repelled by me. I knew that task was committed to better hands than mine. I knew there were faithful sentinels on this side of the Senate; able and experienced statesmen; prompt, powerful and fearless debaters, who have passed much of their lives in these legislative encounters, and who would defend with energy, and I believed with success, those measures which met the entire approbation of the great party to which they belong. It is in no spirit of affected humility that I feel I have no right to assume the duties of men like these. My life has not been passed in such scenes as this. The early and more active portion of it was spent amid the toils and privations and exposures of a new country, and not a little of it upon the very verge of civilization, and even beyond it, where duties far different from those committed to us here, called me and occupied me. A vote of the Senate has placed me, contrary to my own wishes, at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, and if, in the discharge of its duties, I can lend any aid towards what I consider the best interests of my country in the situation in which she is placed, I shall be satisfied without making the vain attempt attributed to me by the Senator from Delaware. So much for my championship. It is not my glove which the honorable Senator has picked up, but his own.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) in the discussion of yesterday, gave his opinions upon some important topics connected with this bill. The questions presented by him, are of the highest importance, and were urged with all that closeness and clearness, which characterize his intellectual labors. I desire to express not only my dissent from his conclusions, but as briefly as may be, the views that have struck me during the short period, I have had to reflect upon the subject. At the very commencement, I feel a difficulty which will be obvious to all that know—and who does not know the process, at once compressed and logical, by which that Senator reaches his deductions?—in consequence of being compelled to rely upon my memory, and not having been able to read his speech, which has been laid upon our tables since we took our seats in this chamber to-day.

However, I may have misapprehended him, during the progress of his remarks, I did not misapprehend him at their commencement. He began by asserting that there was not a single reason in favor of the passage of this bill. Certainly, sir, this assertion is far too broad. We may differ as to the weight of the arguments, in support of this measure, but to pronounce almost ex cathedra, that there is no argument at all which would justify its passage, seems to be rather a bad augury for fair investigation.

The Senator says it will be mischievous here, because it will have a tendency to alarm the money interest. Now, sir, I have no invidious comparison to make among the various occupations of our community, the members of which, while laboring for themselves, are contributing also to the wealth of the country. It is not my habit. I would merely remark, that questions affecting the honor and interest of the country in her communication with other nations, must be decided upon much higher considerations than the effects they will produce upon the stock market, and upon the fluctuations which give to its speculations the spirit sometimes of gambling, rather than of sober calculation. But, sir, I do not agree with the Senator in his anticipations. If, as I understand him, a peace is necessary for the wholesome operation of the monied interests, any measures having a tendency to promote peace, would give confidence to those who control it. If, sir, an overwhelming force were immediately raised and dispatched to Mexico, no man can doubt but that this war would be immediately terminated, and the more vigorous our preparations, the more fixed our determination to prosecute it vigorously, the more convinced shall we be, and the Mexican people also, that peace will come and come speedily. So far from viewing this subject as the Senator does, I consider every step we take towards vigorous preparations, a step towards peace, and I believe it will strengthen and not weaken the confidence of the monied men, and aid, instead of injuring the money market. If we go on with a series of timid, irresolute, and indecisive measures, we may prolong this war till doomsday. If we strike one vigorous stroke, we may terminate it without delay.

The Senator says, also, that the passage of this bill will be mischievous in Mexico, because it will animate some of the parties, into which that unhappy country is divided, to increased exertions against us. If this be so, it presents to me a new chapter in human nature. When our country is at war, or apparently approaching it, to put on an armor and an attitude befitting the occasion, would be, according to this newprinciple of moral intercommunication, impolitic if not dangerous, as it would excite the enemy to more vigorous action. Mr. President, it is not thus I have read history, and it is not thus that public disputes are brought to satisfactory termination. If in peace to prepare for war, is a wise sentiment, now become an axiom, certainly, when hostilities have actually commenced, and two powers are contending for the mastery, if one relaxes its preparations for fear of animating the exertions of the other, it is not difficult to foresee to what dishonor such a course, whether originating in pusillanimity or false magnanimity, must necessarily lead.

But, sir, are there no reasons why this bill should now pass? There are, sir, and very strong ones too; so decisive, indeed, that even the powerful intellect of the Senator from South Carolina has not been able to satisfy me that there is one substantial objection to the measure.

We are at war with Mexico. The papers, indeed, of to-day, tell us that an armistice for two months has been concluded.—That is liable to be broken, and hostilities resumed from one day to another, as accident or design on the part of the enemy may dictate. And a proof of their bad faith in a similar arrangement at the city of Mexico, should warn us that little reliance can be placed upon these stipulations; and indeed the very despatch which brought us information of the armistice, brought us also information that it had been broken. And happen what may in the meantime, this armistice, at the end of the term, must give way to hostilities, unless prolonged by mutual consent, or terminated by a peace. And certainly it will not be prolonged by us unless a peace is to take its place.

Now, sir, what does a wise precaution require? It requires us to strengthen our forces in Mexico, and to make the most vigorous preparation to prosecute the war with renewed exertion, should our efforts to procure a peace prove fruitless.

You know, Mr. President, and the Senate knows, and the country knows, that a paper has arrived here and gone back to Mexico, with the imprimatur of this body upon it, modified indeed, but still fixing terms, which will lead to peace if accepted by the Mexican government. Now, sir, it may be accepted there or rejected, no man can tell which. The government is unstable, the people intractable and turbulent, and the country split into factions warring against one another, and each contending for supremacy. In such a state of things, what is our duty? It is, as I have already said, to be prepared for contingencies, and to recommence our military operations with the utmost vigor, as soon as the war recommences, if that event should happen.

But, in the second place, the very preparation we make, may be the reason for rendering its employment unnecessary. If the government and people of Mexico see, by the measures which we have taken here, that there is an absolute determination to overrun and overcome their country, that would furnish a strong motive for their acquiescence in the terms of peace. As our relaxation would encourage them to resist, so, renewed exertions on our part would show them the futility of resistance, and leave them no hope but in doing us justice. So much for the reasons in favor of the passage of this bill. The force it contemplates to raise may not be wanted. In that event, it will not be organized, and no injury will be done. It may be wanted, and in that event it will be ready for such contingencies as may happen.

The Senator from South Carolina says that when the President in his annual message, asked for this force, he did so in order to be able to prosecute the war more vigorously, and that to vote for this bill is to give a pledge that this should be done. This may be so, sir; but whether so or not, I am ready to give any necessary pledge upon the subject. The Senator is not in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, even should we fail in our efforts to obtain a peace. What are his views upon this subject, sir? He says that at the commencement of the session, the opinion was spreading everywhere that the whole of Mexico should be annexed to the United States, but that since that time a change has been going on; the result, I suppose, of our discussions, and that the acquisition of the whole Mexican territory is no longer desired. For my part, sir, I see no change whatever upon this subject. I believe the prevailing sentiment is now, just what it has been, during the whole progress of these hostilities. The Senator, in his remarks upon this subject some two or three months since, when asked for the proof that the acquisition of all Mexico was desired by the American people, referred to one or two demonstrations that had taken place at one or two public meetings, but failed to produce the slightest evidence, as indeed there was none, that the American people had determined upon this great experiment. The sentiment prevailed then, and prevails yet, that we may be compelled to make it by the obstinate injustice of the Mexicans, and that if we cannot terminate the war in any other way, we must terminate it by taking possession of their country, and holding it subject to our power, and with some kind of a government to provide for its internal security.

Well, sir, this state of things may come, but I hope not. But it will not be prevented by speeches and resolutions in this body. It will be prevented by much higher events. For myself, my opinion has been unchanged, and I have several times expressed it in this chamber. I think the annihilation of the Mexican government, and the annexation of the whole Mexican territory would be a serious injury to our confederacy. I see great inconvenience in the measure, and many sound practical objections to it. But I repeat also my previous declaration, that I am not one of those who believe that even that step would be fatal to us. My confidence in the progress and duration of this government is unshaken and unshakable. Its destiny, under God, is committed to the people, and no other earthly power can destroy it. However extensive may be the sphere of its operation, it has in it a spirit of vitality, growing out of the very principle of its formation and objects—the will of all for the good of all—which will enable it to resist many of those shocks of time and accident to which other governments have been exposed, and have fallen victims. If all this is a dream, sir, it is a very happy one, and a dream from which I have no wish to be awakened.

I desire, sir, to allude to a remark made by an honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.] Some time since he addressed the Senate upon this subject in a speech replete with able views and beautiful illustrations. It was one of those efforts which, while they do honor to the Speaker reflect honor upon all those who are associated with him in the discharge of the high functions committed to us. While I thank him for the pleasure he gave me, I thank him also for his favorable notice of a little word I used upon that occasion. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina had said, that the absorption of all Mexico would be fatal to us. While expressing the opinion I have just reiterated, that the measure would be injurious, I repudiated the idea that it would be fatal, and said that if we were to swallow all Mexico it would not kill us. Well, sir, it is a good old fashioned phrase, but the Senator from Virginia seemed to think that it required some protection, and threw over it his critical ægeis by saying it should hereafter become classical. I thank the honorable Senator for his kind interference, but I beg to assure him that the phrase had some pretensions to be a standard one even before I used it, and he shall be convinced it. It is at least as old, in our language, as the time of the translators of the Bible. How much more aged I do not stop to inquire; but in the language whence our Bible was translated, it is at least thirty centuries older. "Israel is swallowed up" said one of her prophets when the throne of David was overturned, and his kingdom annexed, aye, annexed to the empire of Assyria. "Israel is swallowed up." Now, sir, I may congratulate myself upon my position. Supported by the Bible, and by the honorable Senator from Virginia, I may defy the shafts of criticism, invulnerable to the heel behind such bucklers!

The Senator from South Carolina instead of a vigorous prosecution of the war, proposes to withdraw our troops from the other portions of the Mexican country, and to establish them upon a line, which shall be the boundary of the territory which we intend to hold. This proposition has, in substance, been twice before made by the honorable Senator; once at the last session of Congress, and once some weeks since at the present. He supported his views then, and now, with that force which marks his reasoning.

But while he interested he did not convince me. There never was such a line, there never will be such a one. I say it with all deference, but with a perfect conviction of the truth, that such a line is impossible. That which the Senator proposes runs from the Rio Grande to the Passo Del Norte, probably about eight hundred miles; and thence, with a deflection not necessary to notice, to the Pacific ocean which is a little less than an equal distance; making upon the whole route probably 1,500 miles. The force required to defend the line of the Rio Grande the honorable Senator does not give; but he thinks a small one would be sufficient. I have conversed with one of our ablest generals upon this subject, and he considers 20,000 men necessary to the defence of the Rio Grande frontier.

From the Passo Del Norte to the Gulf of California, the Senator from South Carolina thinks, that one regiment and a few small vessels of war would be an adequate protection against Mexicans and Indians. What effect armed vessels can have in the defence of a line, which stretches six hundred miles beyond them, as I do not comprehend, I will not stop to inquire. Their guns would probably command the beach off which they might anchor, if they anchored near enough. But I do not believe that a Mexican guerrilla would place himself within their reach, in order to cross a line open to him in all directions. As to the regiment if equally divided, its number fit for duty would probably give one man to every mile of distance between the Passo and the gulf; certainly not more.

In his annual message, the President has presented with great force the objections to this proposition. I shall not repeat them, for they must be fresh in the recollection of the Senate. They seem to me to prove, beyond question, the impolicy of establishing such a line, and the impracticability of holding it. With no natural boundary, with no defensive stations, for how many could a few hundred men occupy, and defend? with a boundless region on both sides; with the necessity of bringing supplies through long difficult and exposed routes, and with the ever-consuming disorders of the climate, how could such a line be defended with such a force? Our troops must be in detachments, or they can afford no protection; while the enemy may be in masses, and bring their whole force to operate upon a part of ours. If we are defeated, we are destroyed; for we have no reinforcements to order up, nor to fall back on. Our point of support might be 1,000 miles off. If the enemy are defeated, they retire beyond an enchanted line, where danger cannot come.

But after all, what good would this do, even if the line could be defended? How would it bring peace? What possible motive would the Mexicans have to make peace in such a state of things? They have it at all times, when they desire it; for the line is a Chinese wall, beyond which we may look indeed, but must not pass. For if we should pass it, we should that moment abandon our plan, confess its inefficiency, and commence a new system of operations to recover the ground from which we had retreated before entering upon this dangerous experiment. We assume our line. We take a position behind it, covering the country we intend to hold. It is a sine qua non; and we will not treat with Mexico till she relinquishes all right to the region we claim. What then has she to gain by peace? No territory; for all we hold we keep. No honor; for that is compromised by the cession. No exemption from the evils and calamities of war, for she is just as secure behind the line while the statu quo lasts as she would be if a treaty were signed, sealed, ratified, and promulgated. If she choose to sit still there is pence; if she choose to attack us, she attacks us; and if successful follows up her advantages till she strikes a decisive blow; but if unsuccessful she retires behind her barrier, and awaits a better opportunity to renew her efforts. Such a state of things would be intolerable for any thing I see. No government could maintain it. No public sentiment could bear it. Mexico would have every motive to continue it, because the chances of the future might give her success, and restore her territory; whereas they could do her no injury, and in the meantime, she would not put the seal to her own dishonor.

As to the defence of a line between coterminous countries, it rests upon very plain principles. If the countries are at war, one or the other or both will attempt to cross it. Neither will remain behind their line for the avowed purpose of defending it, unless indeed one of them is so weak that offensive measures would be impracticable. If an irruption is made, the parties making it have necessarily some military operations in view, which if successful they pursue, but if unsuccessful they abandon and return. The defence of the line itself in this state of things becomes a secondary object, yielding to ulterior considerations involved in the plans of operations. An invading force, if repelled, must be followed, and if followed must be pursued to its places of refuge or the battle field, where the fate of arms must decide the contest. Any contest between nations involving other principles would be irreconcilable with public sentiment and incompatible with the plainest dictates of policy. No, Mr. President, let us go on in the old fashioned way. I will not say the good old fashioned way, because the term would be inapplicable and improper; but I will say the approved old fashioned way, and wage this war as our fathers waged war before us, and as our sons will probably wage it after us, if driven to this last appeal of nations. Let us discard these untried plans and place our faith in experience, not in experiments. Let us push our operations firmly as need be, but mercifully as may be, till we have conquered enough of the country to overcome obstinate injustice, and thus to conquer a peace.

But a principal object of the Senator from South Carolina seems to be, to place the administration in the wrong in the measures it has directed to be taken, for levying contributions for the support and subsistence of our army in Mexico. To do this he has commenced with what I consider a fundamental error, that when we enter an enemy's country in war we take with us all the powers of our own constitution. If it is meant by this that an invading army has a right to exercise all the powers fairly derivable from the constitution, and relating to a state of war; the proposition is true, but entirely useless for the purpose of the honorable Senator's argument. But if it is meant that the guarantees of the constitution accompany the army and operate upon the movements of our troops in a hostile country, nothing can be more erroneous in principle, or would be more injurious in practice. The slightest reflection will satisfy any one that the extension of our constitutional guarantees over countries occupied by our armies would be utterly subversive of all the rights of war. We could not march a step without finding impediments that could not be overcome. The provisions of the constitution are:

"That Congress shall have power

"To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisals, and make rules and regulations concerning captures on land and water

"To raise and support armies

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

The constitution further provides that:

"The President of the United States shall be commander in chief of the army and navy," &c.

These are all the provisions of the constitution bearing upon the war-making power.

In the whole history of our legislation there are but two provisions respecting the conduct of our forces in foreign countries, and these are coeval with the government, having been first passed in 1775, and again in 1806, and forming thus a permanent part of our military code. These two provisions are in articles fifty-one and fifty-five of the rules and articles of war. The former declares that—

"No officer or soldier shall do violence to any person who brings provisions or other necessaries to the camp, garrison, or quarters of the forces of the United States, employed in any parts out of the said States, under pain of death, or such other punishment as a court martial may direct."

The latter declares that—

"Whoever, belonging to the armies of the United States employed in foreign parts, shall force a safeguard, shall suffer death."

Here is our whole written legislation, constitutional or congressional, upon this subject.

Now, sir, like other nations, we are liable to war; and when engaged in it, we are entitled to all the rights, which that condition brings with it. Nor do I believe, that those rights are in the smallest tittle diminished, because we choose that our chief magistrate should wear a hat and not a crown, to follow out an allusion made this evening by a distinguished Senator. Our army, in the prosecution of war, enters a hostile country. What may it do there? Originally, in the early ages of the world, the right of conquest included an unlimited right to seize and dispose of the persons and property of all the people subjugated by its arms.—Hear the earliest Jewish historian:

"And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men and the women, and the little ones of every city, we left none to remain."

"Only the cattle we took for a prey unto ourselves, and despoiled the cities which we took."

In the progress of time, however, better sentiments prevailed, and humanity endeavored to check, if not the progress of conquering armies, at least the evils that followed in their train, by laying down rules for assuaging the calamities of war. These conventional rules established by the general concurrence of civilized nations, now constitute that part of the law of nations applicable to this subject. To be sure, they are liable to be violated, and when not violated, to be narrowed in their operations by controlling circumstances; but their general obligation no one of the present family of nations calls in question.

I repeat, what may our army do in a hostile country? It may do any thing proper to promote the objects it has in view, which is not prohibited by its own government or by the laws of nations. It goes forth to battle and to conquest. Its effort is to subdue the enemy by all the aggressive means it can exercise. To injure him, when, how, and where it can, subject only to the limitation I have laid down, in order to compel him to accept the terms of peace prescribed by its government.

But in the practical exertion of these powers we are met, in limine, by the suggestion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN,] that it is the conqueror to whom they belong, and that this conqueror is the sovereign, and the sovereign in the United States is the people, who alone can exercise these high attributes, or at any rate some of them. It may be remarked, however, that they do not belong to the conqueror, as such, but to the enemy; whether an invading army is advancing or retreating, victorious or defeated, its rights are still the same, and belong to it as long as the last band composing it, remains in arms upon hostile territory. But let that pass. The Senator also says, that the people in this country is the sovereign. I shall take no issue with him upon that proposition; I concede it in the fullest extent. It is one of the first lessons we learn after leaving the cradle, it is as broad in its operation as this broad land, and the sentiment itself is probably one of the last we abandon in life. But, sir, what then? The Senator will not require the sovereign people of the United States to exercise all their right, either of peace or war, in person.

This is done, and must be done, by their agents, civil and military, who are responsible to them and controlled by the laws they choose to establish. And if our sovereign may not exercise all the just powers of war by our military officers, which a European sovereign may exercise, in person or by proxy, it follows that countries with monarchical forms of government have important rights of independence which do not belong to us. I dissent, toto cœlo, from any such doctrine, and from any principles necessarily leading to it. We stand on the broad platform of national equality, and will not yield the smallest particle of our rights to forein pretensions, royal or imperial.

Well, sir, our army commenced its operations. It may overrun the whole hostile country, doing all those deeds of distress and death, which it must do to a great extent, to accomplish the objects of its destination. Whence does it derive the right to do all this, let me ask the Senator from South Carolina? Not from the constitution and the laws, except from the general powers I have quoted relating to war; for there is not a single specific grant in our whole code looking even to such a state of things. Let him, or any one else, put his finger upon that clause of our statute book which authorizes an American soldier to kill a Mexican, to burn a house, or to seize and hold a city, or to do the thousand and one acts of violence which go to make up the consistory of war. Well, then, even without specific powers from our sovereign, our army may do these deeds simply because a war exists, and they are its proper incident. No other grant is necessary. Our sovereign says to our armed citizens, I am at war; go forth and maintain the honor and interest of your country. Now, having shown what an army does and may do, I may call upon the honorable Senator to show what it may not do within the limitations I have laid down. He will acknowledge it may kill a Mexican, not because it is expressly authorized to do so by law, but because that act is proper in its operations, and is allowed by the general laws of warfare.—The right to levy supplies, whether of money, of provisions, of forage, of clothing, of the means of transportation, and of other objects not necessary to be enumerated, belongs to the state of war. No one will deny that fact. It accompanied the first and last army that ever entered the battle field, and will accompany every one that may hereafter follow in the same career. In Europe it has been common in later years to subsist and support armies in the enemy's country, and there have been cases, and, I believe, not a few of them, where they have sent home to the national treasury large sums collected during their progress. The allies, on the downfall of Napoleon, levied upon France a contribution of 1,500,000,000 of francs. Whenever a European army enters an enemy's country it calls upon the municipal authorities of each city and town, to contribute such supplies in kind and such amount of money as it chooses to demand, under the penalty of military execution. That threat, I believe, has never yet failed. No one calls in question the right of our troops to take supplies in kind as an incident to war. Let those who maintain the distinction, either in principle or practice, between supplies in kind and in cash show it, and show where is the power to demand the one and not the other

Why, sir, the error of the Senator from South Carolina I conceive to be this:—He seems to think that an express grant of power from the sovereign of the country is necessary to the exercise of some of the rights of war. If to some, they are to all; for the most acute mind can draw no line between them—I mean between those usually exercised in legitimate warfare. As to the power of the sovereign to restrain the use of these means of carrying on war, or to prohibit them entirely, there can be no doubt. Congress, the legislative agents of our sovereign, may at any time establish an entire code for the conduct of our armies in hostile countries, and may restrict their powers within the narrowest limits. The question, however, is not what Congress may do, but what it has done. It has yet done nothing of the kind, and our troops are free to act as the good of the country may require, and as the incidents belonging to a state of war fairly permit. The exercise of these powers is of course vested in the commanding officer, unless directed or restrained by superior authority at home. The President is the constitutional commander-in-chief, and whether present or absent may direct the operations of our armies and prescribe the mode of conduct they shall adopt. He has done so in the present case.

I see no difference, sir, in the application of the general principle, arising out of the mode in which a contribution is enforced, whether it is levied by the agency of our own officers or of Mexican officers, the power is the same, and whether upon municipal authorities, upon classes, or upon individuals. The fairer and the more equal is the mode, the less is the injury and the greater the satisfaction. And an American army, of all other armies, should seek to attain its object with the least distress. The contribution is an assessment, and all must pay it, who are subject to the rules of war. And it is the nature, and not the name of the thing, which determines its true quality. Call it as you please, tax; duty, impost, supply, contribution, or what not, it is a forcible demand of private means, made by an army in an enemy's country of such a nature and amount as the commander of the army may direct—rendered more acceptable in the present instance by being levied and collected in conformity with the Mexican laws, and thus accommodating itself, as far as possible, to Mexican usages. There never was a better form of contribution than that which we have adopted—one more equal in its operation, or less oppressive in its administration.

Now, sir, what is the objection to this? I understand there are two reasons urged by the Senator from South Carolina against the course of the administration on this subject. The first constitutional; and, the second political. With respect to the first, if I comprehended the train of reasoning pursued by the Senator, he considers the contributions required by our army in Mexico as taxes, and their collection as an exercise of the tax levying power conferred only upon Congress by the constitution. I cannot, sir, for myself doubt for a moment, that that provision of the constitution is confined to the United States. As I have already remarked, if the guarantees of that instrument accompany our armies, we may just as well abandon all attempts to carry on offensive operations abroad, as our armies could not march a foot without finding themselves surrounded with insuperable obstacles. Congress may undoubtedly prescribe the mode in which forced impositions shall be collected in an enemy's country. But it may do that, not under the tax levying power, but under the war declaring, and thence, war regulating power. It may put an end to the practice, and when it regulates, or prohibits it, its decision becomes the law of our armies for a strict obedience to which every one within its proper sphere is responsible; but until Congress does interfere the right and its exercise depend on the principles I have stated, and not upon analogies, verbal or substantial, applicable only to a different state of things. I cannot but remark however, sir, that if any one who has doubts upon this question will run his eye over the constitution, he will see at a glance, that its powers and protections are intended not for a foreign country, but for our own. That would be a strange construction indeed, which would give to the Mexicans the right "to be secure in their persons, houses, &c.," to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury, &c., and to all the other political blessings which make our government what it is. And who shall divide the constitution, and tell us what portion operates abroad as well as at home? That the whole of it does not follow our armies is clearly shown from the consequences which would flow from such a construction. There is but one practical solution of the difficulty, and I use that word difficulty in deference to the opinions advanced by gentlemen of the most powerful intellect, and not because I feel the slightest doubt myself; and that solution is to confine the constitution to our own country, except where its provisions obviously extend abroad; and this brings us again to the war making power, which would enable Congress during the continuance of hostilities to provide at its discretion for the government of countries held by our armies.

The political objection urged by the Senator against the exercise of this power is founded in the dangers which might result from it. Well, sir, there is danger in such a power. There is danger in all war powers. The distinguished Senator in a speech last session, which few will ever forget who heard it, depicted with his peculiar force the danger of triumphant generals returning with conquering armies; even his graphic description did not appal me, for our generals and our armies are but constituent portions of our people, and I trust for many a generation will mingle with the mighty mass of American freemen, without delay, and without reluctance, as soon as their military duties are terminated. But there are greater dangers than these, and first among them is the loss of national honor. Discard your military means, because the plains of liberty are filled with the crumbling monuments of republics, overthrown by a disloyal soldiery, and where would be your own safety in these days of national ambition and aggrandizement?

From my own views of our institutions, and from the opinion I have formed of the character of the American people, formed during an active life, passed under circumstances, which brought me into contact with men of all opinions and pursuits, I consider the destruction of this government by military usurpation as one of the very last evils which threatens us—to be apprehended only, when our necks are prepared for the yoke, and when it will matter little who puts it on.

The President may abuse this power, says the Senator. Certainly he may, and so he may abuse any power; but powers must be granted, though they may be abused. If any one fears that result now, let him prepare a legislative remedy to prevent it. As that is not my case, I shall not volunteer my services for such a work; but I am prepared at any time to look into the whole matter, and to hold all who have taken a part in it to a strict accountability. The President desires nothing else, nor his political friends for him; and I predict that any investigation will but commend the administration the more, to the confidence of the country. But let not a most important right belonging to the American people, and one which may be essential to their military success, be cast to the winds, because some time or other, or some where or other, abuses may grow out of its exercise.

In our investigation into the origin of this war, there are two separate questions which present themselves for consideration; one, which may be termed external, and the other, internal. The former connects itself with us as a people, whose character and conduct have been arraigned before the world, and the latter concerns ourselves alone, as it relates to the course of the Executive in the earlier measures which led to the war. The war itself may be just, and we stand acquitted of every charge of aggression; while the President may have passed beyond the limits of his constitutional duty, and assumed to direct, where Congress alone had the power to act. By far the most important question touches the character of our country, and this involves the justice of the war. The subject itself is a fruitful one, and has been so often examined and exhausted, that it requires some moral courage to discuss it even briefly. I shall endeavor to compress my remarks within the narrowest space, confining myself, as much as may be, to propositions rather than to illustrations.

Had we cause of war against Mexico? It has been said, and upon this floor, that to give just cause of war there must be a clear right coupled with a sort of necessity before a resort is had to this extreme necessity. Such general considerations, however, as this, amount to very little in guiding the conduct of nations, as a slight analysis of this principle will show. The honorable Senator himself who advanced it, concedes that we had a clear right, and if a "sort of necessity" to enforce it had been coupled with this, we should have stood justified in the eyes of the world had we declared war against Mexico years ago. And what is this "sort of necessity," without which the right is to remain barren? Why, I take it, if thirty years of aggression on one side and of remonstrance on the other, do not constitute this necessity, it would be vain to seek it in any war, undertaken in modern times.

The fact is, sir, the question of war is a complicated one, into which considerations of right and expediency enter largely, if not equally. If one nation injures another, and refuses or unreasonably delays to make satisfaction, this gives to the injured power just cause of war. But whether she shall undertake it, depends upon her own position—on that of her adversary—on the magnitude of the injury, and frequently, on other circumstances, political or financial, which it would be useless to specify, and impossible to enumerate. Nations must and will judge for themselves under these circumstances, as well of the right itself, as of the "sort of necessity" there may be of enforcing it. The right once established, and that the gentleman himself concedes in this case, the resort to force is a question rather of discretion than of morals, as it is a remedy consequent upon the violation of national rights. It is too late to tell us, sir, that we had no just cause of war. Successive administrations of the government, and the voice of the American people have pronounced an irrevocable judgment upon that question.

Our complaints against Mexico commenced nearly with the commencement of her independence. They go back to the year 1817, and come down to the present day in almost one uninterrupted series of outrages. I shall not state them seriatim, nor enter into the detail of their nature and extent. This has been repeatedly done, and the official documents are before the country. I will merely classify, from an able report made by Mr. Forsyth in 1817, the various heads of complaints, which will present the general aspect of the subject.

1. Treasure belonging to citizens of the United States has been seized by Mexican officers, in its transit from the capital to the coast.

2. Vessels of the United States have been captured, detained, and condemned, upon the most frivolous pretext.

3. Duties have been exacted from others, notoriously against law, or without law.

4. Other vessels have been employed, and in some instances ruined, in the Mexican service, without compensation to the owners.

5. Citizens of the United States have been imprisoned for long periods of time, without being informed of the offences, with which they were charged.

6. Other citizens have been murdered and robbed by Mexican officers on the high seas, without any attempt to bring the guilty to justice.

General Jackson, in a message to Congress in 1837, stated that these causes of complaint "would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war." This sentiment was fully concurred in by the Committee of Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, who said "that ample cause exists for taking war into our own hands; and we believe that we shall be justified in the opinion of other nations, for taking such a step."

President Van Buren, in December, 1837, distinctly told Congress teat redress was beyond the reach of the Executive, and could only be obtained by the action of Congress, which action must of course have been war.

As to the conventions which have since been made by the two countries, and violated by Mexico, I need not enter into their history. They are fresh in the recollection of all. These three conventions, by the infidelity of the Mexican government, have proved nearly fruitless; and after thirty years of injury on the one side, and of remonstrance on the other, there is nothing left to us but to abandon all hope of redress, or to obtain it by a vigorous prosecution of the war. Who, then, shall say to us that we have commenced a war unjustly, which was in fact commenced by the enemy, and which, even had it been declared by us, would have been justified by the practice of nations, and by the injuries we had sustained?

I do not intend, Mr. President, to be led into the discussion of any polemic, respecting the wickedness of war. I leave that to the schools and the debating societies. I am content, and if not, I am compelled to take things as they are, as they have been, and as they will be. Sent here as practical men to deal with the interests of our country, we must not be diverted from the true path marked out by the experience and the usages of the world, by crude speculations and misplaced philanthropy. We were aggrieved and injured, and could obtain no redress; and we were entitled to take our remedy into our own hands, in order to obtain that justice which was pertinaciously withheld from us. The most superficial reader of modern history—the most casual observer of passing events, must know that outrages far less flagrant in their character, than those committed by Mexico against us, have occasioned half the wars of modern times.

But, sir, I am well aware that these considerations apply only to our just right to declare war against Mexico at any time, within the last twenty years. We did not commit the offensive. Mexico herself struck the first stroke, and why? Because Texas was annexed to the United States. I recollect the gentlemen on the other side of the chamber thought there was some fluttering in our ranks, when this avowal was first made.—But there was none whatever, sir. We concede the proposition in its fullest extent, that this annexation was the cause of war. How then, sir, stands this great question, as to the justice of its commencement?

I will not trespass upon the patience of the Senate by presenting this subject in all its details. I will again compress my views into a series of propositions, and thus spare your time and my own.

Texas, a constituent portion of the Mexican republic, declared itself independent, as Mexico, a constituent portion of the Spanish monarchy, had done before it, and asserted and maintained its rights by a revolution.

The war between these two powers continued for some time, with varying success, till 1836, when a Mexican army, led by the chief magistrate of the republic, was conquered, and dispersed or made prisoners, and the commander himself captured.

After the month of June of that year, Texas continued in the undisturbed possession of her independence, and no effort was made to reduce her, not a single Mexican party, with the exception, I understand, of two predatory incursions having since ever made an inroad into her territory. The war was in fact at an end.

In the meantime, the independence of Texas was acknowledged by the United States, and by some of the other principal powers of the world: and she was permitted to take her equal station among the nations of the earth.

In cases of revolution, where one portion of a nation is endeavoring to separate itself from another, while the contest is going on, and each party is exerting itself to attain its object, it is the duty of other powers to look on, and not to interfere in favor of one side or the other. But there is a limit to this duty. Such contest cannot be permitted forever to continue. The peace of the world forbids it, and there are instances on record where other nations have said: This struggle has continued long enough. It must now be terminated, and the revolting people be securred in their independence. But there it still another limit to this duty of non-interference, and that is the abandonment by the original government of all attempts to reduce by forse its revolting citizens. The abandonment of the remedy is the abandonment of the right. The peace of the world cannot be put to hazard by the pertinacious obstinacy of any nation, which holds on to nominal claims, without the power and the disposition to maintain them. The neutral duties exist only flagrante bello. And when the war ceases, the previous relations of the two States cease, and they become like other nations —"enemies in war, in peace friends." When Texas was annexed to this confederacy, this was her relation to Mexico, and she had the same right to form treaties of alliance or annexation, as had the people from whom she had separated. "If these things are so," the union of Texas and this country was no just cause of offence to Mexico, and gave her no right to complain of our conduct.

And this view is fortified by an incident, clearly indicative of the public opinion in Mexico of the value of her right to subjugate Texas even while the question of annexation between this latter power and the United States was pending, Mexico offered to acknowledge the independence of Texas, if she would engage not to join the American confederacy. This offer was in fact the very acknowlegement it proposed to make conditionally. It conceded the inability of Mexico to enforce her claim of sovereignty, while it asked as the condition of recognition the surrender of the right to direct its future political destiny, as might seem most acceptable to its people.

So much for the general subject of annexation, and the rights and duties growing out of it.

But it has been said, not in Mexico, but here, that the origin of this war was not in the annexation of Texas, but because we carried her boundary to the Rio Grande, and took possession of the country between the Nueces and that river. Who says this, Mr. President? Not the government or people of Mexico, but citizens of our own country, who find a cause of offence for the enemy which they have failed to discover for themselves. The Nueces is an American, not a Mexican boundary. The Texas of Mexico was Texas to the Sabine, with no intermediate boundary. In all the communications with the Mexican government, as I have had occasion to say before, no distinction is made between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. And the occupation by our forces of the country between these rivers, was never presented as an exclusive cause of complaint, nor indeed noticed in any manner whatever. It was the annexation and occupation of Texas, and not of any particular portion of Texas, which led to the reclamations and finally to the hostilities of Mexico. It was a question of title and not of boundary; a claim of right, which went for the whole and would never be satisfied with the relinquishment of a part. When the act for annexation passed, the Mexican minister in this country immediately protested against that measure; declared it to be just cause of war, and at the same time demanded his passports and left the country. And the supreme government of Mexico in March 1846 informed Mr. Slidell that it looked "upon annexation as a casus belli, and as a consequence of this declaration, negotiation was by its very nature at an end, and war was the only recourse of the Mexican government." And in conformity with these views, forces were collected upon the Rio Grande, in order that Mexico might take the "initiative" in hostilities against us, to borrow the expression of General Paredes in his orders to the commanding General. And, sir, these warnings and threatenings were no vain declarations. Mexico said what she would do and she did as she said. She declared to us that if we annexed Texas she would go to war. We annexed Texas, and she went to war. As early as April 1846 and before the movement of General Taylor could have been known in Mexico, her President directed the General upon the frontier to "attack" our army by every means which war permits.

Who then, sir, has a right to say what the Mexican government has never said, that they went to war, not because we annexed Texas, but because we took possession of the country west of the Nueces? In all the diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, there is no allusion to that river nor is any greater claim advanced to one of its banks, than to the other. Why then, when our country is summoned to trial at the bar of the public opinion of the world, why should the American Senate swell the catalouge of an enemy's grievances, and make out a better case for Mexico than she has made for herself? In our endeavor to do right to others, let us not do wrong to ourselves. Let us distrust our own judgment when we find ourselves inclined to take a more favorable view of the cause of Mexico, than she has taken for herself. Let us yield to justice, what we refuse to patriotism. There is no want of shrewdness in Mexican statesmen. They have made the best of their own case; and if they have omitted the passage of the Nueces in the catalogue of their wrongs, we may be sure it was no special wrong in their eyes; and that it was not because we crossed that river, but because we entered Texas, that our enemy attacked us, and thus commenced the war.

The question of the title of Texas to the country extending to the Rio Grande, has been several times elaborately discussed before the Senate, but never more ably than by the honorable Senators from Maryland, and Texas, [Messrs. JOHNSON and RUSK.] I listened with great pleasure to their exposition, and I am content to leave the subject where they left it. Altogether satisfied with the views they presented and equally satisfied, that I can add nothing to their force or clearness.

What judgment then are we to pronounce upon the measures which were directed to be taken, by the President previously to the commencement of the war by Mexico? This question is in fact a double one involving two considerations, one, affecting our relations with other countries, and the other our own institutions only. The former touches our character and conduct before the nations of the earth, while the latter relates only to ourselves.

This war was commenced by Mexico, that is, Mexico first attacked our troops, but I agree that if we pushed an armed force within the Mexican frontier without cause that measure throws on us the guilt of this war. How stands this matter?

1. It seems now to be generally agreed on all hands that the mere annexation of Texas gave to Mexico no just cause of war, and it follows that if its boundaries extended to the Rio Grande, then we did only what we had a right to do in marching our forces to that river, and are not responsible for results. Both of these points I have noticed, and the last has been conclusively established by the excellent views taken of the title of Texas by the Senators to whom I have referred.

2. If the title to the country from the Nueces to the Rio Grande was in dispute between the parties—and I believe no one here has ventured to deny that we had some well founded claims to it—and Mexico was preparing to take possession of it, we had a right to anticipate her, and thus to assert our own title.

3. But taking the strongest ground against ourselves, that we had no title whatever to the Rio Grande, still we had a right to go there if we considered such a measure necessary to our defence, and if the preparations of Mexico announced a design to attack us.

Did they announce such a determination? No one here, sir, will deny that fact. I shall not detain the Senate with the various proofs spread through the history of our intercommunication with Mexico, from the first suggestion respecting annexation till her army crossed the Rio Grande in order of battle. The protest of her minister here—the declaration of her government—its formal announciation to the European diplomatic agents accredited to it—the public order of its generals, and the collection and movement of its forces, left no doubt of its designs, and if they had the result would have disclosed them.

The movement of our troops under these circumstances, became a defensive measure; for as has been well remarked by the honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. BUTLER,) it is not necessary for the justification of a nation that it should await an impending attack. That power in fact commences the war, which makes the first threatening preparations for it, and not the one which merely strikes the first stroke. If a government collects its forces, marches them to its frontier, and makes public preparations for passing it, and thus for war; at the same time openly avowing its determination to commence it; both the reason of mankind and the usage of nations, authorize the people, whose peace is thus threatened, to anticipate their adversary, and to repel the threatened attack, by an attack of their own. This course is strictly defensive, and modern history abounds with examples illustrative of the principle.

So much for the question between us and Mexico as to the commencement of the war.

As to the internal question relating to the conduct of the President, it admits of but one answer. That cases may occur in which it is his duty under his constitutional power, to repel an actual or threatened invasion before Congress can act upon the subject, no one can doubt, and for myself I could never see any just constitutional or legal objections to the course he pursued in this whole affair. But there is one other consideration which is decisive, and that is, that the orders for the movement of the troops to the Rio Grande were given by the President on the 13th of January, 1846, and thirteen days before that, an act of Congress had been passed recognizing our jurisdiction west of the Nueces. It was the duty of the Executive to carry it into effect, and thus consider the boundary of Texas as extended beyond that river.

As the "initiative" was taken by our adversary, we took the defensive, and the attack being inevitable, it was for us to choose where to receive it. Such I repeat is the law of nations, and such the practice of nations.

So much for the commencement of the war.

I had anticipated many modes of attack upon the administration, and many avowed causes of censure; but, I must confess, I had not anticipated the charge of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that the administration had proved itself feeble or inefficient, and that the war had not been vigorously prosecuted. I am not going, sir, to undertake a refutation of this charge. I leave that to the people who sent us here, and the measure of whose glory has been filled by brilliant achievements which will yield in their renown to few, if any, of the great martial feats of our age. "We have had an ostentatious and asserted vigor," says the honorable Senator, "but we have had nothing else so far as the President is concerned."

An ostentatious and asserted vigor! Well, this is a strange world, and in my time I have seen and heard many strange things in it; but I have heard few stranger things than this. The act recognizing war was passed on the 13th day of May, 1846, twenty months ago. At that time we had an army whose total of rank and file, consisted of 7,523 men. They occupied thirty-seven forts and positions in the interior of the United States, and upon our inland and seaboard frontier, comprehending a space almost equal to half Europe. And the portion of this force under General Taylor upon the Nueces amounted to 3,001 men. This was our preparation for meeting the war. All else had to be collected or created. Recollect, sir, that our situation is far different from that of the martial powers of Europe. War is there both a trade and a science, and its governments are always prepared to meet contingencies which cannot, indeed, be forseen, but which, if not provided for, bring ruin and disaster in their train. At one time the people of France were a great army—the country a vast camp—the cities and towns, arsenals and magazines, and the fields sources of supply for the immense living machine, whose movements were always so tremendous and often so irresistible. Well, sir, we had nothing of all this. We had no army, for our little force scarcely deserved the name. We had no conscription by which to increase it. And all the materiel necessary for the subsistence and transportation and operations of our troops, had to be collected through the country and conveyed to a distant scene of operations. This scene is 3,000 miles off, and little did the government or the country know of the condition of Mexico—of its fortresses or their state of preparation—of its armies or their state of efficiency or discipline—of the roads, the bridges, the means of transportation and subsistence, and the thousand other points essential to military operations, and which, in the various countries of Europe, are studied and known.

Now, sir, in the face of all these obstacles, what have we done? We have sent our troops to the shores of the Pacific, by routes across the continent and around Cape Horn; we have subdued Upper and Lower California and New Mexico; we have taken possession of the rich and populous districts upon the Rio Grande; we have carried the war into the heart of the republic, after attacking and reducing the renowned fortress which commands its principal maritime entrance, the capture of which alone was glory enough for France; we have taken its capital, dispersed its armies, made its government a fugitive, and reduced to subjection a large portion of its population; we have fought at least fourteen important actions, of which eight were pitched battles, and in every one there was a disparity of force against us, and in many an inequality which carries us back for similar examples of desperate struggles to the early ages of the world—to the combats of the Greeks and the Persians—which they resemble, rather than the conflicts which the severe truth of modern history judges and records. We have captured a score of great cities, some of them fortified and defended and capable of strong resistance. Time would fail me to tell all we have done, nor can it be necessary, for is it not already written in imperishable letters upon the records of history, and in burning and shining characters upon the heart of every American? Yet you have not done enough, says the honorable Senator from Maryland to the administration; you have not prosecuted the war with sufficient vigor. You have done too much, says the honorable Senator from South Carolina; you have prosecuted the war too vigorously; so much so, indeed, that the great danger we have now to apprehend is the annihilation of Mexican national independence, and the annexation of the whole Mexican territory; and the only remedy for the false position in which your untimely energy has placed us, is an abandonment of much you have gained, and a retreat behind a line, where you can curb your martial propensities and restrain your desire for aggrandizement. I shall not thrust myself into this controversy—it is in better hands than mine—but I must confess it appears to me that the Senator from South Carolina is much nearer the mark than the Senator from Maryland, and that our offence, if one there be, is an offence of commission and not of omission.

Now, if the Senator from Maryland thinks all this success is not glory enough for twenty-two short months, he must shut the pages of history, and go back to the fabulous ages, or open the volumes of imagination, and of a highly sublimated imagination, too, before he can find a series of operations worthy of the standard of military glory, which he seems to have prepared for himself. The labors of Hercules shrink into insignificance when compared with his model.

And now for the future. What are we to do? We are to do just what other nations always have done and always will do in circumstances similar to our own. We have to prosecute the war vigorously, efficiently, promptly, till the Mexican people are satisfied of their inability to resist us, and are disposed to make a reasonable peace. There is a point, sir, in military operations, and we must reach that point if necessary, where pertinacious obstinacy will be overcome, and where, as I have already said, submission is cheaper than resistance. I think I heard it said, sir, upon this floor, that we had got the victim down, and he was exhausted and powerless, and that we were preparing to plunge a bowie-knife into his heart. This language is in bad taste, sir, and the allusion, it seems to me, wholly unfounded. We have got no prostrate victim, and are preparing for no assassination. We are fighting the Mexicans and they are fighting us, or at any rate claim to be fighting us, and refuse all the offers we make to treat with them. They compel us either to close the war dishonorably, or to prosecute it inexorably. It is objected here and elsewhere, as a practical difficulty, that there is no government to negotiate. But this is not so, sir; the difficulty lies beyond the government. There are acknowledged rulers with authority enough to treat, were they disposed to do so, as the recent result has shown. And why have they not been so before? Because the public, so far as there is one, is adverse to the measure. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, with his knowledge of the Mexican character, has made known to us one characteristic trait which explains the infatuation that prevails in that country; and that is, an overweening vanity —a settled conviction of their superiority to us—and a proneness to attribute their reverses to any thing rather than their own imbecility. So much for the causes. The information we have of society may well study the doctrine of chances and looking to the divisions, which prevail in our councils, and to the opposition which the legislative measures of the war encounter, may flatter themselves that our exertions will become relaxed and the Executive unable to prosecute any further operations.

The remedy for all this is a palpable one; it is founded in human nature:—increase your force—extend your operations—overrun district after district—establish yourself in city after city—shake the Mexicans from their lethargy of false hope, and let them feel that they have no recourse but to do us justice. And add to all this, union in our councils at home, which, after all, is the first element of prompt success. Postpone our internal difficulties till our external ones are adjusted. One unanimous vote in each of these two halls, evincing a determination to prosecute the war with all our strength would be better than an army with lancers. It would be a moral force that would proclaim our power and conquer the peace we so much desire. My life for it, if we do this, we shall succeed in three months; we shall find a government ready enough to ratify the treaty or to make another, and a nation ready enough to observe its stipulations. Mexicans are like all other people, and, as I remarked a few days since, they must sow and reap, and be clothed and preserve the institutions of society and the cherished relations of social life. They do not all mean to be killed, nor voluntarily to abandon every thing that makes life desirable. Let us go on, then, and time and perseverance, we may hope, will bring with them their just reward.

And now for the objects of the war. This subject has occupied much of the attention of the Senate; "indemnity and security" have been bandied about as though they were mysterious words, employed to conceal some great project, or magical words intended to obtain some great end darkly shadowed forth. A kind of "open Sesame," enabling political necromancers to conceal their work of iniquity and deception. I am not going over this ground again, sir. I have only to say, that there is a single word which fully expresses my views upon this subject, and that word is acquisition. The object of the war is an honorable peace, and that peace can best be obtained by an adequate compensation for the injuries done us by Mexico, and that compensation must be made in territory, as it can be made in nothing else. There is one consideration, Mr. President, in all this question of territorial compensation which has great weight with me. While I trust we shall act as fairly by Mexico as her own conduct will permit, I do not conceal from myself that my reluctance to annex portions of that country to ours is much less than it would be, were I not convinced that the permanent happiness of the people would be promoted by the measure. I believe it the happiest fate that could befall them; and I believe that this war, injurious in many respects, as it may have been and must have been, is destined to work a great good for the Mexican people. I believe it will meliorate their condition, civil, religious, social, and political. I believe that the contact with our citizens will bring many advantages permanently beneficial. The country will be laid open to the world, and the intellectual lessons of Europe and America will elevate a depressed population, and bring them to a knowledge of their rights and of the means of enforcing them.

Man cannot fathom the designs of Providence; but experience teaches us that great political changes are among the means employed in the moral government of the world, and that they often come to renovate decrepid nations and to give new vigor to the human faculties. The existing race in Mexico has proved itself ignorant, feeble, and, if not retrograding, stationary. Another career may be opened to them—the abuses of generations may be swept away, and the route of our armies may become avenues of communication, by which light and knowledge may spread over Mexico, and the past remembered only to make the blessing of the change more evident and acceptable. I repeat, sir, that the claim we set up is for compensation for injury and yet we are gravely reproached in the American Senate, in this middle of the nineteenth century, with the adoption of barbarous principles, as well as barbarous usages, because, in a state of war, when the appeal is to arms and when the decision rests on strength and not on reason, we measure our own demands by our own sense of justice; and claim what we think right, and intend to take what we claim. And an honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] seems to have made it a particular cause of grievance, as he considers it a most extraordinary measure in diplomacy, that we should have defined the line we mean to establish, and have said to the enemy, make that the line of your cession or continue the war. Why, Mr. President, did that honorable Senator never hear of an ultimatum in national intercommunication? What is more common—indeed, what is more proper—if a nation has once determined upon its course, than to say to its adversary, there is our lowest offer;—accept it or do better? The history of the world is full of these examples, and I must confess it was with no little astonishment, that I heard the honorable Senator add this to his catalogue of reproaches against the administration. He told us there were some of us ready to vote for any thing. As I have voted and intend to vote for all the necessary war measures, I suppose I must consider myself in this category of every thing and any thing members.

Mr. BUTLER.—Certainly not! I only remarked that I was inclined to think that any thing coming with an Executive recommendation would be swallowed whole; and, indeed, I confess that I think so yet!

Mr. CASS.—We all know the courtesy of the hon. Senator, and I will not believe he intended all the words import, and, therefore, I shall not make a retort which readily presents itself. But I will say it requires very little stretch of patriotism to defend the government for making a manly and frank proposal, and for avowing its determination to stand by it to the last. And what other rule, sir, is there or can there be for the conduct of nations, than the rule of the strongest, where all pacific means of procuring justice have been tried and found wanting? They have no common umpire, and when they commence the cause to be judged by force, they do so with a full knowledge of the consequences. Security and indemnity, if victorious—cessions and concessions, if vanquished; and all this, harsh as it may appear, has much good sense in its favor, as, indeed, has almost every general rule, which the experience of the world has adopted. Man is naturally as pugnacious as his cotenants of the earth, whether walking on two legs or on four. He is kept in restraint by the institutions of society and by the salutary operations of law. But nations are independent; they acknowledge no superior, and much that restrains them—not all, indeed—for the opinion of the world is something and moral principle something more; but the greatest restraint which keeps them from perpetual collisions, is the certain injury and the uncertain issue of war. The race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong. So says the book of inspiration. Numbers do not insure victory nor power command success. So says the book of human experience. And this uncertainty is a salutary check upon the ever active promptings of ambition. But divest war of its legitimate consequences, which have belonged to it from the earliest periods of history, establish the principle which this new kind of sickly magnanimity seeks to lay down, that there is to be neither security nor indemnity, or that the conquered, and not the conquering power, is to be the judge of both, and where are we? Where would be the peace of the world, or where the discharge of national obligations, if there were no penalty for injustice; and none of the motives to do right which spring from the fear of the consequences of doing wrong?

An honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN,] informs us, that Mexico has no money to indemnify us, and that she cannot cede any portion of her territory for that object, because her own constitution prohibits it. Well, sir, I suppose she may then set the world at defiance, and become the Ishmaelite of nations; with, however, a better fate that Ishmael of old; for his hand was against every man, and every man's hand against him, while Mexico might be the aggressor, without being exposed to any retribution. Sir, when a people deprive themselves of the power to redress an injury, they should be very careful not to commit one. No nation can entrench itself behind its paper barriers, and say to the world, do what I may, I am not responsible; for I have declared the inviolability of my territory. An easy kind of shelter this for aggression and injustice! And a new principle to me in the law of nations, this security, not for, but against, indemnity. I do not know where it is to be found, but it must be very new or very old; antiquated or unacknowledged. No, sir, there is no such principle; there can be no such principle. Nations like individuals are responsible for their acts, and must pay the penalty for their injustice. This matter lies within a narrow compass. If a nation interdicts to its government the authority to alienate any portion of its territory, it must take care in its disputes with other countries, that it has right or power, and especially the latter, on its side. If conquered, its internal regulations will not protect it from the legitimate consequences of defeat. If it will neither cede nor pay, it must remain at the mercy of its enemy.

Mr. CLAYTON.—In a foreign war with another nation, should the demand be made by that nation, that the only terms in which peace would be secured by us, would be the cession of the State of Michigan, does the war gentleman believe that the federal government of this Union would have the right to make the cession?

Mr. CASS.—I have not the slightest difficulty in answering the question of the honorable Senator. There is no power in this government to cede away one foot of the United States. But, sir, there are considerations, which will ride over written constitutions, and among these are the events of war. Now, I am not going to enter into a discussion with any man respecting the course this country will adopt, should it be prostrated at the feet of a conqueror. I am not going to suppose any such case. I believe it one of the last dangers that awaits us. But, if in the Providence of God it should come, I leave it to our children in the fiftieth or the hundreth generation to adjust it as they must, if they cannot adjust it as they would.

Undoubtedly, sir, a conquering nation in judging for itself, judges under a great weight of responsibility. It is the natural result of its position. That now is our situation, and I trust, that in the measure we mete out to ourselves, we shall commit no such crying injustice, as may provoke the censure of the world, or draw upon us the retributions of Providence.

I repeat, sir, that we must take the affairs of this world as they are, and not as we would have them to be; and I am afraid, that public wars will long continue to be the tribunal for the adjustment of public disputes; probably until the advent of that period which we know will come, because He has said it, who will make it come; but which seems yet far remote, when the quarrels of nations, as well as of individuals will cease, and the contests of life give way to universal benevolence.

But the honorable Senator from Delaware visits with peculiar reprobation every proposition to acquire indemnity from Mexico. He says, "I desire to say for one, that I never have been, and I am not now, willing to acquire an acre of ground from Mexico, or any other nation under Heaven, by conquest or robbery." He says, "that honesty is the best policy, and that an honorable reputation to a country is of more value than land or money." "I hold," says the honorable Senator, "that any attempt on our part, merely because we happen to possess superior strength, to compel a weaker nation to cede us all that we choose to demand as impemnity, whilst we at the same time admit that we ask for more than she owes us, is nothing else but robbery."

Mr. President, I hold to no such doctrine. The world holds to no such doctrine; and never has and never will, till the governments of man shall have fulfilled their task, or the nature of man shall have entirely changed. Robbery indeed! It seems to me, sir, I say it with all deference, it would be an utter perversion of terms to designate an acquisition by conquest for indemnity, as a robbery. An honorable Senator from Vermont has designated it by other epithets. He calls it piracy and plunder. If this war is just, as I for one believe it to be, what was our just claim at its commencement, is far from being a sufficient claim now. Our balance has greatly augmented. The most rigid casuist cannot deny that we are fairly entitled to a just compensation for the losses and expenses which we have encountered from the obstinate injustice of the Mexican government; and as I have already shown, of the extent of this compensation, we must of necessity be the judges. Robbery indeed! Pirates and plunderers indeed! Why all the acquisitions since men were united in civil society, made by one nation from another, in this new ethical nomenclature, become robberies. Pirates, and plunderers! The Assyrian was a robber, and so was the Egyptian and the Grecian; and the Roman in the ancient world; and in the modern, robbers are as plenty as nations. For England and France and Russia and Prussia and Austria, and every people under Heaven, have alternately lost and gained territorial acquisition by war and conquest; and have thus exposed themselves to the harsh epithet which the honorable Senator from Delaware would apply to his own country, if she claims the right to act agreeably to the laws of nations. I am well aware that questions of ethics are not to be decided by mathematical rules; nor is there any arithmetic of morals which can make one right out of twenty wrongs. But the usage of nations makes the law of nations, and the practice of all time shows, that conquest gives rights, as permanent and unquestionable, as rights derived from any conventional arrangements, public or private.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from Delaware, in further illustration of his proposition, has resorted to an analogy, which seems to me utterly to fail him in its application to the subject before us. Analogies are always rather dangerous weapons in argumentative discussions, and I have seldom seen one, which seems to me more so, than the very case presented to prove that we are robbers.—"If a man owes me a sum of money," says the honorable Senator from Delaware, "and I meet him on the highway, and insist, with a pistol pointed to his breast, that he shall deliver to me a deed of his farm, at the estimate which I choose to put upon it, I think there could not be much difference of opinion as to the nature of that transaction, I should like to know how my friend from Maryland, who is an able lawyer, would defend the man guilty of such conduct. Would it be any palliation or excuse or justification of the conduct of an offender, in such a case, that some money was due to him? Could there be found in christendom a court and jury that would hesitate as to the verdict in such a case? And what, let me ask, as a friend near me, (Mr. WEBSTER,) suggests, what would be the value of a deed obtained under such circumstances?"

Is it possible, Mr. President, that the two distinguished Senators from Delaware and Mssachusetts, I might almost say, the first among the first jurists in the land; can believe that this government is to be driven from its position and its purposes, and the American people from their determination to be indemnified by a false analogy like this! I use the word false in its logical, not in its ethical sense. Can it have escaped the penetration of those learned gentlemen, that the case they suppose is one, where both the parties are the subjects of municipal law, which extends equally, its protection and its penalties over all, who owe it allegiance? The robber is violating the law, and not only can gain nothing by his crime, but exposes himself to severe punishment. There is a common umpire between these men, to whom their disputes, if they have any, must be referred, and which has power to enforce its own arbitraments. But the contests of nations involves far different principles. Their very equality makes each the judge of its own rights, and the assertor of its own remedies. Do the honorable gentlemen mean to push their analogy so far as to contend, that all treaties made between stronger and weaker powers are void, for the very reason that victory has declared for the one, and that the other must submit? If this new principle is to be interpolated into the law of nations, what would become of half the treaties in the world! and all the territorial changes they have made and confirmed! The subject appears to me so plain, as to defy illustration; and I leave it with the simple remark, that we have duties to ourselves, as well as to Mexico, and that if we do to her as other natioes have always done under similar circumstances, we shall do all, that the most jealous advocate of his country's honor can demand.

Mr. President, we are furnished with two other dissuasive reasons against the acquisition of Mexican territory. One, relates to the present and the future, and the other to the past. The former addressing itself to our fears, belongs to what may be called the school of national apprehension, and the latter, addressing itself to our sense of shame, may be called the school of national humiliation. I shall trouble the Senate with a few remarks upon each.

We are warned of the dangerous consequences of increasing our territorial extent. I heard all this, nearly half a century ago, when Louisiana was acquired. The fears, now, cannot be stronger, nor stronger expressed than they were then. They were again spread before us when Florida was purchased. And still again, when Texas was annexed. We have lived them down, sir, and I suppose there are few men, within the limits of the republic, who would now desire the excision of either of those acquisitions, certainly not of the two former. Let us judge the future by the past, the only safe rule of judgment. Our government has a wonderful power of accommodating itself to the extension of the country. Its double formation, if I may so speak, of external and internal sovereignties, enables it to spread without weakness, and to preserve its power of cohesion with its process of enlargement. And the progress in the physical sciences, comes in aid of our own political progress. The means of communication are every day augmenting, and even now, we are practically less remote from each other as a people, than we were in 1789.

I lived upon the Ohio, Mr. President, at the period of the acquisition of Louisiana, and watched, as did the whole western population, the progress of that great measure. Recollecting the objections made to it, as well in Congress as in the country, and hearing those which had been urged here to the proposed acquisition I was struck with their similarity, I might almost say their identity, and turned to the debates of that period to fortify my impressions. The result I will give you in a very brief extract:

Mr. Griffin said "Heaid, however, how those consequences, he feared the effect of a vast extent of our empire: he feared the effects of the increased value of labor, the decrease in the value of lands &c. He owned, though thousand waddowing with milk and honey, that the Eden of the new world would prove as watery for the bosoms of our citizens."

Mr. Tinthelier said "This acquisition of distant territory will involve the necessity of a considerable standing army, an unpleasant object to me."

Mr. Greenleaf said "The vast and unmanageable extent which the possession of Louisiana will give to the United States—the consequent dispersion of our population, and the destruction of that balance, which it is so important to maintain between the eastern and the western States, threatens at no very distant day the subdivision of our Union."

Mr. White said: "I believe it will be the greatest curse that could at present befall us, &c. * * * We have already territory enough, and when I contemplate the evils that may arise to these States from this intended incorporation of Louisiana into the Union, I would rather see it given to France, to Spain, or to any other nation of the earth upon the mere condition that no citizen of the United States should ever settle within its limits, than to see the territory sold for an hundred millions of dollars and we retain the sovereignty."

Mr. Tracy called "it a pernicious measure—the admission of Louisiana, of a world and such a world into our Union. This would be aborbing the no born States, and render them as insignificant in the Union, as they ought to be, if, by their own consent, the measure should be adopted."

Now, sir, two of the speakers in this debate were predecessors of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN,] who has felt and expressed such alarm at the proposed extension of our territorial limits. That Senator says he would rather give millions to get rid of the territory than to pay a dollar for its acquisition. Mr. White, of Delaware, fixed his price for getting rid of Louisiana at one hundred millions of dollars. Mr. Tracy, an able and eloquent statesman, predicted that the acquisition of Louisiana would "absorb the northern States and render them insignificant in the Union." The Senator from Connecticut strikes the same key-note and sounds a similar alarm: Now, sir, all this apprehension is without the slightest foundation. The just influence of Connecticut, or all the New England States indeed, will never be reduced by the progress of our country. I do not speak of the influence of numbers, but I speak of that moral power which intelligence, and morality, and patriotism always give to every community. Who in this broad land does not look back to the history of New England, and associate the glory of his country with the glorious deeds which passed there, and which laid the foundations of our freedom and prosperity. Go where you will, sir, from the lakes to the ocean, from the St. Johns to the Rio Grande, and everywhere you find emigrants from New England, carrying with them the fruits of its intelligence, and spreading its influence wherever they go. Why, sir, there are five Senators natives of New Hampshire, now members of this body, and as one, and the least worthy among them; I am proud to acknowledge, here, in this high place, that much of the success, undeserved on my part, which has attended me through life, I owe to the early lessons of wisdom and virtue, which were taught me, in my native state, and which, if I have too often neglected, I have never forgotten. There may be climates less rugged, and hills less sterile; but no population ever occupied a country sounder in head or heart, or more richly endowed with those principles, which give energy to man, and dignity to human nature. The influence of qualities like these, will be felt and acknowledged throughout our confederacy; whether those, who bless it and pray for it, utter their blessings and their prayers upon the coast of New England, or the shores of the Pacific.

We are also told, as a dissuasive against the prosecution of this war, that we can raise no more men, nor money, and that our exertions must expire, from the very institude of our patriotism. Our fathers had these difficulties to contend with, in the war of the Revolution, magnified, indeed, a thousand fold, by the circumstances and the nature of the contest, and yet they fought on, till they obtained peace for,themselves, and freedom for us, and founded upon a rock, the rock, I hope of ages, this magnificent republican empire. We heard all this, also, in 1812, and yet in the face of it, we conducted that war to a glorious termination. We heard it all again at the commencement of this very war, and the time has already past, according to the prediction of a statesman now present, of the highest character, supported almost by mathematical calculations, when we were to have neither men nor money, and when our cause was to fail from the failure of all the means necessary to support it. Now, sir, nothing can be worse than to stop without attaining our object. If we can not raise men, and cannot raise money, why then we must stop. But thank God, we have not got to that point yet, nor do I believe we ever shall get to it. Let us not halt in our course now, simply for the fear that we may be compelled to halt there some time or other. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Sufficient for the dishonor of this country, will be the time when she will practically exhibit her inability to maintain her rights and her honor.

Why, sir, what was said on the subject during the session of Congress, on the 25th and 26th of January 1847, one little year ago? Let us look back for a moment. The lesson may be a profitable one for us all, and certainly an encouraging one for those, who indulge in gloomy forebodings, and doubt the disposition or capacity of their country, to augment her exertions as her trials augment. I hold in my hand, extracts from the debates which then took place on the subject of the Loan. I will read a few passages, not mentioning, however, the names of the speakers, as it is not my object to recall any invidious recollections, but simply to show the sentiments which then prevailed, and how these have been rebuked by the result.

One speaker said:

"The crisis in which he [they] were placed was unprecedented. They had no adequate revenue, nor were they able, without any way of raising it. He [they] must or they must raise the men from necessity, but one they would do nothing else. Yet he [they] were willing to the utmost end of the extent. &c. * * * He predicted that would ensue much suspension of the currency of the whole country, but must not this occur sooner?"

In payment they were to arrange up wealth against the day of wrath; and that day of wrath had come, and when it came he feared they would not be able to stand."

"But it was evident," said another speaker, "that a loan could not be obtained."

"A good deal has been said," Mr. C. [we remember] "about the leverage of a popular tax; he would not, but the administration were responsible for the result. They had told them they could get it upon terms, to which they would willingly submit."

Mr. E. —No.

Mr. CASS. No, was the honorable gentleman?

Mr. E. Where do you find it?

Mr. CASS. In the terms of the call for it by the administration. They might feel to get it, but they had good reason to suppose, * * * He knew that during the progress of financial difficulties in England, it became necessary to combine every form with respect to pay. Why? Because that country was overloaded with taxes—in the midst of a large money [currency] must necessarily subsist a fixed standard, and with an established ratio of proportion. Hence it became necessary for them to resort to the mode referred to.

But did any man believe, that the faith of this nation was not sufficient to raise the twenty three millions of dollars? * * * They had paid off two debts, and they could pay off another!

A speaker also observed:

"As to Senator from Michigan told them much to pass the bill, and they would have all the money wanted. * * * * The gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WESCOTT,] also thought there was no sort of danger, but that the public credit could raise money enough."

So much for the prophesies of the last session of Congress. How they have been fulfilled has now passed into history, and yet we hear the same lugubrious note at the present session, and it was, I believe, the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] who proved most clearly our financial imbecility, and his views were adopted by other Senators. And we have heard elsewhere, and from a high quarter too, that a "tax "would wind up this miserable Mexican war in ninety days." Hinc ille lach rymæ! Tears for taxes, but none for wounded honor! I trust I shall never live to see the day, when the American people will prosecute an unjust war, because they do not feel its burdens, or abandon a just one, because they feel or fear its financial pressure.

But I see by an article in the London Times, of January 4th, that these cis-atlantic forebodings are not the only ones. Our neighbors over the water record and regret the appearances which seem to them to indicate an approaching exhausted treasury and its consequences, on our future exertions. That article warns us, as we are warned here, of the danger of a public debt, and of the taxes to which it must lead. And I observe that a late Morning Chronicle adopts a similar standard for our patriotic sacrifices. It thinks that our losses and the derangement of the financial operations of the country will prove too much for "Jonathan's patience;" and that a proposal to increase to a considerable extent, the amount we pay in taxes will soon cure us of our warlike mania.

But I mistake the feelings of my countrymen, if such considerations will deter them from the prosecution of the war in which we are engaged. If taxes are necessary, they will bear them. Advancing as this country is with so rapid a pace in all the elements of power and prosperity, any debt it may contract in a necessary war can give no serious cause of apprehension. I repeat the sentiment I expressed last session, that I do not believe one word in the European financial axiom, that new debts must be secured by new taxes. Our experience has disproved it. Where nations are stationary, and already weighed down with fiscal impositions, such a principle may be necessary to the sepport of their credit. But in the career opened to us, where our resources are augmenting in a geometrical ratio, the credit of the country will be found sufficient, and its increasing resources will go far towards the discharge of all its engagements. As to a debt like that of England, the thing is impossible here. It is one of the last dangers which threatens us. A people who govern themselves, and tax themselves, will never sanction a system of extravagant and unnecessary expeditures. A system which, in England, as a writer in the Edinburgh Review observed, very wittily and very truly, some years since, commences at the cradle, and going on through all the gradations of society, still taxing as life advances, finally taxes the tombstone, and then dismisses him who sleeps under it, to be taxed no more. Such are the blessings of a government separated from the people, and without proper sympathy for their condition, or responsibility for their own principles.

The other dissuasive reason against the annexation of territory, to which I have adverted, founded on our own conduct towards other nations, against whom we had causes of complaint, amounting to causes of war, if we had chosen to consider them such, was presented by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE.] This appeal to the fruits of our own pusillanimity has been made before, but has never, I think been so directly prosecuted as by that gentleman in his remarks upon the general subject the other day. And this brings me back to his proposition which I have already considered, that we have no just cause of war against Mexico. In its defence, in addition to the general principle, that the right and the "sort of necessity" should both exist, he added by way, I suppose, of illustration, that:

"The President had paraded before us an exaggerated statement of these claims."

And he proceeds among other things to ask:

"If the avoidance or neglect to pay on the part of Mexico is even comparable to that which we have experienced at the hand of stronger nations: and I ask, if it betomes us to adopt one rule of measure of justice in regard to a weak nation, and another rule of rights in regard to a strong and haughty people?"

I answer no; emphatically no. We have but one rule of right or justice for all nations, and that is that they fulfil those duties towards us which we have a right to ask, and which we, in our turn, must render. And this is our rule, as well with England or France and Mexico, as with San Marino or Monaco, or the great empire which embraces a large portion of Europe and stretches through Asia to the Frozen Ocean and the Eastern Sea. The honorable gentleman confounds the right with the remedy. The one is independent of circumstances, and the other depends upon ourselves. Why, his own illustration clearly exhibits this difference. He says we had causes enough of war against France and England, and his reproach is that these were not followed by war against the former power, "a great and mighty people." He says, "and yet we talk of violated honor:" "and the President rants about our claims against Mexico." I beg to assure the Senate that that language is the language of the honorable Senator and not mine. I shall never talk about the ranting of the chief magistrate when he spreads our public grievances before the representatives of the people, and thus before the people and the world; nor shall I ever taunt my country by intimating that her course has been so pusillanimous that for her to talk of violated honor is a solemn farce. But were all this so, it is quite time that our policy were changed. We are well chastised for the want of self-respect we have exhibited if we have lost our honor; and if we do not stop in this career of humiliation, the proclivity will become steeper and steeper and our descent more and more rapid, till we shall have neither rights to assert, nor honor to defend, nor disposition to do either.

This catalogue raisonnee of our acts of humiliation I have heard before; but never, I think, with such strong terms of reprobation. Our submission to the insults of the Neapolitan, the Dane, the Gaul, and the Anglo-Saxon is brought before us, as it were in staring capitals, and some of these are characterized as—

"Committed in the wantonness of power—in the very teeth of our rights—without the slightest restimation, and persisted in, repeated and boldly defended with a most offensive obstinacy, and yet submitted by the country through successive administrations from 1806 to 1831

I regret, sir, to hear all this; not for its own sake, for we have nothing to reproach ourselves with, but in connection with the subject before us. I regret to hear that too much forbearance—if too much there was, as the gentleman seems to intimate—is now made the pretext for more; that we must suffer from Mexico because we have suffered from others, and that we must go on thus interminably exposed to the attacks of the strong and the weak, and to the contempt of all.

But, sir, the people of this country have never been deficient in patriotism or national pride. During the period when these aggressions, to which the honorable gentleman alludes, were committed, the moral and political world was in commotion, the foundations of society in Europe were uprooted, and a mighty revolution was sweeping over that region, which occasioned greater changes in the world than did the five preceding centuries. Tremendous military establishments were formed, and the rule of might became the rule of right. These injuries commenced under the administration of General Washington, and were continued through the administrations of Mr. Adams, and Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Madison, but their principal weight fell upon us during the presidency of Mr. Jefferson and a portion of that of Mr. Madison. And everlasting honor is due to those two eminent patriots and statesmen for the firm, prudent and dignified course they pursued under the trying and perilous circumstances in which they and their country were placed. History has set its seal upon their measures, and in all time hereafter their memory will be held in honor by a grateful people.

But, sir, we went to war with France in 1798, and with England in 1812, two of the mightiest powers on earth, and with immense military establishments at their disposal till then unknown in modern times. And it was the conviction in France that the firm character and decided course of General Jackson and the responsive feeling of the American people would lead to a war with that country, if justice was not done us, and not the interference of England, which produced the arrangement of 1830 and its execution, by which our chapter of complaints against France was closed, and I hope forever.

Here, sir, were two wars within fifteen years, and both prosecuted when we were comparatively feeble in numbers, in strength, and in wealth, and a third barely avoided by the satisfaction of our claims. Now, sir, I deny that we are justly liable to the reproach of pusillanimity, or that we have forfeited our claim to talk of violated honor. Or, that Mexico, or any one for Mexico, in this country or elsewhere, has a right to say, you had established your character for tame submission, and you have therefore no right to ask indemnity of me for wrongs such as you have suffered from others, and which your own forbearance in former years induced me to refuse.

There are two incidents, episodes I may call them, in the great action going on, which, though they neither give direction to its movements, nor certainty to its termination, are yet worthy of remark, as they exhibit, if not the faults of the administration, at any rate, the facility with which their measures are assailed. One of these charges I have never heard. I confess it with becoming gravity; the other is new, or at any rate new to me, and has been presented by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] with his accustomed ability, which sometimes makes "the wrong appear the better reason." I shall content myself with touching rather than considering them.

One great grievance alledged by the Mexican government, and repeated here, and one for which our minister was rudely driven from the republic, is, that we sent her a Plenipotentiary and not a Commissioner to effect an amicable arrangement of the difficulties between the two countries. Really, sir, in the whole history of national intercommunication, no such frivolous reason as this was ever given for involving two countries in war, that a higher grade of diplomatic agent was sent by one power than the other demanded. The reverse may have happened when the most idle questions were grave subjects of investigation and remonstrance. Mexico must have had few substantial causes of complaint, and the opponents of the administration few just grounds of animadversion, when such a measure assumes an important position in their respective lists of grievances. But how stands the fact? Anxious to restore the diplomatic relations between the two countries, which had been interrupted by the Mexican government, the President directed that our consul, [Mr. BLACK,] should communicate this desire to the Mexican authorities, and say to them, that if they "Would receive an envoy from the United States to adjust all the questions in dispute between the two countries, he will immediately despatch one to Mexico."

To this proposition the Mexican Secretary of State answered:

"My government is disposed to receive the Commissioner of the United States, who may come to this capital with full powers from his government to settle the present dispute in a peaceful, reasonable and honorable manner."

Here is the acceptance of the proposition, and the agreement to receive the commissioner whom the government of the United States proposed to send, under the title of envoy "to settle the present dispute." Well, the envoy was sent, commissioned for this very purpose, and when he arrived he was refused recognition because he came as an envoy, and because his powers extended to the adjustment of the whole dispute between the two countries and were not confined to "questions relative to Texas." As to the mere title, it does not merit a moment's serious consideration. It was an afterthought, a subterfuge, resorted to in order to justify what the Mexican government was determined to do, but what it was easier to do than to defend. It is evident that our proposition was accepted as made, and that envoy and commissioner were but convertable terms. This is shown by the letter of the Mexican Secretary of State to Mr. Slidell, in which he says:

"That the single word "resolve" is by no means sufficient, to give to Mr Slidell the special character of commissioner or plenipotentiary ad hoc."

But Mr. Slidell had too much power! Or in other words, he was charged to settle the whole controversy between the two countries, and not the Mexican portion of it alone. And was not this arrangement in the very terms of the proposition and its acceptance? We desire to send you an envoy, says Mr. Buchanan, to adjust all the questions in dispute between the two governments. We will receive your commissioner, answers Mr. Pena y Pena, charged "to settle the present dispute" between your country and ours. Well, what was this dispute? It had two sides to it like most other disputes, public and private. We complained that Mexico had injured our citizens, and she complained that we had annexed Texas. And the dispute was made up of these causes of complaint. Could the Mexican government be so besotted as to suppose that the United States would adjust her side of the quarrel and leave their own unadjusted? That we should be willing to do something, I know not what, by which Mexico would agree to the annexation or we abandon it, and thus satisfy her cause of complaint, and then turn round and enter upon another negotiation of twenty-five years to satisfy our own? If our administration had acted thus they would have met and merited universal reprobation. And now the great cause of grievance with our adversary is, that though we were willing to do her justice, yet we required at the same time that justice should be done to us.

And one of our most eminent living statesmen, a connecting ling between the present and the past generation, has not only endeavored to place Mexico right, and his adopted country wrong upon this as well as upon other questions at issue with her, but has elaborately discussed it, and given to his sentiments, which have been widely disseminated by party zeal and the public press the authority of his name.

In his remarks upon this subject, as Mr. Gallatin commences with an error, it is not surprising that he ends with one. He says "the Mexican government insisted that it only agreed to receive a commissioner to treat on the questions that had arisen from the events in Texas," &c. This assumption of the Mexican Secretary of State, which Mr. Gallatin endorses, as he must endorse it in order to place his own government in the wrong for which he seems to have powerful, if not patriotic propensities, is contradicted by Mr. Pena y Pena's letter to Mr. Black, in which he says expressly that the commissioner of the United States coming "to settle the present dispute" will be received by the Mexican government. In the whole letter, which pledged the Mexican faith to the reception of the minister, there was no allusion direct or indirect to "the questions which had arisen from the events in Texas." So much for the substance of the charge.

Mr. Gallatin discusses the question of etiquette, as this finally descends to be, with more zeal and unction, than would have been expected from a colaborer with Jefferson and Madison in the republican vineyard. He says that treaties of peace are always negotiated by commissioners, appointed for that special purpose. If this were so, it would not touch the present case, for Mexico had then neither declared war, nor committed any act, necessarily leading to it. But it is not so, and Mr. Gallatin ought to have known it. He ought to have known, that he was appointed an envoy-extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary with four other eminent citizens in 1814, to negotiate a treaty of peace with England. They are thus designated in the treaty itself; and I have actually seen the record of their commission in the Department of State. He ought to have known, that the very treaty that of peace between France and Great Britain in 1783, which he cites and asserts was negotiated by commissioners, was in fact negotiated by the Duke of Manchester as "ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary," &c.; and that the preliminary treaty between the same powers was negotiated in 1762, by the Duke of Bedford, "minister plenipotentiary," and that in the full powers from our Congress, dated June 15, 1781, the persons appointed to negotiate a treaty of peace with England, are styled "ministers plenipotentiaries," &c.; and he ought to have known, that modern history is filled with similar examples.

But, sir, while the government has been assailed at home upon this point of diplomatic etiquette it has been redeemed abroad from all blame by the publication of the letter of General Herrera, written on the 25th of August last, in answer to an application from Santa Anna inviting him to act as a commissioner to treat for peace with the United States. "For no other act than showing, that there would be no obstacle to his, (Mr. Slidell's,) presenting himself, and having his propositions heard, my administration was calumniated in the most atrocious manner—for this act alone, the revolution, which displaced me from the command was set on foot." I need add nothing to this declaration of the Ex-President of Mexico. I leave the question between Mr. Gallatin and General Herrera.

The other objection which I have classed as an episode is, that of the two alternative propositions, which the President was authorized to offer to Texas, he chose the one, which committed the United States to admit her into the Union without any specific provision, that her boundaries should be established, subject to the control of the general government.

In the first place, sir, the present administration was not then in power, and is not responsible for the choice of the mode of procedure. The offer was made by Mr. Tyler before the expiration of his term of service.

In the second place, the power of decision was purely discretionary, and if the President was wrong in selecting that alternative, Congress was wrong in giving him the power to do so.

In the third place, a reasonable discretion must necessarily exist in Congress on this subject, and if that body is clearly satisfied, that Texas claims more than she has any right to claim. I see nothing in the act of annexation, which would compel the government to involve the country in an unjust war to defend an unjust claim.

In the fourth place, the honorable Senator must know, that by no other mode could the annexation of Texas have been consummated, as there was no probability, I may almost add possibility, that any treaty for that purpose would be ratified by the Senate. A constitutional majority of two-thirds could not have been obtained. The law itself passed this body, but by a bare majority of one It was annexation under the law, and without the concurrence of the treaty-making power of the Senate, or it was not annexation at all.

Mr. President, a few remarks upon another topic, and I will cease to trespass upon the indulgence of the Senate.

It has been said in England, and in the United States, and perhaps in Mexico, though not so bitterly I think, that our armies in that country have committed terrible cruelties, unworthy of us, and of the age, and which should call upon us the condemnation of the world. And the great journal of England, the proclaimer of English moderation and philanthropy, has said that—

"The cruelties perpetrated by Hernando Cortez, on his first expedition to Mexico have been surpassed in barbarity and heartlessness by the Lower communities of the model Republic. If description can be symbolized by a sound, American republicanism may be represented by the gallows and both the same agent of historic heraldry, which would indicate French republicanism by a guillotine."

I wish I could give the date of this article, for I should like to fix its exact chronology; but I cannot, as I cut it out of one of the American papers, and have since lost the reference.

Mr. President, I listened with equal pleasure and interest, a few days since, to the remarks of the Senator from New York, (Mr. Dix.) To his statesmanlike views, expressed with equal clearness of thought and felicity of language. But there was nothing which better become his position or ours, than his exposition of the principles of the British government, when contrasted with its professions—its eternal process of aggrandizement, and its eternal claim to moderation. And I was the more struck with his illustration of the subject, because it corresponded with some observations I had the honor to submit to the Senate, on the same subject at the last session of Congress. I was then met by the Roman war cry from the honorable Senator, [Mr. WEBSTER,] Delenda est Carthago, as though the mere reference to historical facts, announced a spirit of vengeance, unbecoming us and our country. Mr. President, there is nothing to be gained by soft words, on such occasions as these. They may turn away private wrath, but they never yet turned away public envy and jealousy. Let us look our accusers and their accusations full in the face. "I thank God," said the Athenian of old, "that I am not as other men are." We thank God, says the public opinion of England, that we are not like other nations, and least of all, like that great grasping mobocracy of the western hemisphere, which is seizing and annexing the territory of its neighbors! And this is said with as much stern gravity, as though the coast of England bounded her possessions, and as though there were a rock, or islet, or island, or continent, she did not covet, and coveting did not seek, and seeking, did not strive to obtain, with a strong hand, if she thought her hands strong enough to obtain it. In the whole history of national reproofs, and national professions, there is nothing like this—that England should cast the first stone against other nations, for a spirit of conquest and aggrandizement!

That great paper, the Times, great in its circulation and in its influence, is the existing exponent of English sentiment. It does not make, but ministers to public opinion. It does not guide, but indicates it. It caters for the national appetite, but its dishes are prepared for the public taste, and not the taste for the dishes. Every calumny upon us, every slur upon our morals, and sneer at our manners finds open ears to admit them, and willing hearts to receive them. For myself, sir, I am tired of all this, and I think Mr. Walsh some years ago, rendered an acceptable service to the cause of truth and of his country, by the publication of his work upon this very subject, and I wish some patriotic American would bring it down to the present day, and exhibit in all its glaring contrast, the difference between English practice and English professions. I am tired also of the eternal cant about the Anglo Saxon race, as though that were the only stock, from which virtue and intelligence could spring. As though our own population were homogeneous, and descended from the English family alone; while we know it has levied contributions upon all the nations of the earth; upon France, and Holland, and Spain, and Germany, and Sweden and Norway, to a large amount, and upon Ireland, oppressed and downtrodden Ireland, to a much larger; and all those contributions soon become fused together, loosing their peculiar traits, and forming the American people, with a character of their own, and I think with pride enough to assert their identity, and to treat the Anglo-Saxon race, as they treat all other races, in questions of national comity, as friends or enemies, depending on the prevalent sentiments, with which they themselves are regarded.

Mr. HALE, (in his seat,) and Africa too?

Mr. CASS.—Let us go on with our own race! An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, said the Jewish law-giver. The rule is a harsh one, and I would not adopt it, even in repelling national calumnies. But with England, I would do better. I would let her own history condemn her, when she asserts her superiority over the other nations of the earth.

In the year 1756, a war broke out between the English, and the Nabob of Bengal. The English general, Clive, entered into a secret correspondence with the commander of the Nabob's forces. A rich Indian banker, named Omichund, was a principal agent in the arrangement of this affair, and he was to receive a large sum of money for his services. In conformity with the stipulations, the commander abandoned his master upon the field of battle, and was elevated by the English to the vacant throne. Omichund demanded more than Clive was willing to grant, but fearing that he might betray the secret, the English general determined to deceive him. And he did so. I quote from an English historian:

"Omichund's interests were to be protected by a special clause in the treaty. Two treaties were drawn up; one written on white paper, contained no reference to Omichund; another written upon red paper, contained all the stipulations of the white treaty, and in addition, an article in favor of Omichund, to deceive whom, was the only purpose for which it existed. But a new difficulty occurred. The select committee had no hesitation in signing both the treaties; but Admiral Watson refused his assent to the mock document, and the absence of his name, it was foreseen, would excite the suspicion of so wary a man as Omichund. Here, again, Clive had an expedient ready. It was to attach the Admiral's name by another hand, (or in other words to forge it.) The two treaties were accordingly rendered complete, and the fraud answered its purpose. Omichund kept the secret of the conspirators, Scoraj oo-Dowlah was dethroned, and Meer-Jaffier elevated to his place."

"The sequel of the tale is melancholy. * * * * * * * Omichund became agitated, and said "this cannot be the treaty; it was a red treaty I saw." Clive coolly replied, "yes, but this is a white one;" and turning to Scrafton, who spoke the native language more perfectly than himself, he said, "it is now time to undeceive Omichund." The process of undeceiving the miserable man was short and simple. In compliance with the suggestion of Clive, Scrafton said: "Omichund, the red treaty is a trick; you are to have nothing." And he needed not to say more. The senses of Omichund had fled; he fell back in a swoon, from which he recovered only to linger out the remnant of his life in a state of idiocy."

This was in fact the foundation of the great empire of England in Hisdostan. Many an English moralist has visited this process of acquisition, the only one perhaps of the kind in all history, with that indignant reprobation which costs nothing but well turned periods. From that time the English government has been that the sovereign of Bengal. But where is the Englishman, moralist, or statesman, writer or politician, who has ever proposed to surrender this territory, acquired by forgery, or to redeem the national character from the charge of participating in the crime, by rejecting the benefit it brought with it? So much for coats of arms. I commend this incident to the Herald's college. But to return to the charges of cruelty which have been made against our army in Mexico—to one I believe them, and have repeated them. We are not equally free from that reproach. But there have been many allusions, exaggerated ones it appears to me, to the terrible calamities which our war has inflicted upon the Mexican people, and which elsewhere might be quoted as corroborative proof of the alledged misconduct of our soldiers. I would not stop to quarrel with mere figures of rhetoric, nor would I apply any severe canons of criticism to extemporaneous debates like ours, where much is said in the heat of discussion that our better judgment does not approve, and said too in stronger language than we design to use.

In illustration of these remarks, I will read a short extract from a speech of an honorable Senator upon this floor, who in all the qualities of head and heart, that give worth and eminence in public or in private life, is inferior to none of his associates:

"We hear of an intention to strike outraged Mexico in yet more cruel parts—we shout assent to it. We call it mercy to mercy. Bring the Mexican beauty yet dewy from the bath of Palo Alto, to kneel to Rimac, Moloch and Brigand Con. Very Cruz is bombarded. Her churches fall under the deadful aim of the mortar—the blood of her women and children runs in streams through her before peaceful and happy streets—her almost every thoroughfare is obstructed by the mangled bodies of her slaughtered citizens, until at last, her valor can hold out no longer before the mighty and crushing power of our arms. She surrenders. Yet still, our vengeance is not glutted. Innocent, unoffending, outraged Mexico has yet more cruel to be laid waste and conquered. More beauty to be wrung from gallant hearts—more women and children to be slaughtered—more agony in every form to suffer. We have not yet had our fill of blood. We march on in bloodish progress. At Cerro Gordo, Chinguesa, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, our march of slaughter is renewed, and gore on gore with yet more fearful violence. Mexican blood waters every plain. The cries of Mexican agony startle every ear, and still the work goes on. We lay seige to the city of Mexico itself—bombard its peaceful dwellings—make her streets one with human blood, and slaughter again women and children, until resistance becomes unavailing. We get possession of the capital, and yet carry on the contest. Sir, can our country have come such depths? Is she so deeply steeped in crime? Has she no honor left? Are we christian and civilized men, or are we robbers and murderers? I hope she will pardon me the inquiry; and yet if the war was unjust, if it was not provoked, if it was our wicked and not theirs—if Mexico, every human heart, animated by a single human feeling, can but answer in the affirmative,

"But, no sir, no sir, it is not so. She is high minded, just and honorable. She is civilized, not savage. Her citizens are moral and christian. Those scenes are in the eye of God and man to be justified, because necessary to our honor, and forced upon us in vindication of our violated rights. Mexico is answerable for all these sad and sickening scenes. The war is just, because she commenced it. It does exist by her act, and, so help me God, but for her last conviction, as I sincerely trust and detest falsehood, I would never have voted for the act of the 13th May, '46.

"These scenes," says the honorable Senator, "are in the eyes of God and man to be justified, because necessary to our honor, and forced upon us in vindication of our violated rights."

Mr. President, we have a far better justification than belligerent necessity for our conduct in Mexico, and that is, that these scenes as described did not and could not occur there. The colors are too dark, and the picture not true to nature. And no one, sooner than the Senator himself, will be rejoiced at an opportunity of correcting any misapprehension to which the strength of his language may have exposed his meaning.

Now, sir, I put it to the honorable Senator and to the Senate, whether such vivid descriptions as this, are not calculated to do us injury in the eyes of the world? Whether they will not be transferred to the other hemisphere, and swell the catalogue of calumnies which intolerance, both political and social, is pouring out against our country? I have made a good deal of enquiry upon the subject, and I am perfectly satisfied, that the evils which the progress of our arms has inflicted upon Mexico are far less than ever before attended the operations of a hostile army. It would be folly to deny that war brings calamities enough under the most favorable circumstances, where even the discipline of an invading army is the strictest; the disposition of the commander and of the officers the best; and the measures to repress unnecessary violence the promptest and the most efficient. But I religiously believe that the injuries we have committed in Mexico, and I have taken some trouble to ascertain the truth, have been less, far less than ever followed in the train of any army that ever went forth to foreign war. I have run my eye over several pages of history, cursorily indeed, but carefully enough for my purpose, to ascertain what has been the conduct of other nations in similar circumstances, and how far they have carried their forbearance, either in the exciting operations of a campaign, or after victory had crowned their exertions. I have not omitted, in this search, a glance at the military history of England, whence the first stone is always thrown at us, and who, guiltless herself of ambition and oppression, is the self-constituted judge, I was about to say, but I correct myself by saying, the condemner of this country, past, present, and to come.

And now what says the record of human wars? I have collected, Mr. President, from the records of history, several instances of the extreme cruelties and sufferings which have attended warfare from the period described by the Jewish historian when they took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women and the little ones; of every city they left none to remain, down to the last cruel and brutal war which ravaged Europe. I shall content myself with a brief reference to some of them.

Louis the XIVth laid waste the Palatinate, and men, women and children were driven in a severe season out of their habitations to wander about the fields, and to perish of hunger and cold; while they beheld their houses reduced to ashes, their goods seized, and their possessions pillaged by the rapacious soldiery.

At the siege of Prague, by the philosophic Frederick, twelve thousand famished houseless wretches were driven out by the Austrians, but were compelled by the Prussians to return in order that an increasing famine might force their enemies to a more speedy surrender. More than one hundred thousand bombs and red-hot shot were thrown into the city, and upwards of nine hundred houses reduced to ashes.

In the invasion of Prussia by the Russians in 1765, they hung innocent inhabitants from the trees, tore out their hearts and their intestines, ripped open their bodies, cut off their noses and ears, broke their legs, fired villages and hamlets, formed a circle round the burning houses, and drove back their fleeing inmates into the flames.

An officer serving in the French army in 1757, says "the country is plundered and laid waste for thirty leagues around us, as if fire from Heaven had fallen upon it. Our soldiers plundered, murdered, and committed all sorts of abominations."

The history of the English sieges in Spain and Portugal, contain terrible narratives of human suffering. I will merely quote the remarks of Col. Napier, the historian of Wellington's campaigns, upon the capture of San Sebastian. "This storm," says he, "seemed to be the signal of hell for the perpetration of villainy which would have shamed the most ferocious barbarians of antiquity. At Cuidad Rodrigo, intoxication and plunder had been the principal object; at Badajoz, lust and murder were joined to rapine and drunkenness; but at San Sebastian, the direst, the most revolting cruelty was added to the catalogue of crimes. One atrocity, of which a girl of seventeen was the victim, staggers the mind by its enormous, incredible, indescribable barbarity."

So much for an English siege. Let another passage describe the progress of an English army. "On this occasion," says Col. Napier, that is on the first days' march of the English army from Madrid, "there was no want of provisions, no hardships to exasperate the men, and yet I, the author of this history, counted on the first day's march from Madrid seventeen bodies of murdered peasants."

Such is war in the old world. God forbid that horrors like these should accompany its progress in the new! No man who has the slightest knowledge of the American character can believe that such atrocities have ever been committed by our troops. Where are the burning cities behind us? The desert country before us abandoned at our approach? The devastation and oppression around us, marking at the same time our power and our cruelty? We can say it in a spirit of truth and not of national vanity, that such scenes have no place where our armies march. Though my convictions on this subject are as strong as convictions can well be, yet I have not hesitated to fortify them with all the information I could procure here. I have inquired of many gallant officers who have visited us what has been the conduct of our troops in Mexico, and I have received but one answer and that expressed in the strongest terms, that no men could have behaved better, under the circumstances in which they were placed. Such is the testimony of General Quitman, of General Shields, of General Pierce, of Colonel Harney, Colonel Garland, Colonel Morgan, and others. I name these names because they are known to the whole country, and those who bear them have also borne distinguished parts in our operations in Mexico, and have been in the best situation to ascertain the truth. They have authorized me thus publicly to appeal to their testimony, and I believe I understand from all of them that they were not aware of an instance of private assassination by an American soldier in Mexico. Offences against persons are almost unknown, and the Mexicans themselves find and acknowledge this foreign armed government better and more equal than their own, which it has replaced. Gen. Pierce informed me he did not believe that in the march from Vera Cruz to Puebla damages to the amount of five dollars were committed and left unpaid by his column of twenty-five hundred men. General Quitman was the military governor of Mexico, and well acquainted therefore with its internal police, and he says our soldiery is as regular there as in one of our own cities. General Shields in a note to me on this subject says:

"In reply to your enquiries, touching the general conduct of our troops in Mexico, I can briefly state, that in my opinion, our army has been more distinguished for magnanimity and humanity, than even for bravery. In Mexico the law has been freely acknowledged by all persons, both by foreign residents and natives. No other army, it is admitted, ever behaved so well under similar circumstances."

Colonel Garland says:

"It is scarcely possible that the army which marched from Vera Cruz and entered the city of Mexico in triumph could have been guilty of any outrage upon unoffending people without its coming to my knowledge. Every thing taken on the march, and in the various towns occupied by our troops was uniformly paid for or ordered. Many of the most respectable inhabitants have remarked to me that they felt greater security, both for their persons and property, whilst their town were occupied by American troops than they had formerly enjoyed for a quarter of a century."

Colonel Morgan in a note also says:

"The conduct of our troops in the field having become a subject of misapprehension, I respectfully place at your disposal a few facts which fully refute the charges of the enemies of our country, whether made at home or abroad:

"Our people have greater cause to be proud of the magnanimity of the American commanders and their troops after victory, than of their valor during the battle. In no country can we be held to execute American soldiers in the act of laying down beside his wounded enemy and give him water from his canteen and share the last morsel of his biscuit with his prostrate foe.

"In Europe's warfare the history of the storming of a city is at the same time a history of its pillage. What are the facts in regard to the storming of Mexico? Although the enemy had infamously violated the armistice of Churubusco; and afterwards, on the bloody field of Molino, they mangled and murdered our wounded officers and soldiers when too feeble to defend themselves; notwithstanding all this, our soldiery respected the barbarity of their enemy by protecting their property from the pillage of their own lepers.

"Innumerable instances might be given of the forbearance of our troops, but I will give but one or two.

"A company of the 6th Infantry, in cutting its way through a house, entered a room containing an open box of gold coin. The American soldiers occupied the room, passed through it, and not a dollar was touched. On the same night a party of our troops discovered a box of gold addressed to a Mexican; they immediately reported the fact to their officer, and he placed the box in charge of a foreign inspector to be delivered to the owner. This conduct excited the astonishment of the Mexican, and in a public card he expressed his admiration of the forbearance of the American troops.

"Our army has ever esteemed generosity as a nobler virtue than courage; and if it boasts at all, it is of its humanity, not its prowess."

These are bright testimonials. Honors thus won and worn by our gallant citizens are dearer to their countrymen than the glorious exertions of the battle field or the victories that have crowned them.

Incidents, like these described by Colonel Morgan, have been related to me by other officers, and they better illustrate the present topic than any panegyric, however warm, or any description, however graphic. A Mexican horseman rides over the battle field thrusting his lance through the helpless wounded, gleaning, with savage ferocity, in the harvest where the Great Reaper himself had passed and spared; while the American soldier in the same scene of carnage stoops down, and raising his prostrate foe, pours the contents of his canteen into his parched lips, and recalls his fainting spirit to bless the generous enemy. This picture is at the same time a bright and a dark one, but it marks, both now and forever, the characteristics of the two armies, and I commend it to all who doubt the humanity of the American soldier, or the cruelty of the Mexican.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I entertain no intention to discuss the general topics introduced in the speech of the honorable gentleman. On one point only, I wish to say a few words, and that is with regard to the remarks which he made upon the speech of the honorable member from South Carolina, and some observations of my own, upon this assumed authority by the Executive of the United States, to levy and collect taxes in Mexico. Now, sir, when gentlemen of experience and character debate these grave questions, the first thing is to ascertain what these questions are, and to present them truly, according to their character, for discussion. The honorable member from Michigan, supposes that this levying of taxes and imposts in the territories of Mexico, by the authority of the President of the United States, is an act of war. It is no such thing.

Mr. CASS, (in his seat.) It is a right of war.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is no such thing. It is neither an act nor a right of war, according to the law of nations. He calls it a contribution. It is no contribution. It is a legislative act, and when the honorable member quoted those portions of the United States Constitution which he thought applicable to the case, he might without impropriety have quoted another passage, which says—that all legislative power is vested in the Senate and House of Representatives. Now, it exactly comes to this: is the establishment of a code of customs in Mexico an act of war, or derived from war, or an act of legislation? Why clearly it is the latter. I want to know how the President of the United States, can overturn the revenue law of Mexico, and establish a new one in its stead, any more than he can overturn the law of the descent of property—the laws of inheritance—the criminal code—or any other portion of Mexican law? A contribution levied upon Mexico! It is no such thing. What is it? It is a code of customary duties framed here in the Treasury Department and sent to Mexico, to be exercised upon whom, and upon whose property? Upon the Mexicans? Why, no, sir! Very little of it upon Mexicans, because it is a law of imposts. It is a law upon those who import goods and merchandize into Mexico—upon all the neutrals of the world—upon all nonresidents; and not only that, but it is a law levying a duty of imposts upon goods and merchandize carried thither by citizens of the United States; and that the honorable gentleman calls a "contribution."

Mr. CASS.—I do.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Well, then, I think he calls things by names which have no more relation to them than black has to white. It is not a contribution at all.

Mr. FOOTE.—I would ask the honorable gentleman whether he conceives it to be the duty of the government of the United States to protect the revenue officers of Mexico in the collection of duties; or should their proceedings have been superseded by proceedings of a similar kind on the part of the United States? What would he have done in the case?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Just exactly what Congress in its discretion should think fit to do. What, I say, is, that it is an exercise of legislative power, and no exercise of military power. If there is any analogy between that and the case mentioned by the honorable gentleman of the marshals of the French army levying contributions as they marched from city to city, flagrante bello at the head of their forces, I do not understand the logic—I do not understand that train of legal mind which can perceive analogies in cases which, as it appears to me, are entirely dissimilar. When an army marches through an enemy's country, it is supposed to have the right of supporting itself by the strong hand; it has the absolute right of war, whether it choose to exercise it or not, to make pillage—to seize private property, and what is contribution? Why, it is a substitute for the law of pillage, the practice of plunder. When an army approaches a city, the commander of that army asks so much support—so many thousand crowns—such and such provisions; he says he will take them by the strong hand, unless the authorities compound by giving so much money, in consideration of which he will forbear the exercise of that military right.

Let me ask the honorable gentlemen another question. A part of this system, sanctioned by the President, was, that the monies collected by these levies should be paid over to the military and naval officers. Could they not just as well have been ordered to be brought here and put into our treasury? Does it make a particle of difference, and is it not a system of revenue established under executive authority in Mexico, and will any man call that military contribution? Let it be shown by any authentic work on national law—by any decided case—by any course of reasoning or argument, that the levying of a permanent system of revenue, in a conquered territory, is exactly the same thing as a temporary or occasional military contribution of a marching army; and then the charge brought against the administration cannot be maintained.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise to make a very few remarks. When I addressed the Senate yesterday, in reply to the question what shall we do if the treaty is not ratified, I answered—take possession of the country which is ceded to us by that instrument, occupy it, and defend it. The worthy Senator from Michigan says he is at a loss to understand what I mean by that. Well, there is not much difference between us. I am at a loss to understand why he cannot understand it. It appears to me to be one of the plainest propositions in the world. He has hunted up a thousand imaginary difficulties that never did exist, and never can exist, in order to make good his case. Does he wish to know how my plan can be carried out? I point to the case of Texas. The whole of the eastern frontier in the line ceded to us, as is supposed, by the treaty, was the boundary which Texas claimed as against Mexico. Now, does not every man know, that for seven long years Texas held possession of that frontier without a single invasion on the part of Mexico, and that at a time when Texas had not more than three or four companies of regulars altogether? Now, sir, if Texas could hold that line then, is there any difficulty with Texas in doing it, now that she has doubled her population, and is backed by the whole of the United States? And yet the worthy Senator from Michigan cannot understand it! It is impossible that he can understand it! Again, as to California, he is, if possible, more at a loss with regard to that. His first great difficulty is our occupying the Gulf of California. If the Senator will remember, the line that I proposed passed through the whole extent of the Gulf of California, and if he will look at the map he will find it is a very broad expanse of water. He will find that it covers a very large portion of California—all the settled and inhabited portion of California. If he will look at the statistics of Mexico, he will find that she has not a single armed vessel. Now, what I proposed was, that a few armed vessels—one or two steamers among them—occupying that expanse of water would secure us against all attacks of Mexico on that portion of the line; and yet the Senator could not understand it! It is, as I understand, with him, a sort of metaphysical idea! Now, as to the residue of that line. The whole length of it is about four or five hundred miles from the head of the gulf to the Paso Del Norte. That is all that remains to be defended. Well, the whole of the country covered by that line is inhabited by Indian tribes, so powerful that there is no fear of Mexico invading it. They invade Mexico. They are too powerful for her, and it will not require a single soldier to be stationed in the whole extent of that line in order to protect us against Mexico. There may be some protection necessary against the Indians. Now we know that California is so far remote from Mexico, the difficulty of approach is so great, that the mere handful of people in California have been enabled to in fact to have almost an independent government there. I venture to say that not a single regiment will be needed there—that the Americans now there, together with the natives who are well affected towards us and desirous of seeing our authority established, will be quite adequate to defend it against Mexico forever, with the aid of a few vessels in the Gulf of California.

Now I venture to present, what no doubt will appear to the Senator a very bold proposition: the cost would be vastly less to fall back and occupy the country without the treaty, than to occupy it under the treaty. I beg the especial attention of the Senator. Under the treaty—I may speak of what every one knows perfectly well—a large mass of Indians is thrown on our side of the line, and, from the necessity of the case, we shall be compelled to defend Mexico against these Indians; or, if we should not, and Mexico should have force enough, she will have the right to pass over and attack these Indians within our line, to which we could not submit. For that purpose, then, we will be obliged to establish a line of military posts along the whole length of the Gila, from the Paso del Norte to the head of the Gulf of California. But it would require a larger and more expensive force to occupy this long line of posts, so as to defend Mexico against the Indians than would be necessary to occupy and defend the country against the Mexicans themselves. The reason is obvious. The Gulf of California (as I have stated) will cover, with a few vessels, the whole of the settled part of California; and the Indians occupy the whole intervening country between the head of the gulf, and the Paso Del Norte, which would effectually cover us, from the possibility of an attack on that part of the line, from the Mexicans. Nor would it be necessary to have any considerable force to protect us against the Indians, as their hostility to Mexico, and their love of plunder, would direct their warfare exclusively against Mexico. That the long line, of which the Senator spoke, of fifteen hundred miles, could to its whole extent, from the ocean to the Paso Del Norte, be defended by a small force, and at an inconsiderable expenditure if held without the treaty. The only remaining part that might require protection would be from the Paso to the ocean, along the Rio Del Norte; and we know from the experience of Texas how little that will probably cost. Now, if we add to this difference in the cost of defending the country without the treaty, and of defending under the treaty, the large sum of fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, which will be saved if Mexico refuses to ratify the treaty, there can be no doubt but we will be great gainers in a pecuniary point of view, if she should refuse to ratify.

But I understand the drift of the Senator's remarks in this particular. He and I entertain directly opposite opinions as to what should be done, in case the treaty should not be ratified. He is in that event for a vigorous prosecution of the war, and hence, in order to force the country upon that ultimatum, his vigorous attack upon the policy of which in that case I am in favor, and exaggerated statement of the expense and difficulty of maintaining it.—Indeed, there has been a standing conflict between the two lines of policy, almost from the commencement of the war, and hence the repeated assaults of a similar character, which have been incessantly made on that which I have maintained, and with the same view; I mean those who support the policy maintained by the Senator; but I have no fear—none in the world—that we shall ever return to a "vigorous prosecution of the war." That day is gone. You cannot vitalize the policy. It is buried. The country would consider it the greatest misfortune that could befall us, if we were to reopen and renew the Mexican war. The tide of public opinion is running with irresistible force against it. I have no apprehension of it. But I do desire that in the meantime the public mind shall not be occupied with an idea which will prevent it from falling into its natural position, if this treaty should be ratified. If the treaty should not be ratified, it is plain that we must keep possession of the country and defend it.

Every Senator can speak as to himself and his votes during secret session. I voted for the treaty and I supported it. But did I do that because I regarded it as preferable to the course which I indicated at the commencement of this and last session? No, sir, not at all. I did it for two reasons: in the first place, I was anxious to terminate this war on any reasonable ground, and was determined to avail myself of the earliest opportunity of terminating it, for I hold it to be pregnant of evil of the most dangerous character, if it continues. In the next place, it is the natural way of terminating hostilities between nations; and many of my friends whom I see around me will testify that I have declared for the last three or four weeks that I was in favor of allowing the administration reasonable time to make a treaty. But at the same time I was not ignorant of the many advantages of a defensive line. And again, I take this opportunity to say that so far as my votes is concerned, I wish it now to be established, as I hope it will be by the ratification of the treaty, that we never shall take by an aggressive war one foot of territory by conquest. We pay by the treaty the full value—more than the full value—a hundred times more than the full value, as far as Mexico is concerned, for it is worse than useless to her, and the full value as far as we are concerned, and I rejoice it is so. I wish to square accounts liberally and justly with Mexico, and we have done so, and hence my desire that Mexico shall ratify this treaty and receive this money.

These are my views. As to the other remarks which the Senator was pleased to make with re gard to my speech of yesterday, I pass them by without a comment, except as they relate to the right of the President to establish a system of taxes in Mexico. I listened to the Senator, as I always do, with attention, and I must say, if I could have entertained a doubt as to the truth of the position which I assumed yesterday, all doubt would be dispelled. We know that the gentleman is deeply versed in the principles of law—of great intelligence—capable of investigating questions of this character. I expected when he rose, that he would meet the points which were presented—that he would attempt to show their fallacy, and exhibit the true principles which ought to govern us in this case, if mine were false. I was disappointed. As far as I understood the Senator—and if I be in error I hope he will correct me—he assumes one broad position, which, in my judgment—I say it with great deference—is without a particle of truth to sustain it. He assumes that the President, in consequence of the declaration of war, has an unlimited power in Mexico. Am I right?

Mr. CASS.—Unlimited, except by the restrictions imposed by the law of nations.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Well, then, the law of nations does not prohibit an order of nobility. Can he create nobles in Mexico? Give me the answer?

Mr. CASS.—Is that one of the incidents of the war-making power?

Mr. CALHOUN.—I repeat it. Can he establish an order of nobility?

Mr. CASS.—I would not give much for the patents of nobility.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Can he, then, establish an order of nobles?

Mr. CASS.—Without going into any detail, I may state that the commander-in-chief and his generals may do any act in the prosecution of the war in Mexico, which is properly incident to a state of war. All I can do is to lay down general principles. It cannot be expected that I should go into details of all that may or may not be done.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I did not intend this as an irrelevant or impertinent question, and I must regard the Senator's refusal to deny as an admission on his part that the President has the power. Indeed, it followed necessarily from the principle laid down by him. It would indeed be an important power in the hands of the President to bring and subject a conquered country under his arbitrary rule. The Senator acknowledges that the power is a very dangerous one. It is indeed a dangerous power if it be as unlimited as he contends for. Can he create a field-marshal in Mexico? The Senator will not doubt that, if the President could raise an army there—can he create a field-marshal? I hold it to be the most monstrous proposition ever uttered in the Senate, that conquering such a country as Mexico, the President can himself be a despotic ruler without the slightest limitation on his power. If all this be true, war is indeed dangerous! If that be the fact, we ought never to engage in a war of conquest. If that be the fact, there are double reasons for the ratification of the treaty, or fleeing the country.

There is a tendency in all parties, when they have been for a long time in possession of power, to be disposed to augment it. It has been the fortune of the popular party in this country to hold possession of the government for a great length of time, and it is no more than human nature, that the effect of that long-continued tenure should be the creation of the fondness of power, that necessarily diminishes the love of liberty. This love of power leads men to strike at those provisions of the constitution which restrict power. I believe that the popular party in this country have resisted this tendency for a great length of time to a considerable extent; but it is impossible for any man who reads the early history of that party, not to be impressed with the conviction that it has departed from the principles which then characterized it. The declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs this evening proves a great departure beyond all controversy. I did not believe that there was a man in this country—certainly not that there was one in the Senate, who would declare that the President of the United States as commander-in-chief of the army in Mexico, has no restrictions on his power but those imposed by the law of nations, and I suppose the gentleman would add, the principles of morality.

Mr. CASS.—After the Senator has concluded I may say what I did declare.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I will gladly hear the Senator now.

Mr. CASS.—When the honorable Senator from South Carolina has finished—

Mr. CALHOUN.—Then I shall finish now.

Mr. CASS.—What I maintain is, that the commander-in-chief and the generals under him have a right to do any act of war justified by the law of nations, and it belongs to every officer of the army, from a general down to a corporal. I went at large into the question in the remarks which I had the honor to make to-day. The course taken in Mexico has been fully justified by the practice of war in all ages. Whether the contribution be in cash or in kind, the principle is the same. One word as to the line which the honorable Senator has laid down. I have presented the objections to it which, to my judgment, are decisive, and I need not repeat them. No public opinion in the world would permit such a thing as the establishment of a line behind which an operating army must retire. If you are at war with an enemy, you cannot stop upon a given line. In the case of Texas the enemy was pursued, and whenever you follow the enemy beyond the line, the project is abandoned.

Mr. CALHOUN.—But the Senator puts the question: How can I justify the army in performing any act not authorized expressly by law? I take the ground that the army may do under the President, the commander-in-chief, any thing that properly belongs to him in that character. Now the extent is not defined; it is governed by the exigencies of war. I believe I use the very terms employed in the elementary works upon this subject. But these acts must relate to war and not to conquered country. Now, if you mean that an army in operation can seize provisions of every description, means of transportation, and so on, I never denied it; but if you mean to say that after the country is conquered, the commander-in-chief may levy either taxes or contributions, I deny the doctrine altogether.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON,] has expressed his conviction of the certainty of an immediate peace, and on that he based his argument in presenting his motion to recommit the bill with instructions. I have just received a letter from Mexico which certainly does not encourage me in the prospect of peace. This letter states that the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico is infested by guerilleros, and that a party for Orizaba had been attacked by them and been compelled to return to Vera Cruz. Though reported that the Mexicans had been dispersed, yet the American party left their dead on the field, and all their property fell into the hands of the guerilleros. Those reports which we have had of Santa Anna asking his pass-ports and leaving the country, are all pretext. Instead of leaving the country it is said that he is now recruiting his forces and looks to future operations. Perhaps he is raising nothing more than an escort, but peace is not his object. I beg to say to the honorable Senator from South Carolina that that party in Mexico, to which he alludes as being neither unfriendly nor inimical to us, is the party on which Santa Anna is falling back for support in his hostile movements—the party of Puros, which invited him to return to Mexico, as the enemy of monarchical government, in order to overthrow Paredes.

I cannot, for myself, approve of any such policy as that spoken of by the Senator from South Carolina, nor can I at all conceive why he should regard the raising of this additional force in the light of mere braggadocio. We propose to raise it for the moral effect which it may produce on Mexico. We have with propriety pass this bill in order to give Mexico to understand that if she do not give us peace willingly, we will coerce a peace. But that gallant army which has performed so many glorious deeds is rapidly wasting away. The yellow fever has appeared in Vera Cruz, and our troops are dying in the interior of other diseases. The volunteers are becoming daily more and more dissatisfied with the service; and, in my opinion, the spirit of the contract under which they entered the service justifies their discharge as soon as active hostilities ceased. They entered for the war, but they believed that on the cessation of active hostilities they would be discharged. Already the question is mooted whether, if there can be war without a declaration of war, there may not be peace without a treaty.

But the honorable Senator from South Carolina not only directs his attention to the present measure, which he reprobates as mere braggadocio, but goes back to an old subject—the removal of the army to the banks of the Rio Grande. He says:

"The whole affair is premeditated. Whether the army fall or not, would leave the cabinet content if it were with wisdom and firmness, and avoid what I deem above all things, a system of movement towards the encroachment of one nation. I had hoped that that system had been abandoned forever. It never succeeded in a war with England about Oregon. It was only resorted to, when, upon the firmness of the basis, it was sought to put our negotiations with Mexico and the march of the army under General Taylor to the Rio Grande were said to sustain it. Unfortunately, the circumstances prevented the Senate from interposing, as in the case of Oregon, and the war was thus commenced."

Now, the President has clearly the right to move the army of the United States into any portion of its territory.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.)—Certainly not into disputed territory.

Mr. DAVIS.—The Senator says that the President has not the right to move the army into any disputed territory. When we annexed Texas, we left this boundary question open for negotiation. The administration sought assiduously to settle the question by negotiation. What, then, is the argument of the Senator? When the opposite party refuse to settle the question by negotiation, are we to be estopped? Are we to allow the enemy to wrest from us the dominion which we claim as ours of right? If so, what is this but a broad invitation to every land to dispute the boundary with us? But I would ask the honorable Senator how comes it that even before the annexation of Texas, the navy of the United States was ordered to the Gulf of Mexico for the protection of Texas?

Mr. CALHOUN.—The answer is obvious. The Gulf of Mexico is the common property of all nations. It is not disputed. But though we had a right to enter Vera Cruz, we had not the right to enter the harbor of Vera Cruz.

Mr. DAVIS.—Was it not the gentleman's own order to make a naval demonstration against Vera Cruz.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have no knowledge of such an order.—Will the Senator permit me to notice another point? He indicated that the President had a right to march the army into any disputed territory. Am I right?

Mr. DAVIS.—I do not consider it disputed territory.

Mr. CALHOUN.—However the Senator may consider it, the resolutions annexing Texas to this Union, expressly admit the country to the east of the del Norte, to a certain extent, to be disputed territory; by providing that the boundary between Texas and Mexico, shall be settled by the government of the United States. Now, as Texas never claimed any country beyond the Rio del Norte, it results necessarily, that the point to be settled, was whether the boundary of Texas extended to that river or not, admitting of course, that the country lying east to some extent, was disputed territory. And, I ask, how is a question of disputed territory to be decided? There can be but two modes. By negotiation or war. As far as the former extends, the President, with the Senate, represent exclusively the United States; but when negotiation fails to settle disputed boundary, nothing is more clear, that if it becomes necessary to resort to war, to establish the boundary, in that case, the power passes out of the hands of the President, into that of Congress, which, under the constitution, exclusively possesses the war making power, and that it belongs in that case, exclusively to Congress, to determine what the boundary is, and to authorize the President to establish it by force. The great mistake of the Senator, and those who think with him, is, to look at the question between Mexico and the United States, and to overlook the question between the departments of our own government. As between the United States and Mexico, there can be no doubt, that when negotiation failed, the United States had the right to establish the boundary for themselves, but the question is through what department? Through the President or through Congress? The very statement of this question is sufficient to decide it. The error of the Senator consists in supposing that when the President failed to negotiate with Mexico, in reference to the boundary, his failure gave him the right to determine of his own authority, without consulting Congress, what was the boundary, when, in fact, the failure of the negotiation exhausted his power, and left him no means of acting, but by submitting the question to Congress for its decision. It is really wonderful to those who have been in this body for an considerable length of time, that there should be any question on these points.

It may be proper to add, that the power of the President and the Senate, is so rigidly restricted to negotiating and making treaties, that although they may make, they have no authority to set aside a treaty when it is violated by the opposite party. That power belongs not even to the judiciary, but to Congress; of which there is a remarkable instance in reference to the treaty made between France and the United States, during the war of the Revolution. That treaty was so outrageously violated by France during her revolutionary struggle, that it became necessary on our part, to disown any further obligation under it, and that was made by a joint resoluton of Congress, declaring it to be null and void. This precedent has never been questioned. It shows that the power was restricted within the limits I have assigned.

Assuming these views to be correct, I put the question to the Senator, how could the President on his own authority order Gen. Taylor to occupy a territory which the resolutions of Congress, and the act of Texas acceding to them, admitted to be disputed territory between her and Mexico, and that, too, without even consulting or even advising Congress of the order, although Congress was at the time in session? I hold that the President had no more right to order the army to march into the disputed territory than he had to order it to march into Mexico. I might appeal to the whole history of our country in reference to this point, for the truth of this position. There are many cases that bear upon it. Among others I might cite those which occurred under the administration of Gen. Washington. It is known to all the least conversant with our history, that Great Britain, after the treaty of peace, held on, not only to Detroit, which was near the frontier, and then in the woods, but to Fort Stanwix, now Rome, in the very heart of the state of New York, from '83 to '94, without any attempt on the part of Gen. Washington to disturb her possession. He never dreamt of attacking either, without authority of Congress, and if he had, there was no one at that day that would not have considered it as a flagrant violation of the constitution. To this I may add, we had a question of disputed boundary in Maine, arising out of the treaty of 1793, which remained open under all administrations down to a very late period of that of Mr. Tyler's. Yet there was not any attempt whatever on the part of the United States to assert by force their right to the disputed territory. Sir, I never heard a man dare denial of the principle, anterior to this war with Mexico, that the Executive, on his own authority, had no right to march the army into disputed territory.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I beg to remind the Senator that Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison seized upon the country west of the Mississippi.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Oh! that was a trifling case. You could cover the whole country with a blanket!

Mr. DAVIS.—I repeat, that I cannot perceive on what grounds the Senator will justify the orders sending the navy to the Gulf of Mexico, whilst we were negotiating the annexation of Texas, and yet deny that after annexation was completed—

Mr. CALHOUN.—They were issued when Congress was in session. If any attack had been necessary, application would have been made to Congress for authority.

Mr. DAVIS.—The whole case is matter of record, and we know as well as the actors in it, that our navy did stand off, and on the coast look into the Mexican harbors, to keep our government advised of any hostile movements, and be prepared to act if necessary, for the protection of Texas. For like purpose, a large portion of our army was concentrated upon the border, and put in correspondence with the President of Texas. The Senator from South Carolina, then Secretary of State, communicated to the Texan government this disposition of our land and naval forces, and announced it to be the purpose of the President, as a duty under the then existing circumstances, to use all his constitutional power to protect Texas from foreign invasion. If the whole power to grant the protection thus offered, consisted in asking for authority by an act of Congress, it was a promise likely to be filled with hope deferred. In view of the delays which would probably have attended the passage of such an act, what justification can there be for so early a movement of the army and navy to the immediate proximity of anticipated operations? Does the Senator deny the power of the President to order the army into any part of the United States?

Mr. CALHOUN.—He has no right to order it into disputed territory.

Mr. DAVIS.—What! shall a foreign power dispute our territorial limits—refuse to settle the boundary by negotiation—seize, by force, territory rightfully ours, and our Executive stand powerless by and see the enemy gain the advantage of occupying all the commanding positions of the country! This would be an alluring invitation to every conterminous power, to select their opportunity and dispute our boundary. At any time, during the recess of Congress, according to the Senator's general position, the territory thus disputed could be seized with entire safety.—Upon the question of the northeastern boundary, to which the Senator alluded, my recollections are different from his. I think, by both the Committee on Military Affairs and by the Committee on Foreign Relations, reports were made at the time, recognizing the power of the Executive to use the military force of the country—to call out the militia—to protect the territory claimed by Maine from hostile invasion, or an attempt by military force to exercise exclusive jurisdiction within the disputed territory. But I was about to say, when I yielded to the honorable Senator, that after Texas became a part of the American Union, and we failed by negotiation to adjust the boundary with Mexico, the question became closed against us, and the United States had no other mode by which to determine the territory of Texas, than by reference to her limits, as defined before annexation to the United States; all which had been asserted and maintained, and which we were bound to insist on and defend from forcible seizure. By annexation, Texas lost the power to negotiate or to carry on the war, and co-extensive with this surrender, were the obligations imposed upon the United States. The President did what, every man of patriotic impulses will say, he should have done, afford to Texas that protection which a State has the right to demand, and in ordering the army to the Rio Grande, he did no more than might have been done in the case of the northeastern boundary, when that was an open question. But the Senator has laid down the position that this was done to intimidate Mexico. Not so. Our army was encamped at Corpus Christi, which had been made a port of entry. Was that, then, in the disputed territory? Where was the disputed territory? Mexico claimed up to the Sabine. She has continued to assert that claim and any intermediate line between the Sabine and the Rio Grande is of our suggestion, not of Mexican origin. When, at a recent period, Santa Anna returned to Mexico, he promised to restore the severed territory of Texas, to gather laurels on the banks of the Sabine, and lay them at the feet of the supreme government. A right to the whole of Texas, a determination to restore it to Mexico has, by her soldiers and her statesmen, been uniformly asserted—adhered to with the pertinacity characteristic of the Spanish race. The whole of Texas, then, was included in this disputed territory, and if the President had no right to march the army to the Rio Grande, he had no right to order it across the Sabine.—

Mexico claimed the whole of Texas. In the controversy on the part of Mexico the question was not whether the Nueces or the Rio Grande was the boundary, but whether Texas was a part of the United States or not. Upon the part of the United States that question was closed, forever closed; before her army was ordered into the territory of Texas, nothing was open but the adjustment of boundary. This was sought by negotiation with Mexico, and our advances were insultingly repelled. That the boundary of revolutionary Texas was the Rio Grande—at least the lower part of that river—has been too often and too conclusively demonstrated to require more than a passing notice. Without adverting to the mass of evidence which has been presented here on other occasions, I will refer only to that on which I mainly rely. After the battle of San Jacinto, and when Santa Anna was a prisoner in the hands of the Texans, General Filisola, commanding the Mexican army, wrote to his government, communicating the fact of President Santa Anna's capture, and giving the saddest account of the condition of the troops under his command. The President ad interim replied, and gave the General authority to do whatever should be necessary to procure the release of the captive President and to save his troops and munitions of war. These results were obtained by treaty. General Filisola was one of the parties to that treaty, and the consideration given to Texas for the vast benefits thus secured, was the recognition of the Rio Grande as a boundary, and the immediate withdrawal of all Mexican troops beyond it. It is true this treaty was never formally ratified by Mexico, but having obtained the full benefit of all its stipulations, I submit whether the moral obligation was not complete henceforth and forever to recognise the Rio Grande as the true boundary. That is the only argument on which I have ever found it necessary to rest this point.

Not being a lawyer, I will not attempt to discuss a legal question with the eminent jurist on the other side of the chamber, [Mr. WEBSTER,] but cannot forbear from expressing my surprise at the view which he, in connexion with the distinguished Senator on this side of the chamber, [Mr. CALHOUN,] takes of the legitimate rights of our army when invading a foreign country. They would restrain our army from the moment it enters a hostile country, so as to prevent it from availing itself of any of the public funds—they would restrict it to such contributions as they might wring from the citizens. Now, one of the evidences of the advancement of civilization in the conduct of war has been seen in that very procedure on the part of an army which these distinguished Senators condemn. Instead of wringing from poverty—from the agricultural citizen the means of maintenance, our army have seized only upon the public resources of the country, and have thus illustrated the intelligence, chivalry, and humanity of the American people.

The Senators contend that legislation is necessary to appropriate the public revenues of Mexico to the maintenance of our army, whilst they admit the right to seize private property for its use. Sir, I had thought our war was waged against the general government of Mexico, and that our policy was as far as possible to reduce the peaceful population from the ordinary sufferings of war. Sir, I am at a loss to conceive how we could properly legislate upon a country which had not been conquered—for a people in open war against us—or how the laws, if enacted, could be properly executed under such circumstances? The foreign government must have been displaced by our arms; before there is space for our legislation and judicial departments to flow in, and the roar of those arms must have been hushed, before the voice of the lawgiver can be heard. The constitution of the United States makes provision for the organization and maintenance of our army and navy, and for calling out the militia by legislative enactments. It makes the President the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and the militia, when called into service. Congress declared that war existed. It passed laws for raising men and money. The President, as commander-in-chief, assumed the command of the army; and, as has been stated by the Senator from Michigan, from that moment all the rights which appertain to a state of war, attached to the army. The exercise of legislative rights only follows when Congress takes possession of a conquered country. Up to that point nothing but the power of the Executive department flows in. The power belongs not to the President merely, but to the Executive department, and without orders from the President, every officer in the army could exercise it. The right is conferred by war, and the only difference between the action of our army and that of any other, has consisted in this, that ours has demanded less and taken nothing by force. It has not committed pillage. The government opposed to us has been deprived of power, and the resources by which it was sustained naturally flowed to the army which took the country and people in charge. In laying duties—in collecting taxes, they have collected but a portion of the revenue which would have flowed to the Mexican government if it had not been displaced by our arms. Both could not exist together. Such is the plain common sense view of the matter. The legal view I must leave to others. The honorable Senator from South Carolina fears that if the President exercise this power, immense abuses may follow—that armies may be raised and treaties may be made with other countries; and that, he says, would be in violation of the constitution of the United States. The constitution of the United States is a temple gradually extending itself, and covering acre after acre, state after state, spanning rivers and mountains, but not yet gone to foreign lands. It is still limited to the United States. It cannot be violated in Mexico. It does not extend to Mexico, and God forbid it ever should! It is the constitution of our own Union and our own people, and none but territory annexed to our Union can claim to be under that constitution. If the President has violated the constitution, in the progress of this war, you must prove that he has failed to comply with the law which declared the war and authorized him to prosecute it, giving him men and money for that purpose. Until that be shown, the President cannot have violated any provision of the constitution in Mexico.

But the main purpose for which I rose, sir, was to speak of the effect of the passage of this bill in Mexico. We had information from a special agent sent to Mexico in 1844 that he had commenced preliminaries and had the prospect of a settlement by negotiation, of all the difficulties then pending. On the fourth day after the negotiation had been opened two celebrated letters published in that year reached Mexico. One dated at Raleigh and the other at Lindenwold. On the arrival of these letters, forwarded, it is said, by the Mexican minister at Washington city, the negotiation was immediately suspended. Again, Mexico probably intended to enter into a negotiation for the settlement of the questions then in dispute when Mr. Black received intimation, in the terms so often referred to here, of a willingness on the part of Mexico to receive a commissioner; though I think that there has been altogether a misunderstanding of the language in which the note was written. Commissionado was the term employed, meaning one commissioned, empowered to settle the questions in dispute. Now, they may have meant no other questions than those growing out of the annexation of Texas; but as the Senator from Michigan remarked, they sought refuge in the subterfuge of the distinction between the terms "minister" and "commissioner," and thus evaded the obligation of the contract into which they had voluntarily entered. And why? Because at that time a controversy had arisen with regard to the boundary in Oregon. The Mexicans then cherished the hope that there would be war between this country and England, and that with the latter as an ally they would be able to regain Texas. The old hope was thus revived. They refused to enter into negotiations. And now if they have their hopes revived again with the prospect of a refusal here to supply men and money to prosecute the war, they will again reject negotiations in the expectation that a new administration may come into power in the United States more favorable to them. If we change the policy which we have heretofore pursued there can be no doubt that they will refuse to ratify the treaty.

In our intercourse with Mexico, if we have erred, it has been in undue consideration and misplaced leniency. For a long term of years we have borne national insult, and left unredressed the personal outrages, and pecuniary injuries done to our citizens by Mexico. We have passed unnoticed the offences repeatedly offered in their official correspondence, it was the strong rendered patient, with the captiousness of the weak, by the consciousness of his ability to punish. This course so long observed by our government, has surely not been departed from by the present administration.

I cannot conceive, sir, how the President could have exhibited greater forbearance towards Mexico. He sent out a minister to treat with her on the first intimation of any desire on her part to enter into a negotiation for the purpose of restoring amicable relations. Acting in the forbearing and friendly spirit of the power, who had taken that infant republic by the hand when it first essayed to walk, we studiously avoided collision. Collision, however, from the causes to which I have alluded, became at last inevitable. Yet it is gravely asserted that the President had determined to extend the territory of the United States to the Rio Grande—"peaceably if he could—forcibly if he must." Most certainly not to extend the territory of the United States, but to settle the question of boundary; and had we been the aggressive party, as it has been alleged—had we been reckless of the feelings, rights and interests of Mexico, we certainly never should have incorporated a provision in the terms of annexation, securing to us the right of settling the limits of Texas—that was done to guard against the possibility of a collision with Mexico; we did not adopt the extreme claims of Texas, but reserved to ourselves the right to settle the question of boundary. Nothing could have been done more indicative of the friendly spirit which we entertained towards Mexico.

At this late hour I certainly shall not attempt to enlarge, but I must take occasion to say that I do not think that Mexico is about to cede any territory to the United States—I think that we are about to retrocede territory to Mexico. I hold that in a just war we conquered a larger portion of Mexico, and that to it we have a title which has been regarded as valid ever since man existed in a social condition—the title of conquest. It seems to me that the question now is how much we shall keep, how much we shall give up, and that Mexico cedes nothing.

Mr. WEBSTER was understood to inquire if that view was in accordance with the terms of the paper.

Mr. DAVIS.—I have seen papers in English and Spanish, and I think in none was the term cede employed. As a moralist I would not undertake to defend the seizure of country from the inhabitants; but the question was settled long before the oldest member of the Senate entered it. These very Mexican people settled it when they conquered the ancient Aztecs. If they had the right to take the territory from that people who did not cultivate it, the argument is equally good against them now. They produce little to that which the country is capable of yielding, and year by year the amount is steadily decreasing. The country is going to waste—villages are depopulated—fields once highly productive in all that nature in her bounty yielded to the industry of man, now lie uncultivated, and marked only by the remains of the irrigatory ditches by which they were formerly watered. The exuberant wealth of Mexico once flowed out to sustain the American colonies of Spain, the governments of Louisiana and Florida, received contributions from her. Turn now and contemplate the change which the difference of government has wrought, and tell me whether all the arguments of militarianism and of humanity, may not be now more successfully applied to the Mexican, than by them against the Aztec populiaon?

The Senator says this war is "odious." Odious! Odious for what? On account of the skill and gallantry with which it has been conducted? or is it because of the humanity, the morality, the magnanimous clemency which has marked its execution? Odious! Why in any newspaper which I take up, I find notices of large assemblages of the people gathered together to do honor to the remains of some dead soldier brought back from Mexico; or around the festive board to greet the return of some gallant member of the army. The conductors of the press without distiction of party, express the highest approbation of the conduct of the army. Where is the odium? What portion of our population is infected with it? From what cause does it arrise? It cannot be on account of the origin of the war, the extraordinary unanimity with which it was declared by both houses of Congress, the eagerness with which our citizens pressed to the service, forbid that conclusion. A long and unbroken succession of victories, has satiated the public appetite for military triumph—there may be a surfeit, for more has been offered than needed for a feast—an over anxiety for immediate peace is the natural result, with this I sympathize, beyond this I am not prepared to believe the popular feeling of the country extends.

We have cause to be proud of the record this war will leave behind it—a monument more lasting than brass. We, the actors of to-day, must soon crumble to dust, the institutions we now maintain and hope will be perpetual, may pass away, the republic may sink in the ocean of time, and the tide of human events roll unbroken over its grave; but the events of this war will live in the history of our country and our race, affording in all ages to come proof of the high state of civilization amongst the people who conducted it—proof of the intelligence which pervaded the rank and file who fought its battles—proof of the resources of such a government as ours, wholly unembarrassed in the midst of war, conquering one nation and feeding another!—Where, sir, are the evidences of evil brought upon us by this "odious" war? Where can you point to any inroad upon our prosperity, public, or private, industrial, commercial, or financial, which can be, in any degree, attributed to the prosecution of this war. All that is yet to be shown, and I confidently await the issue.

Mr. WESTCOTT then addressed the Senate in favor of the bill, on the ground that in his judgment, there was not a reasonable expectation of a treaty of peace. This speech is given in the Appendix.

Mr. BUTLER.—As I perceive that the Senate is determined to refuse to modify the bill—for they have already decided by quite a large majority, that these troops shall be raised—I have nothing further to say in regard to that matter beyond this one remark. I wish the Senate distinctly to understand, that if this bill pass the other House, it will not be passed as a bill for organizing ten regiments, with the complement of officers which belongs to such a force. The simple proposition that I made was, to add thirty men to each company, or three hundred to each regiment of the present army. It has not been the pleasure of the Senate to adopt my amendment to recommit the bill, and I ask the Senate to take notice, that that will be the form in which the troops will be raised. The action of the Senate itself, will have the effect of influencing the House to engraft such an amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I desire the attention of the Senate for a short time, although but for the remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan, I should hardly have thought it necessary to trouble the Senate any farther. But before I proceed to reply to that Senator, I must be allowed to say, that I was forcibly struck by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) with regard to the conduct of Mexico, since this armistice was proclaimed. It is shown that there is an armistice existing, which is to last at least two months in order to afford time for negotiations. In this state of the case, the Senator from Mississippi says, that he has received a letter from a friend whom he fully accredits, in Mexico, stating the fact which we have seen announced in the public prints, that the country between Mexico and Vera Cruz, is filled with guerilleros, and that though the armistice has been proclaimed, the war still rages. Sir, this fact is a pregnant one. It proves to us what I have stated before, that that government has not the power to enforce obedience to its will. No one doubts, that they who have negotiated, have acted in good faith, and that they are desirous of restraining these guerilleros, and that so far as they have the power they will do so, but it is impossible for them to restrain them, and what is the inference? Why, that whether the treaty is ratified or not, when your army returns, your peace will not be a secure one. It seems to me that these facts show us irresistibly, that the conclusion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, is the correct one, that the only mode of obtaining a permanent peace is to withdraw to a line and defend it. We can defend it as well without a treaty as with it. If there is no government in Mexico which can compel these guerrilleros to obey, what are we to do? Would it not have been far better, if we had taken the advice of the honorable Senator, long ago? We may be compelled to do so yet. In that case, there is no doubt we have troops enough already in Mexico for the defence of the line, though perhaps not enough for "overrunning the whole country, capturing every town and province, and keeping the government in perpetual motion." It is evident from the report of the Adjutant General, that we have troops enough there to keep this line, which seems to be our inevitable destiny in the end, if the information of the honorable Senator from Mississippi be correct.

Now, a word to the honorable Senator from Michigan. In the course of my remarks some time ago, to which the honorable Senator has replied to-day, I did say, that I thought he put himself in the position of the champion of the administration, but I did not use the term in an offensive sense. He has this day proved himself the champion, the very Ajax Telemon, of his party. The honorable Senator in the opening speech on this bill, intimated to us that the whole course of the government, in the conduct of this war was impregnable; that if it were attacked, the assault could be easily met and as easily repelled. I noticed this remark of the honorable Senator at the time, and to avoid all mistake, I quoted from his speech verbatim et literatim, in his hearing. I drew the inference and so said, that the champion of the administration had thrown his gauntlet at our feet, that he had defied us to show a single instance, in which the conduct of the administration was not impregnable. Sir, I, as one of the humblest of the Senators defied, dared to take the gauntlet up, and proceeded to direct his attention to a set of facts, calling for his defence. I referred to the conduct of Santa Anna, as the murderer of our people at Goliad and the Alamo. This, I think, was of itself enough to satisfy Mr. Polk, and every one of the character of that man. I then proceeded to ask the Senator from Michigan, why the President on the day on which this war commenced, admitted this same Santa Anna into Mexico by special order, with all his sins upon his head—the consequence of which admission has been, that we have been compelled to fight thousands and tens of thousands of Mexicans, who never would have rallied under any other leader. And now, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi said to-night, this same Santa Anna, instead of leaving Mexico, is rallying his bands, not only of guerrilleros, but of regular forces, for another attack upon us. And if this information be correct, there is no reason on our part to believe, so long as he remains in Mexico, there will be any permanent peace. Who, then, is to blame for all this? The administration; the President. And I called the honorable Senator from Michigan, to defend them from this charge, if their conduct was impregnable, and so easily defended. Well, what has he done? Why he tells me to-day, in a speech which he made closing the debate upon this bill, that I have done him wrong in calling him the champion of the administration; and instead of exonerating the President from this charge, the champion is totally silent on the subject. We have heard some dozen speeches on that side of the chamber in defence of the Executive, and though we are told that the conduct of the administration is impregnable and easily defended, not one of the gentlemen who have spoken has condescended to notice the matter at all. The Senator from Michigan says he is not the champion. Now, I appeal to the Senate if he did not, in effect, blow a trumpet to invite an antagonist into the field, and when I met him there, if he did not lay down his arms and beat a retreat?

Again, I charged upon the administration that they caused the troops to be withdrawn from General Taylor whilst on the eve of the battle of Buena Vista, and when Santa Anna stood in his front with twenty thousand of the best troops of Mexico, leaving him barely about a quarter of the number opposed to him. I also adverted to the failure to supply General Scott with troops while at Puebla, though he repeatedly entreated troops and munitions of war, so that finally that great captain was obliged to enter the city of Mexico with less than six thousand men. True, he, like General Taylor, was successful on all occasions against fearful odds; yet I arraign the conduct of the administration for causing both these Generals to the embarrassments with which they were obliged to contend by reason of these acts, whilst a contrary course would have saved the lives of thousands of our people. But to all this there has been no reply.

There was another subject on which the honorable Senator did me the honor to offer a reply to some remarks of mine. I had said in the course of the debate, that the President has, in his message, distinctly announced a new position; that he had attempted to negotiate, and had stated his ultimatum which had been refused, and that nothing remained but to conquer Mexico. All know that I was the advocate of supplies to the army. I voted them on all occasions, but when the President took up this position and avowed that his object was conquest, I said I would go no farther, and I stated some cases to justify myself in this determination. Amongst other things, I put the case of a man who had money due him, who met his debtor on the high way and demanded of him, presenting, at the same time, a pistol to his breast, that he should surrender to him a deed of his farm though it was worth far more than the debt. This I designated by the term which any body would apply to the transaction. The honorable Senator does not deny the analogy or the justice of the view which I took in reference to private individuals. I know that he would be the last man who would undertake to justify such an attempt to despoil his neighbor.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to say that I understood the Senator from Michigan as denying the analogy.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The Senator from Michigan is present; he can answer for himself.

Mr. CASS.—I did say, the honorable Senator will recollect, that I considered the analogy to be false—I use the term logically and not in its ethical sense. I said analogies were dangerous things.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Well, "analogies are dangerous things." Let us see now how the matter stands, and wherein this analogy is false. The President said that he was constrained to give up the idea of negotiating, and that more forces must be sent in order to compel them to sign a treaty ceding to us New Mexico and California. The Mexicans owed us money for certain claims held by our citizens, the amount of which was admitted to be vastly below the value of the territory demanded. Here, then, is the case of a nation demanding a cession of territory which is worth much more than the debt due to that nation, and demanding it at the mouth of the cannon—"coercing" acquiescence, to use the language of the President. Now what is the reply of the Senator from Michigan? The only answer is, that nations are not like individuals, that there is no reasoning by analogy from the case which I have put of the individual, to that of a nation! Why not? The honorable Senator says because an individual is answerable to a tribunal or an umpire, and that a nation is not. Let us look a little into this matter. The private individual does not commit highway robbery because forsooth there is a court which will punish him, while a nation is responsible to no human tribunal—to no umpire, and therefore the analogy, as the honorable Senator says, is "false." Now is this true? Is it true that statesmen legislating for a nation are answerable to no tribunal? I thought there was such a thing as the law of nations—a code recognized by all the civilized world, by which the conduct of nations is governed—I thought that statesmen legislating for a nation were as much bound by rules of morality—were as much bound to observe integrity of conduct in acting for the nation as in acting individually. I imagined that honor was worth as much to a nation as land or money, and as I would not despoil my neighbor of his property, so I would not place my country in a position to be accused of a similar act. But the honorable Senator who would scorn to do this in his private capacity, justifies it as the act of a nation! Is there no such thing to govern us as conscience when acting as public men? How will the honorable Senator satisfy his own heart when it charges him with co-operating with him in an act which will produce the stain of lowering the character of a nation? If that heart should hereafter reproach him with injustice, and swell with remorse, he may follow the advice of the fool to Lear, "Cry to it uncle, as the cockney did to the eels, when she put them in the paste alive; she rapped 'em o' the coxcombs with a stick, and cry'd, 'down, wantons, down!'" He may stifle his conscience in that way, if he can.

Mr. President, I have felt warmly on this subject because the honor of my country is as dear to me as my own individual honor. I would do nothing that was calculated to tarnish it; on the contrary, I would do every thing to sustain that high character for integrity and morality which was sustained so nobly by the fathers of the republic. I regard that as of more value than would be all the wealth of the mines of Golconda, and all the military glory which could be gained for centuries to come.

There are many other points to which I would be glad to advert, but the lateness of the hour, admonishes me that I should no longer trespass upon the patience of the Senate.

Mr. CASS.—I really was not aware, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator from Delaware considered any remarks from me upon the subject of Santa Anna's return, as a matter of the least importance. The President himself, in his message, had placed that question, I thought, upon impregnable grounds. If he had not done so, the Senator from Delaware was as capable as any other person of showing the failure. This he has not done. I will observe, however, sir, for the consolation of the honorable Senator, and of all who have made the return of Santa Anna a peculiar cause of grief, that he has proved himself for the best Mexican general for us that could possibly have been selected; and that if he had been nominated to the Senate, and we had foreseen the result, he would have been confirmed unanimously. He has been defeated in every battle he fought, lost every place he attempted to hold, and is now a wanderer, without power or influence, having seen his country overrun, its armies dispersed, its government a fugitive, and a large portion of its population reduced to subjection. I do not believe that another Mexican general could have been found who would have lost more battles, abandoned more positions, or fled with more ignominies.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I only wish to say in reply to the gentleman that Santa Anna has proved himself beyond all doubt to be the best General for them that the Mexicans could have had. The fact that he was defeated by such men as Taylor and Scott is no proof that he was not the best of the Mexican Generals. Sir, who else could have rallied the thousands of Mexicans who marched under his banner? Who, since he has disappeared from the theatre of action in Mexico, has been able to rally a single regiment? No man. And now, when we hear to-night for the first time, that troops are again about to be raised, we find Santa Anna is the man who is marshalling them for battle. Sir, if he had not been admitted into Mexico no one can doubt or deny that we could have marched to the capital without the sacrifice of thousands of lives which we have been compelled to undergo. If he had not been admitted into Mexico, the battle of Buena Vista would not have been fought; and no other man could have raised the army which met us at Cerro Gordo—at Molino del Rey—at Chepultepec—and at the gates of Mexico itself. Sir, upon the head of the President of the United States falls justly the blame of this act. We have heard much of aiding and abetting the Mexicans, of moral treason, and of giving aid and comfort to the enemy, but if a private individual had done that which the President acknowledges he has done in a public capacity, how would he have been called to answer it?

Mr. FOOTE.—May I ask a question? Does the honorable Senator mean to say that the President intended to give aid and comfort to the enemy?

Mr. CLAYTON.—Not at all! I say that having done this act he has, as Talleyrand would have said, been "guilty of a blunder that is greater than a crime."

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I dislike to detain the Senate at this late hour; but since the Senator from Delaware has re-opened the whole debate by his grave charges, I will say a few words in reply.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I spoke at the earliest moment I could get the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I have no doubt of it, and I too speak at the earliest moment I can get an opportunity, and I am resolved that this debate shall not be terminated without a refutation of the grave charges which the Senator from Delaware has preferred against the administration. I ask in what sense the admission of Santa Anna was improper? Was not every Mexican then out of Mexico freely admitted into that country if he desired to return? You had a blockade against the admission of munitions of war and merchandize, but had you any blockade against individuals? Every Mexican, Frenchman, or Spaniard, and citizen of every nation upon earth was permitted to enter that country. Will the Senator take the position, that whilst every other individual belonging to the Mexican nation was permitted to re-enter Mexico, Santa Anna should not have been permitted? I rather agree with the Senator from Mississippi in relation to this matter, that we should let them have the men they wanted to command their armies. Any General they chose to select that we might fight their best men. I much prefer that we can say we defeated their best General in every field, and that they cannot now say that had Santa Anna been there we could not have done it.

But, sir, there is another reason why I fully justify that act. I believe that it was not a blunder, but one of the wisest and most politic measures that has been adopted by the administration in the prosecution of this war. I know that the time has not come for the development of all the facts, but enough has been disclosed to convince me of the policy of that act. We all know that Paredes was then at the head of the Mexican government, and that he obtained that position in consequence of an avowed hostility to the United States; that he represented the monarchical party, and that his success would have been the success of monarchical principles. They had thrust Herrera out for no other reason, than that he desired to make peace with us. We know also, from the best information, that Paredes was at the head of an army raised by himself—an army which he was able to pay every week, or every day, if necessary, in British gold—when at the same time he himself was known to be a bankrupt without a dollar. We know, upon the authority of British newspapers, that it was announced that the admission of Santa Anna, and the expulsion of Paredes, was the esteppel of a great movement in Mexico. We all recollect the tirade of abuse poured out in the Times and the Journal des Debats, of London and Paris, against Santa Anna, for preventing the consummation of this movement. What was this movement? It was, as I have said, got up for the purpose of establishing a monarchy in Mexico. Whether Santa Anna was there or not, there was to be war. If Paredes had continued at the head of affairs, you would have been engaged in a war backed by Europe; if Santa Anna was elevated to the chief authority, you would have a war under the direction of a man who could look for no sympathy beyond the limits of Mexico. There was the difference. The time will come, when the veil will be removed, and it will then be seen that the admission of Santa Anna was one of the wisest movements in the whole conduct of the war.

A word in relation to another charge brought against the administration, which is, the withdrawing the forces from General Taylor just before the battle of Buena Vista. Does the Senator expect that that charge will go forth to the world with our silent acquiescence? Does he not know that the administration did not withdraw a man from General Taylor—that the troops were withdrawn by General Scott himself, of his own volition, without any directions from the administration? The administration had no more to do with that measure than I had, if I am correctly informed. My recollection is distinct, that General Scott had discretionary power, and that this was his act, and not the act of the administration. Whenever any credit is to be claimed, the honorable Senator is ready enough to claim the credit for the generals employed in Mexico; but wherever blame is to be attached, he is as ready to throw it upon the administration.

Again, sir, as to the charge of not supplying General Scott with sufficient force. This is the first time that I have heard such a complaint. I know of one fact in regard to that campaign, in which, however, I ground no complaint, and it is this. General Scott discharged several thousand volunteers at Jalapa, long before their time of service expired, and then proceeded to Perote and Puebla, with the remainder of his troops. I know that he sent home two regiments from my own State, months before their term of service expired; and I now find it certainly very difficult to comprehend how it is that General Scott would have sent back these troops, who had distinguished themselves in the field, if he was in need of them, and could not have got along without them.

Now, a word or two upon this question of robbery. The honorable Senator from Delaware perseveres in his attempt to fix upon the supporters of this war his old charge of robbery, and repeats the parallel he has drawn before between this and the case of highway robbery. This charge, let us recollect, is urged by a Senator who has voted for the war from the beginning. He has voted for every war measure, I believe, but he says he turned against it as soon as he found it was a war of conquest. Pray how did he make that discovery? Did he find it in the President's message? If, so he had better examine the message again. The President informed us in his message of last session that he had taken possession of California and New Mexico, and recommended that provision be made for the establishment of civil government in those conquered provinces. He had better refer again to the message asking for the appropriation of three millions of dollars. Why did the President ask for that appropriation? He referred you to the case of the acquisition of Louisiana, in which money was required to be paid in advance, and also to the case of the purchase of Florida, and after referring to these cases illustrative of the grounds upon which he recommended the appropriation, he asked for three millions of dollars. Now, was not the demand of the Executive a clear notice of the intention of the administration to receive territory as a consequence of the prosecution of this war? and not only to receive territory, but to receive sufficient for indemnity, as well for the claims due to our citizens, as for all the expenses of the war? These facts were before us at the last session. Every Senator knew them, and the war bills were voted for, at the last session, with a full knowledge of these facts. Still we are told that because it is proposed to receive territory as indemnity, therefore it is a war of aggression. I repeat that it has been well known—it has been proclaimed in both Houses from the beginning—that the war was to bring territory as compensation or indemnity. I undertake to say that I do not believe that there is a Senator on this floor, nor a human being within the sound of my voice, who did not know the fact that it was intended from the time the war commenced that territory was to be acquired. And yet, though we all knew this—though the President told us so—though he asked for money to pay the first instalment in compensation for the territory so acquired, yet the changes are still rung on the charge that it has recently become a war of conquest.

The war was forced upon us by Mexico. It was just on our part, aggressive on hers. We tried to avoid it and to settle the difficulty by negotiation. Mexico made the attack, we repelled that attack and carried the war into the enemy's country, with a view of getting "indemnity for the past," and, if you please, "security for the future"—security that they never would commence war upon us again.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Did you get that security in the treaty?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—When the gentleman will show me a treaty of peace, I will examine it and tell him whether we have that security. But I am unable to comprehend upon what ground he affirms the immorality of this war. Such a charge, coming from a gentleman who has supported it from the beginning—who voted for it—who did not vote for it ignorantly—who knew at the time the war was declared that the Mexicans had attacked a detachment of our army, is, to say the least of it, very singular. The war was voted with a full knowledge of these facts. I have looked, sir, into the debate—indeed, I was present at the time that vote was given—and I was not able to find a man who doubted the propriety of that declaration, provided that the attack upon our troops was an authorized one. The democratic Senators were asked to pause in order to see whether the attack had been authorized by the Mexican government. And it was at that time that the honorable Senator from South Carolina drew his memorable and novel distinction between hostilities and a state of war. The objection to the preamble was, that it was doubtful whether war existed.—Still we are told that Senators have now found out for the first time that it is a war of conquest!

Mr. BAGBY.—I move that the Senate adjourn.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Oh! no.

Mr. BAGBY.—I will withdraw the motion provided this debate ceases; but I cannot consent to expose my health night after night by sitting under the influence of this gas, listening to a debate which has been already exhausted.

Mr. CAMERON.—I came here this morning determined to sit out the discussion.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is on adjournment.

The question was then taken with the following result:

Ayes	13
Noes	36

Majority against the motion 1

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then submitted the following motion:

"To recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to amend it by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"Provided, however, That the President shall not be authorized to nominate or appoint any officer of the army or navy, or to order any of the said officers, until it shall be satisfactorily ascertained that the pending negotiations with Mexico for securing a peace with that country, by treaty, have failed."

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Louisiana, Magnum, Pearce, Underwood, Upham, and Webster—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Cameron, Cass, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee.—28.

The motion was therefore not agreed to; and the question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—Had the question been taken upon this bill before any proceedings took place upon the treaty, I should have voted for it; and had the amendment which I had the honor to offer to-day been adopted, I should have voted for it, but I think that after the occurrences which have recently taken place, the matter is totally changed. A treaty has been agreed upon and a commissioner has been sent to Mexico, and we have reason to believe that the treaty will be ratified. These forces, therefore, will never be called into the field. The amendment which I offered was intended to prevent the President from appointing these four or five hundred officers, and raising the troops until actually required to be called into the field, which may never be the case, and thereby to save a useless expense of two or three millions of dollars. Under the present circumstances I cannot reconcile it with my sense of duty to vote for this bill.—

I have heretofore voted for all measures for the vigorous prosecution of the war, but the aspect of affairs is now materially changed. I would still have voted for the bill, however, if my amendment had prevailed, or if I could have had an assurance from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the President would not make these appointments until they were actually required. We have every reason to suppose that the treaty will be ratified, and besides that the power now exists to fill up the old regiments. I much regret the situation in which I am placed, in regard to this bill, but not having the assurances to which I have alluded, I cannot give my vote for its passage.

Mr. BUTLER.—I am very far from submitting to those who have made an arbitrary rule for deciding this matter without debate, and I now take leave to ask of the chairmain of the Committee on Military Affairs, certain questions to which I expect to receive answers.

Mr. CASS.—I do not feel disposed to answer questions.

Mr. BUTLER.—Well, if the Senator is not able to answer the questions———

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope the honorable Senator will ask me the questions that he proposes to ask.

Mr. BUTLER.—I intend to ask them.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator from Michigan does not, I will answer the questions for the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER.—I fear my friend will answer them too well. I ask the chairman of the committee on Military Affairs, whether it is the intention of the President, if this bill passes, immediately to appoint the officers?

Mr. CASS.—I have not the least objection to answer the question.—I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER.—That is not a very definite answer!

Mr. FOOTE.—If the honorable Senator will allow me to answer him, I will remind him that the Senator from Ohio, on the day before yesterday, in anticipation of all such questions, declared that if there was a prospect of peace, the troops would not march, and if there was a prospect of war, they would.

Mr. BUTLER.—I am not answered yet. The Senator from Michigan knows nothing on the subject?—

Mr. CASS.—I will observe that I sometime ago had a conversation with the President respecting the proposition to make this bill not absolute but discretionary; allowing him to determine whether the force should be raised or not. He thought the suggestion a proper one.

Mr. BUTLER.—I believe that the Senator has answered the inquiry in a kind spirit, although the answer does not altogether satisfy me of the propriety of passing this bill; I am willing, however, to leave it with the House of Representatives to determine. But I must ask another question. Is it the intention of the President to appoint any general officers under this bill, as was done under the bill of last year?

Mr. CASS.—This bill does not provide for them.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not say they were appointed under the provisions of that bill, but there were general officers appointed: two brigadier generals and four major generals. I only inquire the opinion of the Senator as a military man.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator is entirely welcome to my individual opinion.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask the honorable Senator from Michigan, as the organ of the administration, whether it is the purpose to add other general officers to those already appointed, for the purpose of fulfilling what we must suppose to be the demands of the service.

Mr. CASS.—I do not know; but it is my private opinion that additional general officers will not be wanted.

Mr. BUTLER.—I believe the honorable Senator has answered fairly. He says he does not know whether it be the intention of the President to appoint these officers immediately or not.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator indulge me a moment? I have had no confidential communication on the subject, yet I feel authorized to state one fact.

Mr. BUTLER.—What is that?

Mr. FOOTE.—There was a meeting of the members of this body who are favorable to the passage of this bill, and the understanding arrived at was that there was to be no appointments made unless there was, an actual necessity for the troops to be despatched to the field, and I do hope that that meeting, caucus, or whatever it may be called, will unite in enforcing upon the President this determination.

Mr. BUTLER.—These are assurances which in some measure relieve me from the apprehensions which I have entertained. I could have preferred however that the bill should have been recommitted, and a clause embracing such a provision introduced as a proviso to the bill. A majority here however has declined to recommit the bill with a view to amend it, and we must therefore take it, I suppose, according to the provision it contains, and pass it subject to the discretion of the President. There are contingences under which I would put these troops at the disposal of the President unhesitatingly, for even if it be determined to withdraw the array to a line of defence, I am strongly inclined to the opinion that the number of troops that we have in Mexico at present is not sufficient. It appeared to me to be a criminal disregard of human life, to send only about ten thousand men under General Scott to invade an empire, with a population of eight millions. I thought it criminal, sir, a rash reliance upon the gallantry, skill, and patriotism of our citizen soldiers, which no government on earth had a right to expect from its people. Success however has vindicated the course of the administration, success I repeat has vindicated the act, and averted the force of that indignation which would, had the result been otherwise, have deservedly fallen upon the administration. But whether that success depended on the wisdom of the measures which they devised, or upon the gallantry and intrepidity of the officers and men who performed the work is a question which I leave to others to determine.

Mr. CLAYTON.—A few words in reply to the Senator from Illinois. He has undertaken to defend the conduct of the President in admitting Santa Anna into Mexico: first, upon an allegation of his own, that at that time, it was customary to admit Mexicans into Mexico without any restriction. Sir, this is new to me. I do not believe it. It is impossible that flagrante bello—after war was declared—there could have been a standing order for their admission. Does the gentleman mean that?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I mean only what I said. I said not a word about orders; but I ask the gentleman to show me an order prohibiting the entrance of Mexicans into that country even after the commencement of the war. What I said was, that there was a blockade against the introduction of munitions of war, merchandize, &c., but not against individuals; and I refer the gentleman to the fact that there was continual passing and repassing between Cuba and Mexico.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Well now, what answer is that? Why was a pass given if every one had a right to enter the country? and whoever heard before that, flagrante bello, any and every person might pass. Sir, the construction put upon the matter by the President was the right one; if it were necessary for Santa Anna to enter Mexico, it was necessary for the Secretary of the Navy to give him a pass.

The gentleman will recollect the great noise that was made by our government in consequence of Paredes being smuggled into Mexico in an English vessel. I do not choose to dwell upon this. But the gentleman says, and it is the first time I ever heard it, that the President did a most praiseworthy thing in passing Santa Anna into Mexico, because, at that time, Paredes was at the head of a monarchical party, and that the admission of Santa Anna was the means of displacing him. Why, what manner of reasoning is that? Did the President prefer to go to war with a republican party instead of a monarchical one? Do our republican institutions teach us such doctrines as these? If Paredes was at the head of the monarchical party, he was the very man for us to put down. With regard to the employment of British gold I undertake to say, that if such had really been the case and the fact had become known in this country it would have had the effect of uniting the people as one man. The President would have required no better circumstance than that a foreign government was sustaining the Mexicans to enable him to procure the instant and unreserved co-operation of every man in the country.

But to come to the real merits of the case. Who ever heard before that Paredes would have been a more formidable antagonist than Santa Anna? Does any man suppose that forty such as Paredes could have rallied as great a force as Santa Anna? He could collect thousands where others would fail to collect hundreds. But I must advert briefly to one or two other points in reference to which the Senator from Illinois has spoken—I have complained that the troops under General Taylor's command were withdrawn in the face of an enemy of four times their number, thus jeoparding his safety and compelling him to fight against vastly superior numbers. I complained that that withdrawal was an act of the administration. The gentleman tells me in reply that the administration is not censurable for this, but that General Scott is alone answerable. And in proof of his position the honorable Senator tells me that he has seen nothing in the public prints to justify the charge that the war department or the administration had done more than appoint General Scott general-in-chief over the army; giving him the general power to act in this matter as he pleased. Now I imagine that if there was nothing more, if the administration gave him this general power, the administration is responsible for his acts. The honorable Senator cannot screen the administration by any ingenuity of his from censure, if censure is to fall any where, because General Scott, in pursuance of power expressly conferred upon him, ordered the withdrawal. But I think that the honorable Senator will find by reference to the documents that the facts are that the administration distinctly understood before General Scott went to Mexico that he was to do this, and that it was indispensably necessary to his success in that great campaign which he was to wage. Where was he to get an army sufficient for the purpose which he had to accomplish? How could he have avoided doing this? Is it supposed that he was to go without these troops; was this idea entertained by the Secretary of War? No: I make no such accusation. And does any man doubt that the whole plan of the campaign was settled here? Does any man doubt that before General Scott left this city it was perfectly understood that he was to receive from General Taylor the forces with which he was to capture Vera Cruz. I do not charge upon the administration the absurdity of ordering General Scott to take Vera Cruz without troops.

The honorable Senator also condescends to reply to another part of my remarks. I have said that General Scott complained that he was left a long time without sufficient troops at Puebla. This the honorable Senator tells me, cannot be so, because General Scott discharged a great number of volunteers before their time of service expired—th s proving that he had sufficient force to enable him to take the city of Mexico without them. Now I believe every body knows the reason why he discharged these volunteers. They were men whose term of service had nearly expired, and it would have expired before they could possibly be made serviceable, and they had refused to re-enlist. He informs the government that he found it would be better under such circumstances, to save the trouble and expense of feeding them any longer, by allowing them to go home, but at that moment, their services and the services of many more were requiste in order to carry on the war with success.

Next the Senator from Illinois, tells me that I must stop complaining, that this war, is a war of aggression and conquest, because, forsooth, he says I voted for the war, and for supplies, after the war was begun. I thought that every body here, and the honorable Senator says he was present in the chamber at the time the vote was given. I thought that every body who heard that vote, distinctly understood my position. We had debated the bill from day to day, denying the truth of the preamble, and insisting on striking out that which we did not believe. If the Senator was here, he heard us on this side implore Senators on the other side, to permit us to divide the bill from the preamble during the war, and heard, when at last the vote was given, many Senators give their votes in these words—"Aye, without the preamble." He must have known, also, that we not only denied the truth of the preamble, but all appealed to the justice and magnanimity of gentleman on the other side, to permit us to divide the bill so as to vote for the supplies, which we believed to be necessary to rescue our army, without voting a proposition declaring war to exist by the act of Mexico which we did not believe. Under these circumstances it was, that we voted fifty thousand men, and ten millions of dollars supplies to our army in peril. But does not the honorable Senator, if he was present, well remember that after our appeal to the other side, Senators on that side rose and said to us, "we agree that you shall protest against the preamble, and you may enter your protest upon the journal of the Senate—at any rate, you shall be understood as voting for the supplies." The Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Mississippi, the lamented Mr. SPEIGHT, came forward and publicly entered into this understanding with us. Let the honorable Senator look back to the debate of that day. I will speak for itself, however loosely and lamely it may have been reported, as I recollect was the case with the remarks which I then made. In regard to supplies, I have always voted for them, and have differed in this respect from some of my friends on this side, whom I have endeavoured to induce to take the same view that I did. And even now I would vote all necessary supplies. I am anxious to sustain the honor of the army as any man, but the new position which the President takes, and which the honorable Senator denies to be a new position, puts it out of my power to vote for this bill. The Senator says that the same position existed formerly. I am surprised! Why it was declared by the President on all former occasions that it was not the purpose of the administration to make this a war of conquest. Had I not a right to believe this? But the gentleman says that the three million bill indicated conquest. Sir, there is nothing like it, there is nothing about territory in that bill; it is an appropriation of three millions of dollars, to effect a speedy and honorable peace; that is the language of the bill, it is not stated that the object was to acquire territory by conquest. No, sir, it was not announced until the commencement of this session that territory was to be acquired by any such means.

I regret the necessity for troubling the Senate so long, for I know that the patience of Senators is exhausted; but I desire now to make one remark upon the merits of the bill. We are now, if we pass this and the volunteer bill, to send thirty thousand men to Mexico, in addition to those already there; and this large army is to be raised during an armistice with a country with which we have been treating, towards whom we have been holding out an idea that we desire peace. What will be the effect of such a measure upon them? What would be the effect upon any nation in Christendom, which, when negotiating with another nation, should see that nation deliberately raising thirty thousand more troops. Would not such a raising of troops, pending an armistice, occasion the immediate breaking up of all negotiations. It would be looked upon as a deliberate insult; it would be regarded as an attempt to accomplish that by bravado—by menace—which could not be obtained by argument and fair discussion.

Mr. FOOTE.—I would ask whether it was not a wing Senator who declared that it was our duty to advance with the sword in one hand, and the olive branch in the other?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman who made that declaration is well able to answer for himself. I thank the Senate for the patience with which they have heard the remarks which I thought it necessary to submit.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—As the honorable Senator from Mississippi has alluded to me, I will, with the permission of the Senate, remark, that I did say that I believed this war was regarded as a lamentable and deplorable war, even by those who considered it justifiable and warrantable, and that I thought that it would be highly becoming in this republic to adopt a course characterized by magnanimity, and to offer, after every blow that might be struck, terms of peace. I never found fault with too much solicitude to make peace.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The Senate need not be apprehensive that I shall detain them long. I wish merely to say, that it is true that the honorable Senator from Delaware protested against the preamble to the bill; but the debate shows, and I have read it recently, that the ground of the protest was, that they did not believe that war existed at all, it being doubtful whether Mexico had authorized the attack which had been made by the Mexican troops upon our army.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I beg leave to say, that the Senator is entirely mistaken, as he will find by inquiring of any Senator who was in this chamber at the time war was declared.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Well, I leave it there. Now in regard to General Scott sending home the volunteers whom he discharged, previous to the expiration of their period of service. I did not say that he had enough of force, for I do not know the fact; but I do know that he sent them back, and I know they refused to re-volunteer; and why? because they were required to re-volunteer for the war, instead of for the expedition to the city of Mexico. Now, in regard to withdrawing the troops from General Taylor, I fear the honorable Senator will not only find it difficult to night, but at any time hereafter, to show that it was the act of the administration, or that the administration ordered General Scott to withdraw them. On the contrary, General Scott being the superior officer in command, took the responsibility of withdrawing those troops. And now, as to the question where he was to get troops if he did not take those. Before the battle of Monterey, General Taylor had something like 16,000 troops; of these he left at least two-thirds inactive, whilst he proceeded to capture the town of Monterey with the remainder. General Scott went down to Mexico as commander in chief of the army; and the withdrawal of these troops was his act. If the gentleman supposed it would reflect any glory upon General Scott, he would have attributed the act to him, there is no doubt. But here is the difficulty. General Scott and General Taylor must both be praised and exalted at the expense of the administration. Their faults, if any there be, must be charged upon the administration, whilst the merit of their proceedings in the prosecution of the war rest wholly with themselves. One general must be played off against the other for political purposes, and the administration be made responsible for their blunders, if there be any, in this Presidential campaign! If gentlemen can succeed in this game, I have no doubt they will make considerable political capital.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I desire in justice to General Scott to state a fact, and to ask the Senator from Illinois if it be not so. If I am correctly informed, the time of service of these volunteers would have expired in a month and a half or thereabouts. Does the Senator know the time when these troops would have been discharged by the terms of their enlistment?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I do not know precisely, but I am under the impression that their time would have expired in July. I know this, however, that the men were willing to go on to the city of Mexico.

Mr. CLAYTON.—What authority had General Scott to enlist these troops for six weeks, or till they entered Mexico?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—None at all; but the Senator will perceive that my position remains altogether untouched. I have shown that General Scott, on his own authority, voluntarily discharged these troops at the very time when the Senator represents him as being compelled to weaken General Taylor's column in consequence of not receiving reinforcements from the War Department.

Mr. NILES.—I rise, sir, to thank the gentlemen who have occupied the attention of the Senate this evening. The subject is so entirely fresh and novel that I might have voted with a great deal of difficulty had it not been for the able arguments which we have heard this evening, by which I have been so much enlightened that I think I can now vote with a tolerably safe conscience! Now, if I receive an answer to one question which I desire to ask I shall be entirely satisfied. I do not know what Senator I had better ask; perhaps the honorable Senator from Delaware will do as well as any other. I enquire then, whether in his conscience he believes it is the destiny of this country, ultimately, to swallow all Mexico or not?

Mr. CLAYTON, (jocularly.)—It depends upon what the people shall do at the Presidential election next fall. That election will answer the Senator fully. Let him wait till that event.

Mr. CASS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Cameron, Cass, Dix, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—28

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Greene, Huntington, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Phelps, Underwood, Upham, and Webster—19

So it was,

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. BREESE submitted an additional document in relation to the claim of Emeline Owens, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after a short time spent therein, the doors were again opened.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE HARBOR AT PORT PONTCHARTRAIN.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the harbor at Port Pontchartrain, in the State of Louisiana.

THE HEIRS OF JOHN PAUL JONES.

Mr. BRADBURY called up the motion to re-consider the vote whereby the Senate concurred with the House in its amendments to the bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones, and said: I have been desired by Senators to withdraw the motion for reconsideration, and I therefore propose to call attention to the bill, and then to take such course as shall be found in accordance with the general sense of the Senate. A bill similar in its provisions, passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, and then failed in consequence of being accidentally lost on the last night of the session, on its way from the desk of the Secretary to the room where the President was engaged in the approval of bills. It was not found until the next day, when it was too late to receive the signature of the President. This bill was introduced into the Senate during the first week of the present session, and passed without discussion or reference. It came back from the House by reason of amendments made in that body, not affecting the merits of the bill, which were adopted in concurrence, without notice or division. Since it has been before the Senate, I have examined with some attention the character of the claim. The first section of the bill makes provision for the adjustment of certain balances claimed by Commodore Jones, as due to him from the United States, which I think are equitably due, and ought therefore to be paid. The second section presents a different question. It provides for the payment for the prizes captured from the British by the fleet under the command of Commodore Jones, in 1779, and sent into Bergen —a neutral port, under the dominion of Denmark—which were taken from the captors by the orders of that government, and delivered up to the British authorities. Demand was made upon Denmark, on behalf of the captors, for compensation. That government offered to pay £10,000 in satisfaction, but the offer was declined as inadequate. The claim was treated as a claim of the captors by Dr. Franklin, our minister at Paris, by Mr. Jefferson, his successor, and by Commodore Jones himself. Denmark has never made satisfaction; nor has the claim ever been assumed, cancelled, or abandoned by our government. And I submit that the precedent will be a dangerous one, for the United States to assume the payment of the claims of its citizens upon foreign governments, before satisfaction is obtained, or because they have not succeeded in obtaining it. This, in short, is my view of the subject, for I do not propose to discuss the questions involved. The bill under consideration has passed the stage in which it is amendable. The second section cannot be reached without defeating the bill. I now propose to submit the disposal of the question to the Senate. If it is desired, I will ask a vote upon the motion to re-consider. If not—if it is, on the contrary, the general sense of the Senate, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed his strong disapprobation of the principles involved in this bill; but under the extraordinary circumstances, he supposed it was impossible that the motion should not be withdrawn. He protested against the precedent of this law as fatal to the treasury, if established as such, and said the bill was one of the strongest evidences of the recklessness of this government in regard to its expenditures.

Mr. PHELPS took a similar view of the subject; after which, upon leave of the Senate, the motion to re-consider was withdrawn.

DEATH OF THE HON. JOHN M. HOLLEY.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

MR PRESIDENT: I am directed to notify the Senate of the death of the Honorable JOHN M. HOLLEY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, and to communicate the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

The resolutions from the House of Representatives having been read—

Mr. DICKINSON rose and addressed the Senate as follows: This painful message, Mr. President, devolves on me the melancholy duty of paying a brief tribute to the virtues of the deceased, and of asking the Senate to unite in the customary ceremonies of respect for his memory. The fearful messenger Death has of late been no stranger in these halls. Eight times during the present session have the members of this Congress been called to put on the habiliments of mourning. Eight times have we thus been significantly admonished of the futile tenure by which we hold life and earthly honors. Three members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives since the last session of Congress—some at the meridian of manhood, and others full of years and honors—have been summoned to their final account. "The cup goes round, and who so artful as to put it by?"

JOHN M. HOLLEY, the lamented subject of this notice, was born at Salisbury, in the State of Connecticut, in November, 1802, and was educated at Yale, where he graduated with distinguished honors in 1822. Having chosen as his pursuit the legal profession, he spent one year in the celebrated law school of Mr. Gould, at Litchfield, in his native State, and then removed to the State of New York, where he completed the usual course of preparatory studies, and was admitted at the bar in 1825. He soon after opened an office in the village of Lyons, in the county of Wayne, where he acquired an extensive practice, and where he continued to reside until the time of his death. Besides filling various local offices of dignity and trust, he was chosen to represent his county in the assembly of his State in 1838, and again in 1841. In 1846, he was chosen to represent the 27th Congressional district, composed of the counties of Seneca and Wayne, in the 30th Congress, and was, at the time of his election, in the enjoyment of health which gave promise of a long life of usefulness and honor. But, about one year since, he was struck suddenly down with a fit of pulmonary apoplexy, from which he never fully recovered. Being desirous to discharge with fidelity his representative obligations, at the commencement of the present session, though exceedingly feeble and infirm, he repaired to the Capitol, and took part in the organization of the House, and yielded reluctantly to the advice of his physicians and friends, to seek relief in repose and a southern clime. Immediately after the opening of the session he proceeded to Jacksonville, in the State of Florida, where the genial influences of the climate seemed to revive him for a season, and his friends were flattered with the hope of his recovery. But a sudden return of the disease brought with it a fatal termination, and he expired on the 8th instant. He died conscious of the mighty change which awaited him, calm and resigned, in the hope of a glorious future. The companion of his life, who had accompanied him with that fidelity and affection known only to woman, was present at his bedside to smooth his dying pillow and close his eyes in death. She is now returning to her desolate home with all that is mortal of a beloved and faithful husband, to tell her children they are fatherless! Into that sanctuary of private grief I may not obtrude; for alas! how impotent is human consolation.

I had long known the deceased by reputation, and in 1838 was associated with him in the New York Legislature; and though in a different branch, I recollect full well how highly he was there esteemed by all who knew him. He was a citizen of pure morals and correct deportment, a successful and honorable member of the bar, a prudent and able legislator, and was especially beloved for his social and domestic virtues.

Thus lived and thus died JOHN M. HOLLEY, a member of the House of Representatives of the thirtieth Congress of the United States—cut off in the midst of his usefulness, leaving to his family, his friends, and his country, the priceless legacy of an unblemished name.

Mr. DICKINSON then submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the message from the House of Representatives announcing the death of the Honorable JOHN M. HOLLEY, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire to show on every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 20, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of the county of Penobscot, in Maine, praying the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or the removal of the seat of government; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. DOWNS presented a petition of citizens of Louisiana, praying the establishment of a judicial district north of Red river in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHLEY presented a petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a mail route from Raymond to Camden, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of E. P. Hastings, praying compensation for his services as pension agent for the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Amzy Judd, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BREESE, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Benjamin White, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of D. A. Watterston, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Columbus Alexander and Theodore Barnard, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of David Myerle, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John H. White, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William W. Wall, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Wall, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Charles Cappell, reported it without amendment.

SCHOOL LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill concerning school lands in the State of Florida, reported it with an amendment.

AMERICAN HEMP FOR THE USE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution to promote the purchase of American hemp for the use of the American navy, reported it with an amendment, so as to read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it will be advantageous to the public interest, to contract for or purchase any quantity not exceeding five [illegible] for the purchase of American hemp, suitable for the use of the United States navy, equal in the average to the best quality with the best imported hemp, and at a price not exceeding the average price of such hemp for the last five years; the hemp thus delivered to be at the place of purchase.

The Senate proceeded to consider said joint resolution, as in Committee of the Whole; and the amendment being agreed to, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the resolution be engrossed and read a third time.

EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate to provide additional examiners in the Patent Office and for other purposes, reported thereon, with a recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House.

Mr. WESTCOTT asked for the immediate consideration of the amendments. The question being about to be put upon concurring in the amendments—

Mr. TURNEY said he hoped the question would be divided and taken upon the first amendment separately. He believed that the salary of an examiner of patents was now some fifteen or eighteen hundred dollars, and he knew no good reason why it should be raised to twenty-five hundred. He thought that this was hardly an appropriate time for an increase of salaries when the country was involved in war, and had no superabundance of revenue to dispose of. He thought it would be proper to concur with this amendment to strike out the twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked that all the members of the committee were unanimous in disagreeing to the amendments of the House, with the exception of the first amendment, and a majority of the committee were in favor of disagreeing to that amendment. The bill as it originally passed the Senate, he said, gave to each of the examiners in the patent office a salary of twenty-five hundred dollars. The House amendment proposed to reduce it to two thousand. The fixing of the salary at twenty-five hundred dollars was on consultation with the commissioner, and those having business with the Patent Office considered it as a matter of the very first importance, as we are obliged to have men of the highest scientific attainments, and who are acquainted with the French and German languages. The Senate will perceive the necessity for an increase of salary when I state the fact, that within the last five years examiners who have received eighteen hundred dollars a year, finding that the salary was not commendation of the service required, and that they could make twice as much money by acting as agents, have resigned their offices. I think that the salary proposed is not too large, and I will mention the fact that the money does not come out of the treasury. The law provides that it shall be taken from the receipts of the Patent Office, and that office has already a fund of some seventy thousand dollars. I hope that the Senate will concur with the recommendation of the committee, and disagree with the amendments of the House.

Mr. DICKINSON.—This is simply a question of demand and supply. In my judgment a salary of twenty-five hundred dollars is necessary, for the reason that you cannot get competent men for a smaller salary. The office cannot be filled by mere politicians or mere clerks. The gentleman filling that office must be an encyclopædia of science, and though he may not be required to converse fluently in German and in French, it is necessary that he should be able to read those languages, because he is required to consult scientific works in the German and French languages, in order to determine whether an invention presented, is a new one. And he must be acquainted with chemistry, in all its details; in short, he must be qualified for one of the most learned professorships in our institutions of learning. Now, you cannot get men possessing these qualifications, for less than twenty-five hundred dollars a year. The number of such men is comparatively small; the demand is greater than the supply. You can get men to take the office for one thousand dollars a year; but you cannot get men who are qualified to discharge the duties for that sum. I am not for high salaries generally, but this is one of those cases which require liberal salaries.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—I do not know that I understand the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The bill originally proposed to give twenty-five hundred dollars a year to the examiners of the Patent Office. The House struck out twenty-five hundred and inserted two thousand. The committee proposes to disagree with this amendment of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Well, I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment. A salary of twenty-five hundred dollars is quite a low one. The duties are laborious, and they require men of high scientific attainments. I think that the examiners should have a higher salary than the Commissioner, as they have the whole of the labor to perform. I hope that the Senate will disagree with the amendment.

Mr. TURNEY.—Before the question is taken, I desire to say a single word.

Mr. ATHERTON.—As I perceive that the debate upon this bill is likely to continue, I would like to have it laid over until to-morrow, for it is very desirable that the Senate should proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations to supply the deficiencies for the current fiscal year.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON it was,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BADGER asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to declare the true intent and meaning, so far as respects the franking privilege of members of Congress, of the act approved the first of March, 1847, and of the act entitled "An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege; and for the prevention of frauds on the Post Office Department," passed the third of March, 1845; and for other purposes.

The bill having been read the first and second times, by unanimous consent—

Mr. BADGER.—I shall move a reference of this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; but before the question is put, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments, and particularly to call the attention of my friend, the chairman of that Committee, to one or two observations regarding the purposes intended to be accomplished by the bill, and the present state of the law to which it relates. It will be found by referring to the act passed on the 3d of March 1845, "to reduce the rates of postage," &c. that Congress at that time adopted an entirely new system, with regard to the franking privilege and placed it in the main upon different grounds from those which it previously occupied. The act of 1845 seems to be designed as a substitute for the former law upon the subject, and by implication to repeal it, and this implication is strengthened by the fact that the latter law expressly saves from repeal certain portions of the former. It will be found upon looking at the act of 1845, that the eighth section of it grants to members of the Senate and House of Representatives, delegates from territories, &c. the right to send and receive free of postage "any letter, newspaper, or packet" not exceeding two ounces in weight, during each session of Congress, and for thirty days before and after. The same section declares that they shall have the right "to frank written letters from themselves during the whole year, as now authorized by law." It is therefore clear and beyond controversy, that according to the provisions of the law of 1845, the franking privilege of members of the two houses during the session of Congress, and for thirty days before and after, consists in the power to send and receive free of postage, any letter, newspaper, or package, and that it is perfectly immaterial by whom directed, to whom addressed, or by whom written. There is but one single qualification, that the letter, newspaper, or package, shall not exceed two ounces in weight. If there could be any doubt in regard to the terms embraced in this part of the section, that doubt is removed by the clear distinction that is taken between this franking privilege, during the sessions of Congress, and thirty days before and after, and the franking privilege given for the residue of the year, which is confined to written letters from themselves. It is clear therefore that the act contemplated and declared that during the sessions, members of this house and the other should have the right to frank any letter, any newspaper, any package written or printed, no matter whether it was composed of paper or muslin, no matter by whom directed, by whom signed, with no exception, but the single qualification, that the letter, newspaper, or package should not exceed two ounces in weight. Now I apprehend there might have been in the minds of Congress, reasons for making this discrimination, and for the confining the franking privilege during the residue of the year to written letters from themselves. Whatever might have been the reason, or whether there was any, the distinction is clearly made.—Then, sir, at the last session, we passed an act which was reported by my friend the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, containing this provision, that members of Congress shall have power to receive, as well as to send—for it will be observed that under the act of '45 they had only the right to send their own letters in the intervening time between the sessions, but they shall have a right to receive as well as to send all letters and packages not weighing over two ounces free of postage, up to the 1st Monday of December following the expiration of their term of office. Now, sir, as far as I am able to perceive, it is not only probable—not only highly reasonable—but it is absolutely certain that as the law now stands, the franking privilege to members of Congress is subject to but one restriction; that is, that the letter, newspaper, or package, shall not exceed two ounces in weight. Well, sir, we are all aware that, recently, by some regulations, a discrimination has been made between packets put up in coarse envelopes, and which are not supposed to be letters, and those which are put up in fine envelopes, which are supposed to be letters; and in the latter case, it is required that the address shall be in the same hand as the frank, or else the postmaster is directed to disregard the frank and charge postage. This I consider to be simply a gratuitous distinction, adopted without any appearance of reason or propriety. The bill, therefore, which I have the honor to submit to the Senate, is intended, in the first place, to declare, so as to put it beyond the possibility of doubt or cavil, what is the law on the subject; not to enlarge or alter the franking privilege, but simply to declare it. I have brought the subject forward, sir, because I desire to have the judgment of the Senate upon it. I feel that members of this body are as much entitled to trust and confidence as any man in the Executive departments. We are personally responsible to our constituents for the abuse of our privileges; and we should not permit ourselves to be responsible to any executive officer whatever. If the rule requiring the address to be in the same hand as the frank applies to letters, why is it not applied to documents also?—the laws making no difference between them. The construction will, perhaps, affect me as little as it will any member. I have always endeavored to avoid putting myself or my friends in the power of any such capricious construction of the law relating to the franking privilege. I have directed every letter and document I have sent, at whatever trouble and inconveniences to myself.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

FEES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ASHLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed Clerks, Marshals and Attorneys of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives further to supply deficiences in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848.

The question pending being upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BENTON, to strike out the words "the Papal States," in line 84, and after "Ecuador," in line 86, insert "and for a minister plenipotentiary to the Papal States," and strike out "twenty-two" and insert "thirty-one"—

Mr. HALE.—I desire to ask the chairman of the committee from which this bill was reported, why this item is inserted among deficiencies of appropriations for the past year?

Mr. ATHERTON.—The fiscal year has not yet expired, and the object is, I suppose, to send the charge d'affairs, or minister, whichever he may be, before the conclusion of the year.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If I understand the effect of this amendment, it is to change the nature of the mission to Rome, from charge d'affairs, to minister plenipotentiary. I would suggest to those who are in favor of this amendment, whether it would not be better policy, instead of making this embassy a full one, to substitute a minister resident. We might, it seems to me, more properly send to Rome a minister resident with a salary such as that which is paid to our resident minister at Constantinople, and our minister in China. A minister resident has this advantage over a charge d'affairs, that whilst the charge cannot approach the sovereign, the minister resident can. The Senator from Missouri stated the other day, that one object in making this a full mission was, that it might ultimately absorb all the missions, or chargeships to the Italian states. Now we have a very considerable commerce with the Italian states, and in that commerce, American shipping is principally employed. In the dominions of Austria—a country which contains upwards of thirty millions of people, we have but a charge d'affairs. We have nothing but a charge in Portugal, and the same in Belgium. We have considerable commerce with these countries, and it is all in our favor. The temporal power of the Pope is very limited, and of course, as correctly stated by the Senator from North Carolina, it is only in the character of a temporal prince, that a diplomatic agent could be sent by us to the sovereign Pontiff.

In making this suggestion, I wish it to be understood, that I am incapable of being governed by any thing like religious or sectarian feelings. Surely I entertain no prejudice against the Catholic religion, when, on the contrary, I regard it with the highest veneration, looking upon it as I do, as the casket which held through many a long age of persecution and blood, the gem of the Christian faith—holding as I do, too, sir, in the highest possible reverence, the character of the present Pontiff, Pius the Ninth. It has been said by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who made some very eloquent and appropriate remarks upon this subject the other day, that it would be becoming in us to send a full minister to Rome, which was surrounded by such grand associations. I put this question, however, upon principle, and there is another power which has, I think, stronger claims to a full embassy. I allude to Switzerland, where now in some of the Cantons exists the only pure democracy which is now to be found on the face of Europe. It would be a higher compliment to our own people—to our own institutions—to send an embassy to Switzerland. Ancient Rome, and modern Rome, are essentially different. It is true, that as the Senator says, Rome still stands upon the banks of the Tiber, yet modern Rome does not occupy the site of that Rome of the elder ages of the world, which must ever possess the highest interest to the imagination and feelings. The modern city occupies the opposite bank, and is separated by the classic stream from the soil on which the Coliseum and the Pantheon stood. All is now a "marble wilderness," where Tully once "launched his moral thunders on the subject soul;" and where the accursed steel of the assassin Brutus, struck at the heart of Cæsar. But, sir, these are not considerations which are now to weigh with us.

I submit to the Senate as a question of expediency, what must be the effect upon Belgium, Portugal, Austria, and the other Italian states if we send a full embassy to Rome? For we all know, whatever may be the progress of liberal principles, in Italy, at this moment, the most despotic governments that ever existed, have prevailed there for the last five hundred years.

Mr. MANGUM.—Do I understand the Senator as offering an amendment.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I propose to strike out what relates to the mission to the Papal states, and substitute a section providing for a minister resident.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senators object can be accomplished by striking out "plenipotentiary" and inserting "resident," and striking out "thirty one" and inserting "twenty eight."

The question being taken upon this amendment to the amendment it was disagreed to on a division, Ayes 12, Noes 19. The question recurring on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.—

Mr. HANNEGAN demanded the yeas and nays.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—They were ordered at a a former day.

Mr. CLAYTON.—This bill came to us from the House proposing to send a Charge d'Affaires to the Papal states. The Committee on Finance to which the bill was referred, has reputed the bill as it came from the House without amendments, thus recommending the establishment of this new mission. Such was the judgment of the committee of which I was a member. I concurred in the report, and I see no reason whatever to change it. It seems to me, sir, to be admitted on all hands, that there is nothing in the commercial relations between the two countries to justify any mission whatever, but in my judgment, there is enough connection between the social and political relations of the countries, to authorize it. I have been willing therefore to establish this mission of a charge to the Papal states, but it does seem to me that there is serious objection to going further. Austria is a country with thirty eight millions of people with whom we have extensive commercial relations, and we send to them only a charge d'affaires. We have also extensive commercial relations with some other of the Italian states, with Portugal, with Sweden, with Denmark and to all these we send only a charge d'affaires. I cannot perceive, sir, the necessity therefore of going beyond that grade of ministers which we are accustomed to send to these states. I am perfectly willing, sir, to mark by my vote the sympathy that is felt by the people of this country, for the liberality of the opinions of Pope Pius the IX. I am perfectly willing to go thus far, and in my opinion all that ought to be asked of us is to place these states upon the same footing with the great empire of Austria, the second and most populous of all the states of Europe. And honorable Senators will bear it in mind, that if we proceed to make a full mission now to the Papal states, we may excite bad feelings among the other states whose commercial relations with us are vastly more extensive, than those of the Papal states can be, and to which we now send, and shall probably continue to send charges d'affaires. I am therefore opposed to the amendment, and shall support the bill as it was sent to us from the house, and as reported by the committee on Finance.

Mr. NILES.—This is only one of the missions that are provided for in this bill; there are three others, making altogether four missions to be provided for. As to the policy which has led to this measure, it certainly cannot be owing to the surplus of funds in our treasury. There are, however, four missions to be created—one to Guatimala, one to the Republic of Bolivia, and one to Ecuador. Two of these, I believe, have little or no commerce with us, and whether the mission be political or commercial—what considerations are to recommend them to the favorable action of the Senate, I am not prepared to say. If I believed that they were commercial, that they were calculated in the least degree to promote or extend our commerce, I should be in favor of their establishment. But I believe there is no people on the whole earth, as commercial as we are, whose commercial interests are so little aided by the government as those of the United States. I believe it will be our true policy, and I have long thought so, to furnish to the different countries of this hemisphere commercial agents; for I believe that our commercial interests have been shamefully neglected. Our trade has been declining from year to year, with many of those countries. One of the countries upon this hemisphere with which we have held diplomatic relations—I mean the republic of New Grenada—we have so neglected—for although we have had a charge d'affaires there for years—he has neglected his duty. We have no treaty with that government, and those who have no treaty with them, have to pay twenty per cent. upon their whole trade, which in our case amounted about ten millions of dollars; and the consequence has been the throwing of all this into the hands of our rivals, the British. Two vessels from the port of New York carried on a trade with that country for years, under the flag of Great Britain—a sort of smuggling trade. So entirely was this matter neglected, that our commerce with that country ceased altogether.

Now, I should like to know, if I could, how these missions are to be carried out? How the law is to be executed? Whether men qualified and prepared for the duties which they are required to perform are to be sent there to make themselves useful to our commerce, or whether men will be sent who neither know what their duties are, nor care whether they are performed—mere politicians, stump orators, who are to be rewarded with places for political services. It would be throwing so much money away, and I should be disposed to go against the whole of these missions; but believing that the interests of this country will fully justify the attempt to send missions into these countries, I shall vote for the bill, though at the same time not without very great doubt that it will be money thrown away. But in regard to the mission to the Papal States, I must say that I do not see any sufficient reason for sending an agent there above the second grade. It seems to me that is going far enough to begin with, and if our interests there should hereafter render it necessary to have a diplomatic agent of a higher grade, such a mission can be provided for. Heretofore it has not been deemed necessary to maintain political relations at all with those States, and it seems to me that an agent of the second grade is high enough to begin with. I do not think that his Holiness, the Pope, has any great claim upon this country in any view. The country is a small one, and there are larger in which we have more important interests, and in which are nothing more than charges d'affaires. I shall vote for these missions of the second grade, and I shall do it with very great doubts that the money will be thrown away.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I was in hopes that my friend from Connecticut, after making a speech against this item of the bill, would have moved to strike it out; but I understand him to say that he will vote for it. I do not know that I am prepared to say that the item ought to be stricken out. I am prepared to say, however, that it demands some explanation at the hands of those who bring it before us. What is this bill? It is not one of the regular appropriation bills. It is a bill for supplying the deficiencies of appropriations for the fiscal year. Four missions then were forgotten in the general appropriation bills. Four missions were left unprovided to by those who made the estimates for the year, and by us who looked into the subject. Now, sir, the title of this bill is probably a misnomer. This is a creation of four new missions at the places which are named in the item which is under consideration. And now we are not quite content it appears to have these chargeships filled; we are not satisfied to establish the second grade of missions, but there is now a motion before us to raise one of them to the rank of minister plenipotentiary. And for what purpose is this minister to the United States! To what end? Why, I think it is sufficiently obvious from what has been said, that it is a mere complimentary thing. It is well understood that there is no commerce, no trade or intercourse with those States which demand, as a matter of business, any notice at all. Will you send out a mission which is a mere complimentary mission? The objection I have to it is, in the first place, that a compliment of that nature is wholly unnecessary. It is not demanded by any circumstances which exist, and it is introducing decidedly a bad precedent. There is a constant effort made to raise the grade of our foreign ministers every where. I think it was only at the last session that we had laid upon our table, a long argument by somebody in which the writer attempted to prove that the interests of this country were sacrificed in reducing the mission to Austria from a plenipotentiary to a charges d' affaires, and we were called upon to restore the mission to its former rank. The arguments however failed to prevail, and our minister remained there in his new capacity, although, I believe, a threat had been thrown out that he would resign.

Now what I desire to know is, how any such emergency has sprung up at this time, as to make it necessary to introduce here four new missions to foreign governments. I desire to know, sir, whether there be anything new in the relations between us and the countries named, anything that has occurred since we were last together, to make it necessary to legislate in this special way upon this subject. I should be very thankful to the chairman of the committee for a little information upon several other points in this bill. I should be glad to know why it becomes necessary to legislate to such an extent, as this bill seems to imply, to supply deficiencies—in other words, how it happens that the estimates which were made to carry us through the year, when we were together at the last session, happened to prove so utterly inadequate for the objects for which they were intended? I should be glad to know how it happened? I can remember very well that it was said on this floor when those estimates were under discussion, that they were inadequate, that they would not carry the government through the year, from the 30th June, to the 30th June, but that you would come here and demand further appropriations in order to meet the ordinary expenditures. I would be glad to know how it happens that the officers of the government, whose duty it is to make the estimates—are always under such a great misapprehension in regard to the expenditures of particular departments of the government. We have a deficiency for example, in one branch of the army expenditures, of five millions of dollars, and in another of three or four millions. I would be glad to know how it happens that the estimates of a department where the business is so well understood, as in the Navy Department, can be so inaccurate as to fall short some eight or ten thousand dollars, for the pay of the clerks in that department. I find in this bill under the head of the army in the Quartermaster's department, an additional appropriation of five millions of dollars, to carry out the operations of that single department of the army. I find also in the department of clothing and subsistence three millions more are required to meet the expenditures of that department. I will not go into an examination of the various items of this bill, but I should be glad to hear from the chairman of the committee some explanation, and I should be glad to hear him state the amount of money which is proposed to be appropriated by this bill as it came from the House, and also the amount which it is proposed to add by the amendments which are to be inserted here.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The amount appropriated by the bill as it came from the House I believe is a little over thirteen millions of dollars.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I make it over fourteen millions.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I believe it will be found that the bill as it came from the House appropriates for the current fiscal year $13,237,166 98. There has been an appropriation already passed at the present session for the subsistence in kind of the regular army and the volunteers of one million of dollars, which makes the sum for deficiency in the whole over fourteen millions. As it regards the reason why the additional appropriations are required, I can only say that they arose probably from the military operations costing more in some instances than they were expected to cost, from a larger number of troops having been called out and from the military operations having been more extensive than was anticipated when the original estimates were sent in: but all the estimates which are contained in this bill, with the addition of a few slight amendments were contained in the letter of the Secretary which was sent to the Senate at the commencement of the session, with the exception of the four millions which I have mentioned

Mr. HALE.—I do not know that I should make any remarks at all upon this amendment, as I intend to vote against the whole bill, on the ground that it contains appropriations for the prosecution of the war in Mexico. But I beg to call the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to the rather singular fact, that our expenditures have become so enormous, that a few "mistakes" in the calculations of the Treasury Department—a few mere slips of the pen, involve a larger amount than the whole annual expenditure during the administration of General Jackson. Then I believe the annual expenditure was about fourteen millions, and here we have a bill for supplying mere deficiencies which calls for nearly sixteen millions!

Mr. ATHERTON.—If the gentleman will spare me one moment, I would beg to remind him, that in the House a clause was added to the bill appropriating $800,000 for the service of the next year, which has nothing to do with the supply of the deficiency in the current year.

Mr. HALE.—Why, that is a very small matter indeed, when our expenses are a hundred millions annually! It appears, however, making the deduction which is now suggested, that according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the appropriations last year amounted to fifty-five millions, and that he expended fifty-nine millions; so that adding the amount involved in the present bill, the whole sum will be about seventy millions of dollars. Now, sir, during the last war with Great Britain, when we were fighting her on all our coasts, and our navy was gaining laurels on every sea on which we had commerce to be assailed and protected, our expenditure was only thirty-two millions.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator is mistaken as to one fact. This deficiency of ten millions is included in the estimate of expenditures of the current year, so that there are only four millions to be added, making the annual expenditure sixty millions.

Mr. HALE.—I have the documents before me. I see by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the appropriations of last year amounted to fifty-five millions; and here is an addition of fifteen millions more, not going into the estimates, but to supply deficiencies. Am I not right?

Mr. ATHERTON.—Does the Senator mean for the current fiscal year?

Mr. HALE.—The year ending 30th June.

Mr. ATHERTON.—In order to get at the amount of the expenditures for this year, the appropriations for the Post Office Department, and the deficiencies of last year must be deducted; and I believe the Senator will find that the result is as I have stated, about sixty millions.

Mr. HALE.—I have not gone into the details of this matter, but I have calculated the amount as I read the document. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that while it cost us about thirty millions a year to fight the most powerful nation on earth, along our whole coast from Eastport to New Orleans, and whilst our navy was victoriously engaged on every ocean where there was American commerce to be protected, even in the harbors of South America; it now costs us seventy millions of dollars, or sixty millions according to the explanation now given, to carry on this war with Mexico; and that the appropriations are increasing as has been insisted on by the Senator from Connecticut. I merely mention this as a somewhat significant fact. Bye the bye, I hope that when the Senator from Connecticut referred to the danger of appointing "stump orators" and hack politicians, to diplomatic stations, he had no reference to any late nominations which have been made!

But to come to the question before the Senate on the amendment. I confess that I have regarded the recommendation of the President, which has been seconded by the committee, to send a mission to the Papal States, with a great deal of interest and pleasure. I regard it as a sign of progress—as in some sort, the "bringing forth of fruits meet for repentance," that an administration, which for two years past, has been appealing to the lust of war and rapine, and been stimulating all that is brutal in humanity, has so far changed its policy, and is about to appeal to popular passion in a much less exceptionable manner. I have no doubt of the truth of what the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] has said, that this is a mere pandering to the Roman Catholic voters of this country. I ask my friend if it is not much more reasonable, and rational, and Christian to pander ——

Mr. FOOTE.—Am I to understand that the Senator from North Carolina has preferred so grave a charge?

Mr. HALE.—So I understand him.

Mr. FOOTE.—Did he say "pander?"

Mr. HALE.—If he did not say so, I will say so. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. FOOTE.—Does the Senator understand the term which he has employed?

Mr. HALE.—I have not got a dictionary at hand, and really make no pretensions to great lexicographical knowledge.

Mr. FOOTE.—Did the Senator ever hear of Pandarus?

Mr. HALE.—Oh! I will endeavor to meet the nice taste of the Senator. I will use another term. I will say that, it is fishing for Roman Catholic votes; and I certainly think that this is quite an improvement in the diplomacy of the last twenty-two months, so far as regards the neighboring republic of Mexico. But why should this minister be sent? It is admitted on all hands that we have no commercial interests to be protected in the Papal States. It is designed merely as a compliment to the Pope. Well, if compliment be intended, why not extend it to San Marino, which, amid the changing destinies of Italy, has maintained its republican institutions for hundreds and hundreds of years? Why not first extend this compliment to that ancient republic instead of to the Pope of Rome? And if there be any pretence that we have there commercial interests which require protection, why not send a minister to Hayti, where there are large commercial interests to be protected, having just and well-founded claims on this government, and where our citizens cannot get even a hearing, because we have no accredited agent? It seems to me, sir, that there should be some uniform system adopted with regard to the appointment of our diplomatic agents abroad; and I certainly think that the emergency must be very pressing indeed, which requires the insertion of this proposition in a bill which I had supposed was what it purports to be, a measure for supplying deficiencies in the appropriations. The deficiency is, it appears to me, large enough without adding to it the expense involved in the establishing of this mission.

Mr. FOOTE.—I intend to trespass only a very few minutes on the time of the Senate, and I rise chiefly for the purpose of making some remarks in reference to the extraordinary charge brought against the administration by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. Far be it from me to accuse the Senator of any thing like plagiarism; but I do feel authorized to suggest that at least the laws of good taste were not duly considered in introducing, from any source whatever, however distinguished, such a sentiment as that which so signally deformed a portion of the speech which we have heard from him this morning. He has very loudly and fiercely preferred a serious charge against the administration. After good naturedly confessing that the explanation of his colleague in relation to fiscal deficiencies was so satisfactory that he was not able to show any thing to the contrary successfully, in a fit of desperate earnestness, he has undertaken to suggest—not originally, but by borrowing from the Senator from North Carolina—that this is an attempt on the part of the administration to pander to Catholic feeling—using a term which, in all languages, is recognized as coarse and vulgar. I did not hear the speech of the Senator from North Carolina, and until his silence disappointed me, I had hoped, that the ignoble attempt to excite sectarian feeling in opposition to this bill was original with the Senator from New Hampshire. But the significant and eloquent silence of the Senator from North Carolina evinces that he has been correctly reported, and that with him did originate this most extraordinary accusation. The administration, then, is charged with an attempt to "pander" to Catholic feeling. I shall make no elaborate vindication of the administration against an allegation which I hold to be equally absurd and malignant.

Mr. MANGUM.—I do not know for what reason my colleague does not choose to explain. But I understand that he used no such expression.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am very glad to hear it. I can only say that the colleague of the gentleman who has just sat down, does himself great injustice when he suffers himself to be misquoted at his own presence. The Senator from New Hampshire, then, stands convicted of gross mis-quotation; and if the Senator from New Hampshire, laboring under an erroneous impression, adopted the expression on the ground of authority, and not of its intrinsic merit, I trust he will speedily renounce it. I was about to say that as one of the humblest members of the democratic party, I should disdain an elaborate and formal vindication of the administration against the charge in question, which I have denounced already as alike absurd and malignant, and incapable of any support whatever from any thing that can be called evidence. Pandering to Catholic feeling? I am not a member of any church. I have only had the honor of being born in a Christian country, and have always paid—as I trust I have felt—a decent respect to the religion of my forefathers; and all those religious institutions which I have ever undoubtingly believed to be conservative of the great principles of civil and religious liberty, and affording the surest safeguard which to the mind of man has been ever reserved, for the permanence everywhere of all that is valuable to him as a moral being. I have no partiality for any particular church or creed. But, as an American—as the citizen of a country in which the various forms of belief are alike free, I should scorn myself, if I permitted the existence in my bosom of any such feelings as those attributed to the administration in the debate this morning. Although not a member of a church, I can say with my hand on my heart that I have beheld with emotions of delight the advance of the Christian cause in all the countries of Christendom. In the success of Episcopalians, Catholics, Methodists, and all other religious denominations, I have sympathized with equal warmth. I have never experienced the slightest apprehension in regard to the multiplication of the strength of any branch of the Christian church.—Under our constitution, we have nothing to fear from any such influences as those alluded to.

But it is declared that this is an attempt to "pander" to Catholic feeling in advance of the Presidential election. In the first place, I have to say, that from my knowledge of the clergy and people of the Catholic communion, they would scorn to be used for such a purpose, and I know enough of the administration to assert that no such idea could ever have been conceived by them. Pandering to the Catholics of this country! The gentleman may be more familiar than I am with the basiss of corrupt bargaining for popular suffrages. It is, I trust, a process not common in this country. At any rate, I live in a part of the world where the thing is not practised, and where if practised it would be punished in the most signal manner. I know that demagogueism is to be met with in all sections of the country, and that this business of bargaining for votes is not altogether unknown in various places. I will not say that the history of the Senator, but that his experience and means of observation in the part of the country where he resides may have enabled him to obtain more information in regard to this matter of corrupt bargaining for votes than I have enjoyed. But surely this groundless and illiberal suggestion that the President of the United States, and those with whom he advises, are attempting by this movement to "pander" to the Catholics is a charge not worthy even of the extended notice which I have given it. I advance to another topic on which I will detain the Senate only a moment. I intend to vote for a full mission to Rome, and I have only one reason, but it is with me a potent one. Whatever others may say, I do not hesitate to avow that I recognize the present Pope of Rome, the head of the Catholic church as he is, as the man of the age—the head of the great reform movement of the European world—the man who has dared to borrow light from this country and diffuse it throughout the dominion in ruin. His is the man who has now identified with the cause of civil and religious liberty in the old world; and although not one single dollar's worth of commerce were carried on between this country and the Papal States I would zealously advocate the establishment of diplomatic relations with the sovereign Pontiff. Using the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] I would even, as a complimentary mark of our sympathy, send this mission to the Pope. As the champion of freedom he is worthy of our highest regard—our sincerest reverence—our most devout affection. It is suggested that perhaps Austria may be offended. Well, I do not desire to say anything to offend Austria; but I am sure I should be ashamed of this government if, from fear of offending Austria, it should be restrained from doing what is right in this matter. It has indeed been said that the Pope of Rome is sustained by Austria. Why, can it be forgotten that Austrian bayonets are at this moment opposing freedom in Italy? Do we not know that the cause of liberty has been continually assailed, amid blood, and fire, and desolation, by the armies of Austria? and yet Austria must be propitiated! I think, sir, from what we learn of recent movements in France, and the convulsed state of Portugal, Spain, and the Austrian dominions in the neighborhood of the Rhine, that that power has something else to do at present, besides watching with vigilant jealousy our actions towards Italy and other countries. I believe, sir, that the present is eminently an auspicious moment in which to send an embassy to Rome. Not that I would attempt anything in the spirit of propagandism. Far be it from me to interfere in the conduct of civil affairs in any part of Italy. But, sir, the Pope is leading in the great regenerative movement which already threatens the speedy extinction of monarchical government throughout the civilized world; and does it become us in a spirit of heartless indifference to decline, even a cold and formal recognition of the struggle for popular freedom? Whatever others may do, I am determined to do all I can, with such limited influence as I possess, to advance that cause in Europe, by extending to it my warmest sympathies.

I have meant nothing unkind, and I trust have said nothing unkind; but I honestly believe, that the sentiments of the Senator from New Hampshire are worthy of the severest censure; and having endeavored to express my strong disapprobation of them, I shall not longer trespass on the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HALE.—Perhaps I should make some explanation to the Senator from North Carolina. I certainly did not mean to misquote or misrepresent him. I am sure he will not suppose that I could do so.

Mr. BADGER.—Certainly not.

Mr. HALE.—Now, one word as to what was said which produced such a flood of eloquence from the gentleman from Mississippi. I certainly did not expect that that gentleman and myself would very cordially agree in certain political matters. Our positions on some subjects are wide apart; and, therefore, it does not seriously disturb my equanimity to find him quite antagonistic in reference to these questions. When he came down upon my political position, with all his Jupiter Tonans thundering eloquence, I regarded it as a matter of course. But really, sir, when a gentleman of his refined taste—eloquence of diction—purity of style—chasteness of manner—and everything that contributes to the character of a perfect orator, is compelled, reluctantly compelled, I doubt not, to pronounce my poor efforts vulgar, I do "feel bad!"

Mr. FOOTE.—I did not pronounce the effort vulgar.

Mr. HALE.—It was the language then?

Mr. FOOTE.—No, it was the word "pander;" and if the Senator will refer to the original, he will find that what I say is strictly true. "Vulgar" is derived from the word "vulgus," which means the common people; and I meant to say that the word "pander" is common among the masses.

Mr. HALE.—Ah! That is all?

Mr. FOOTE.—Certainly.

Mr. HALE.—Then I am very glad to find that my sentiments are becoming so popular! Now, I do not travel with the dictionary in my pocket, but one of the pages has brought me one of those big dictionaries which we had in the Senate the other day, when the Senator from Kentucky lost so much in not being present to hear.

Mr. FOOTE.—Ah! take care—that may have been in secret session!

Mr. HALE.—If so, it has now got out! I don't know, however, but that if the public were here and listened to our poor debates, they would hardly think that the injunction had been taken off the dictionaries! But I have the dictionary before me, and I find that this "vulgar" word—

Mr. FOOTE.—What dictionary is it?

Mr. HALE.—Compiled by one Sam Johnson! I find, sir, that this "vulgar" word was used in common by that vulgar fellow, Shakspeare; also by one Dryden; one Rowe, and a man who used to write doggerel, one John Milton. All of them used this "vulgar" word "pander!" Now, in its direct application to this very case, I said that I believed that this was an attempt on the part of the administration to "pander" to the Roman Catholic voters, or Roman Catholic prejudices; and I gave credit to the Senator from North Carolina—

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator has not read the authorities. Will he allow me to look at them for a moment? I do not undertake to deny that the word is to be found in the dictionary, or that Shakspeare used it. But I meant to say that it was a word always intended for purposes of scurrility—of vulgar meaning—and like many other epithets in Shakspeare, not appropriate on all occasions, and certainly not becoming in such a dignified body as this.

Mr. HALE.—I shall read the authorities. Here is one—

[illegible]

Mr. FOOTE.—Very well. Would the Senator affirm that [illegible]?

Mr. CAMERON.—Would the Senator be so good as to read the authority again; some of us on this side did not hear it distinctly?

Mr. HALE.—Certainly, with great pleasure, sir.

[illegible]

Why, sir, if I had searched the dictionary from beginning to end.

I could not have hit upon a word which more clearly expresses what I meant to convey! This is an attempt on the part of the administration to pander to the passions of the Roman Catholic voters. That is what I think. When the honorable Senator from Mississippi says he has great confidence in the administration—

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? The most serious part of what I said was not so much a denial of his allegation, as a solemn call upon him for evidence in support of the charge.

Mr. HALE.—I understand.

Mr. FOOTE.—Allow me further to state my proposition?

Mr. HALE.—Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE.—If a person were arraigned as a criminal and no evidence of his guilt was produced, he would certainly go free of punishment; I therefore invoke the Senator to adduce his proofs. I challenge him to the proof.

Mr. HALE.—The evidence is to be found in the absence of all proof to the contrary. This is a fair mode of argument, as the Senator must admit. When there is something palpable on the face of the case—if no other motive than that which strikes the mind as being the palpable motive, is made to appear, then the inference is legitimate, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, that that is really the motive.

Mr. FOOTE.—Suppose the Senator were charged with a grave offence of which he was altogether innocent, though appearances were against him, and if he failed to adduce proof of his innocence, would he then be justly found guilty?

Mr. HALE.—Non constat! The conclusion does not follow from the premises—not at all. But the Senator from Mississippi said that Pope Pius the Ninth was "the man of the age." Why, I thought James K. Polk was "the man of the age." I should like to know what right any democrat, sound in the faith, has to pronounce Pope Pius "the man of the age!" I did not propose, however, to go into this question of a mission to Rome. I rose only for the purpose of freeing myself from the charge of using a vulgarism. As modified, however, by the Senator from Mississippi, instead of a charge, it is a compliment. I feel flattered. He says that my sentiment is becoming very common amongst the people. I agree with him. I do believe the people regard this as an attempt on the part of the administration to pander to Roman Catholic prejudices.

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope the Senator will allow me to correct him. I did not say that the sentiment was common amongst the people, but that his language was of a common caste and character.

Mr. HALE.—Well, I am a common man! I do not pretend to be any thing else. And now, having exposed the attempt on the part of the administration as well as I can, I would appeal to Senators; and if there are any other ambitious men in the Senate besides myself, I would call on them to see to it that the man who has prepared this measure doesn't "bring all this grist into his hopper." If there be any other presidential aspirant here besides myself, I think he had better look well to this business. Did the Senator from Michigan speak to me? [Laughter, in which the reply of Mr. CASS was lost to the reporter.]

Mr. HANNEGAN.—When the Senator from Mississippi alluded to the fear of Austria, had he reference to any remarks made by me?

Mr. FOOTE.—I alluded entirely to the speech of the Senator from North Carolina, of which I had read little more than the half.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have but a word to say on this bill. We have all been amused by this lexicographical discussion, which is entirely innocent. But I exceedingly regret that this measure should have been regarded in any other than a purely business point of view. I regard it, and hope I shall continue to regard it, strictly in that light. This government recognizes no such thing as sectarian prejudices or sectarian feelings. We are accustomed to act altogether irrespective of all such considerations. But though I have my prejudices on this subject, and, I hope, with due deference to the opinions of others, yet I am utterly incapable, while sitting here, of acting with regard to any sectarian feelings whatsoever. I shall act in this case purely as a busines transaction. Well, then, what is it in that light? This mission originated in one of two purposes, in either the political or the commercial aspect of the case, or in both. The whole subject of our diplomatic agencies has been frequently spoken of, and I have concurred in the opinion, that the multiplication of so many missions in the States bordering on the Mediterrean has been bad policy. I have thought that it was a very convenient mode of gratifying, perhaps, many of our political friends under all administrations; and I know that a few years ago this matter was the subject of conversation in a very intelligent circle, and that a suggestion was then made which struck me as a wise one, to the effect, that if we could annihilate several of the missions already established of very little political or commercial importance, it might be important to send a full minister to some point in the Italian States, who might concentrate all our interests, commercial and political, and give dignity and efficiency to our diplomatic relations in that quarter of the world. I am willing to admit that in that point of view Rome might be a suitable location for such a mission, as there is at that city a vast confluence from all parts of Europe, and in a political aspect it might be useful. Our commerce with the Papal States is not very great, but it is a matter worthy of consideration.

As to the progress of liberal opinions in Italy or elsewhere, I am perfectly willing to sympathize in all efforts to meliorate the condition of the people, but here in my place I protest not only against all attempts to excite religious feeling or sectarian feeling, but also against the idea that it is the mission of this government to propagate our own views, or in any way to interfere with the internal affairs of any other people. Against religious propogandism and political propogandism I am equally opposed. Whenever I behold shackles and fetters falling from the limbs of men, I rejoice and freely extend my sympathies; but sitting here, in this place, I trust, sir, that nothing shall divert my attention from the duties which belong to this station and the interests to which I am solemnly bound to give exclusive attention. We are here to attend to our own affairs, not to meddle with the domestic concerns of any other people.

I have had some difficulty in determining whether either in a political or commercial aspect any mission was called for at Rome. At all events I have made up my mind to vote against the full mission. I would vote for a minister-resident. We send a minister-resident to Constantinople, the city of the Turk; and also to the heathen in the eastern seas and China. This we do totally irrespective of religious differences, and almost purely from considerations of commercial policy, very little political interest being involved. I confess I do not regard with favor the multiplication of these diplomatic agencies, which does look something like making snug provision for political friends. Without imputing any such motives in the present case, I must say that I have seen evidences of a gradual tendency in this direction under all the administrations. I am desirous of checking it; and I do not know that I could be brought to vote in favor of this measure at all, were it not in order to show that I cannot be affected by any sectarian influence whatever. Of all the great principles which lie at the foundation of our free institutions, I believe that there is none more conservative, and more essential to the security of those institutions, than the principle of universal toleration and equality of all the churches, each being left to the voluntary support of its own members. History has taught us that whenever the church becomes connected with the State—without any imputation on the principle of religion itself—corruption and abuse of power are the result.

Again, I have always thought that the policy of this government in reference to some of the principal European missions was unwise. I would give them more imposing effect. The representatives abroad of this great and wealthy and powerful people ought not to stand at the tail of the whole diplomatic corps of Europe. I would give them more consideration. The money would be wisely spent. It would be wise policy also to provide the material suitable to the place. But, perhaps, in a country like ours, where party must always have large influence, it can hardly be hoped that such appointments will be always the most judicious. I shall vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have a very few words to say on the matter before the Senate. I shall vote for this mission, and for a minister of the highest grade; because, if there be any reason for the establishment of the mission at all, it appears to me that it should be of the first class. One or two objections have been urged against this measure; and one has been, that it was intended to affect the ballot-boxes in the United States—a conclusion drawn from the fact, that the head of the government, to which it is proposed to send this mission, is a member of a particular church. That objection thus resolves itself into this; that although the mission be sent to a government, yet because the head of that government is the member of a church, therefore it should not be sent. Now, when our constitution required us to keep our hands off this sacred subject of religion, it simply prohibited two things: the establishment of a state religion, and the persecution of any particular religious faith whatever. But because the head of the government to which this mission is to be sent is the member of a church, it is argued that, therefore, the minister ought not be sent.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope the Senator does not allude to any remarks of mine?

Mr. ALLEN.—No, sir. This mission has nothing to do with the church. It is a mission to a government, not to a priest. It is a mission to a government recognized as such—a terrestrial, not a celestial government—a government known by law to the nations, and sustaining relations as a government to other nations—a government in all essential features, independent of the peculiarity of an ecclesiastic at its head. I say, then, it does not become us, who have no jurisdiction of this sacred subject, to proscribe, or to attempt to proscribe, any branch of the church whatever, or any creed or denomination of Christians. So far as this objection goes, I plead the constitution in answer to it. We have no right to proscribe men or a government on account of their religious opinions. Well then, that objection may be set aside. What is the other? That there is but little commerce with the Papal States. True, but this mission is recommended by the Executive upon other than commercial grounds. It is recommended upon high political grounds—reasons which will outweigh mere commercial considerations—reasons that will stand good so long as there is a tongue to utter the name of freedom in the world. The President presents as the first of these reasons that, the peculiar political condition of the Papal States—a condition in which it was impossible for him, as the head of a great government of freemen, not to sympathize if he truly represented his countrymen. The liberation of oppressed humanity has but commenced in Italy. A change has been proposed, the object of which is to free the oppressed and diminish the number of the starving. When such a state of things as this is about to transpire in that part of the world most sacred to our classic recollections as well as to the Christian sympathies of our whole people of every denomination, does it become us to stand here and talk about the amount of commerce that floats upon the Tiber, before we expend a few thousand dollars for the establishment of this mission? There is nothing new in all this. The idea did not originate with the President. It is not for the first time heard in this broad land; nor is the policy proposed one which for the first time meets a response in the heart of this people. Many a year ago this government followed the example of all other governments in the world, and tendered its sympathies to a people who were struggling in the same cause. Why, sir, whenever an unfortunate people have been endeavoring to free themselves from despotic authority, and the effort has been crushed by force of arms, every other despot in Europe has sent his minister with congratulations to the successful tyrant. When on the other hand, the people triumph—when as recently in Paris, the people bear upon their shoulders the shattered fragments of a throne, and consume it with fire, and the model of our own constitution is selected, does it become us to stand here and add up the difference between $4,500 and $9,000, in order to determine whether we will stand by and see brother despot congratulate brother despot for his triumphs over the liberties of the people, whilst we dare not offer our congratulations to the people when they triumph over their despotic rulers? No, sir, our government has acted in this matter before this day. A famous resolution was long since moved, in obedience to Mr. Monroe's recommendation, in the House of Representatives, to tender in the form of a legislative vote, the sympathies of the American people to the struggling Greeks. But now, it seems, we are to stand by and behold unmoved the attempt of the head of a government to extend the liberties of his people despite of the opposition of neighboring despots, who fear in the progress of Italian reform, that their thrones may be endangered. We are told that we have no commerce on the Tiber, and that we must on no account expend nine thousand dollars in order to aid the cause of freedom throughout the world! Sir, I hope we shall; and I hope farther, that there will be spirit enough within the walls of this capitol to tender the congratulations of Congress, in the name of the people, to their triumphant brethren in France, before we adjourn. That is what I hope. We know what is going on in the world, and we cannot avoid taking sides—at all events in sympathy—and by all the moral influences that we can bring to bear. We cannot avoid taking sides with the people of Europe without betraying the great cause of human liberty.

We live in an age of the world when great truths are established, too glaring for any man to say, "I look but see not!" One great truth has been established within the last forty days; and I pronounce it one of the most important truths which has been politically established since the foundation of society, and it is this: That armed men no longer afford a guarantee to despotism. Standing armies can no longer be relied on to sustain thrones, but on the contrary mix and mingle with the oppressed multitude and are the first to reduce those thrones to ashes. That is the great truth of the age. It has just been established in France—established in the presence of a hundred thousand bayonets in the pay of the crown! That, sir, is worth more than all the discoveries with regard to steam and electricity that have been made, no matter how much bragging there may have been about the use of these elements. There are but two powers in the government of man now in operation—force and public opinion. Force has failed in the heart of Europe, and the governments there must forever rest upon opinion, and that opinion founded upon the enlightened reason of the people.

I am driven by the nature of the discussion far from my purpose when I rose. But I cannot but think of the events in Europe at this hour, which, in connection with the acts of the head of the Papal States, are by an involuntary association of ideas, brought up in connection with this measure. It is impossible to speak of the recent interesting events in Italy without reference to the regeneration of France. I shall vote, sir, for the establishment of a mission of the highest grade to the Papal States.

Mr. BADGER.—The observations of the honorable Senator from Ohio make it necessary that I should occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments. I do not propose to follow him in the wide field into which he has entered, nor to question any of his gigantic conceptions with regard to recent events in France; but to come back simply to the consideration of the question before the Senate. The Senator from Ohio stated that some one had objected to the establishment of this mission to Rome, because the sovereign of that country was the member of a particular church, and as in answer to a question put by my colleague, whether the reference was to any remarks made by him, the Senator from Ohio answered in the negative, it occurred to me as possible, that the honorable Senator might have referred to something which fell from me the other day.

Mr. ALLEN.—I may state that I had direct and exclusive reference to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, and his argument, which was that the Protestant people of the United States would mark this transaction.

Mr. BADGER.—I understand then, the Senator has just now attributed to me the remark that I had objected to the establishment of this mission because the head of that government is the member of a particular church. It is very certain that I said no such thing as the Senator just now attributes to me, and I think it is equally certain that no such thing can be deduced from what I did say. Certainly I never objected to the establishment of this mission because the sovereign of Rome is a member of a particular church. Such an expression never fell from me, and I am certain that I never conceived such an idea. Without professing to have any superior information on the subject; I was certainly aware that the sovereigns of all the countries of Europe with whom we have diplomatic relations, are members of particular churches, or religious communities. However, I will endeavor to re-state my objection, and make it so clear that the ground which I take cannot be possibly confounded by anybody with the error of objecting to a mission to a foreign government, because its head is the member of a church.

This mission must be recommended to us by some considerations either of interest to ourselves, or the general welfare of society. It is recommended by the President on the ground of "recent interesting political events," in progress in Italy, under the direction of the present Pope; and secondly, on the ground of exercising a due oversight over our commercial interests in that part of the world. Now, with regard to the latter, it seems to be conceded, as I understand, by every gentleman in the Senate, who has taken part in this discussion, that we have no commercial interests with the Papal States that require this mission—that as these interests are small and inconsiderable, and have been sufficiently provided for by the three American consuls in the Papal States, so they may safely be left to the same superintendence in future. The honorable Senator looks down with scorn at the idea of troubling ourselves with any such sublunary matters as commercial interests; and, soaring entirely above any of those earthly regions which we occupy, has gone on a transcendental excursion in pursuit of reasons why we should institute this mission to Rome. Now, the President of the United States, in his message, has made the commercial interests of the country one of the grounds on which he thinks this mission ought to be established. Being myself rather a plain man, and not at all given to transcendental views of any kind, I cannot forbear thinking that an American Senate may be more properly engaged in considering if the commercial interests of this country require the institution of this mission. The general impression seems to be that they do not require it. On what other ground is it asked that now, at this particular time, this mission shall be established, and either a minister or charge sent to the Papal states? "The recent political events in Rome," which the honorable Senator from Ohio has spoken of as if there had been some real change in the political condition of the people of Rome—as if Pope Pius the IX. had adopted some measures, by which absolute power should be mitigated, and some degree of popular rights established? The Senator speaks of the Pope as if he were engaged in an effort to establish civil and religious liberty. He speaks of the sympathy which every American heart should feel for all such movements, in every part of the world. Well then when such a movement does take place, I hope I shall have a reasonable and just degree of sympathy for it; but I must have some little evidence of its existence before that sympathy can be awakened. Now I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, who is no doubt familiar with all these events in Rome, what step the Pope has taken towards the establishment either of religious or civil freedom? Has he granted to the people of his States a legislative chamber? Has he given them any participation in the privileges of government? Has he permitted freedom of speech and of the press? Has he abolished the Censorship? Has he granted universal religious toleration? Has he abridged any portion of the power which he received from his predecessors? Has he interposed a single barrier in any form to the exercise of that despotical control over the subjects which he received from his predecessors and which he means to hand down to those who are to succeed him? Not at all. He has made some municipal reforms. He has shown himself to be a kind and good master to his subjects, but not only has he done nothing by which their condition as the subjects of an absolute sovereign may be mitigated, but he has expressly disavowed the intention of making any such change. But says the Senator from Ohio, we are to send out this mission for the purpose of tendering our congratulations to the people of the Papal States upon the advancement that they have made in the establishment of their liberties under the patronage of their sovereign Pontiff. Do they assemble in conventions? Do they meet in legislative bodies? Have they any representation whatever by which they are recognised as a power in the State, and to which these congratulations can be tendered? Not at all. They are kindly, beneficently governed, and as far as their personal welfare is concerned, they are wisely governed by the sovereign Pontiff. But it seems to me that the Senator forgets the nature of that sovereignty. It is as the first Bishop of the Church that the Pope possesses any temporal power. The government is, as has been very well expressed by Malte Brun:

"An existence unparalleled became forth—human, the earth, on which it only seems [illegible] and for it engage the Heavens from which it looks at kings as its inferiors."

When the Pope dies how is his successor appointed? The succession is not by hereditary descent; there is no election by the people; the choice is made by the sacred college of Cardinals.

Mr. WEBSTER—(in his seat.)—From one of their own number.

Mr. BADGER.—Yes; and that college consists, I believe, of seventy members—bishops, priests, deacons. They meet and select one of their body as the successor of the late Pontiff, and he derives all his power from that body. They choose the Pope. He is elected by a body of priests, and succeeds to an absolute power over the people of the Papal States. It is, therefore, an absolute, unbroken, and unmitigated, despotism. In using that term I mean no reproach to the present Pontiff, who is, as I sincerely believe, greatly in advance of a large proportion of the distinguished personages who have occupied the Papal chair. But the government is of necessity a despotism, although it by no means follows, that the individual who exercises the power may be in his heart a despot. Yet, the present Pope has made no approximation to freedom in the American sense of the term. What do we understand by freedom? Not merely the protection extended by a kind and beneficent ruler. It is to be subjected to the government of a known law. It is to have guarantees that our rights shall not be invaded; and amongst these rights is the exercise of the elective franchise by the body of the people. It is to enjoy a share in legislation, which is null and void without the assent of our people. Now it is impossible, in my view of it, that the Pope can establish such a system of free government in his dominions. We all know that it is one of the claims put forth by the Sovereign Pontiff, that he was constituted "prince over all nations and kingkingdoms"—"he plucks up, pulls down, destroys, plants, and builds," at his sovereign pleasure—exercising, in short, all those powers claimed by Pope Pius the Fifth, in his famous Bull of excommunication. We know that the church of which the Pope is the head never changes. Other things may change, but the Catholic church changes not. What was once claimed by her is ever claimed by her. It is true in the progress of civilization in modern times, the power to exercise the claimed authority over the nations and kingdoms of the earth has fallen into disuetude, because it can be no longer carried into execution. and because, perhaps, there is no disposition to carry it out. But this power is still claimed. It is impossible then, according to this view of the Papal authority and government, that the Pope could divide the authority with the people of his States, which has been annexed to his spiritual kingdom in order to give it external dignity and respectability.

It seems to me, that when this matter comes to be carefully considered, it must be regarded as simply a mission from this country to the first Bishop of the world, because it is only as an ecclesiastical head that the sovereign Pontiff exercises temporal authority. The point of my objection is; that this is a mission—as the Senator from Ohio supposes to a member of a particular church—but that it is sending a mission to a spiritual sovereign, who is the head of the Catholic church. And I said, and now repeat, that the Protestant communities of this country will regard that step as a great departure from the principles which have regulated our diplomatic intercourse with other nations. I do not object to the mission because the person to whom it is to be sent is a member of a particular church, or because he happens to be the head of the Catholic church. I object to it because he is a spiritual potentate, and there are no interests of the United States in his dominions which require the presence of a diplomatic agent of this country. It is on this ground that I object to the establishment of this mission, and on that ground I would object to a diplomatic mission to the bishop of any church.

I agree in what was said by my friend from Indiana, that if it be our object to testify our respect for free institutions, and republican government in the old world, by the establishment of a mission, we had much better send a minister to the Swiss confederation. But I think my friend might have gone still further. There is one republic, to which the sending of a mission could not be interpreted as evincing any thing else, than a sincere desire to pay homage and respect to a republican government. There is the little republic of San Marino, with its thirty square miles of territory, and seven thousand inhabitants which has existed as a republic for fourteen centuries. It is the oldest sister that we have in the world. She was a republic for ten centuries before this continent was discovered; and if we are disposed to go out of our way, and send missions merely for the purpose of expressing our sympathy with the republican institutions of mankind, here is a case for its unexceptionable exercise. Such a mission could not be regarded in any other light, than as manifesting before the world our reverence for this small but ancient republic.

But I understood the other day—if I correctly followed the remarks of the honorable Senator from Missouri—that he was disposed to establish this mission in consequence of the grand associations connected with Rome. I trust that I can appreciate the classic feelings of the honorable Senator—I trust I am not altogether indifferent to such considerations, but I cannot see how they would justify us in sending a mission for the purpose of testifying our respect to the departed greatness of ancient Rome. I would suggest that the money necessary for the establishment of such a mission had much better be appropriated to sending to Rome and defraying the expenses of some of our young men of genius, as usual without means, who might be employed in studying the works of ancient art, and return to their own country accomplished painters and sculptors, able to adorn their native land with works which might exercise the most important influences in educating and improving the public taste. But I also understood that Senator to suggest, that he would be in favor of making this ultimately a mission for the whole of the Italian States. When that proposition comes before us, it may be worthy of consideration. At present, however, I do not think that any necessity exists for the establishment of this mission. Other gentlemen think differently and will of course govern themselves by their own judgment.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator from North Carolina, insists that the Pope has done nothing, and attempted nothing, worthy to be recognized as even indicating a disposition to ameliorate and liberalize the civil institutions of the States over which he bears rule. Of course, sir, the Senator speaks honestly and frankly touching these high matters, and has doubtless expressed himself according to the information he happens to possess upon the subject. He will permit me, sir, notwithstanding, to aver, that up to the present moment, I had thought that there was not an intelligent man in the whole country, of those who do not entirely withhold themselves from a perusal of the newspapers, to whom various measures of political reform, projected and executed by his Papal majesty, of a nature most important and salutary, were not familiarly known. These high acts of civic amelioration I shall not now specify, holding specification in this hall to be needless, except for the instruction of the Senator from North Carolina, to whose particular edification I have not time at present to devote myself. I should have known of the Senator though, why Pope Pius and the measures of his government, are objects of so much solicitude and jealousy to certain European potentates, quite remarkable for their hostility to popular freedom? Why does the emperor of Austria tremble upon his throne, as he hears, from time to time, of the grand movements of national resuscitation, of which the Papal dominions are the theatre? What has convulsed Naples and Sicily, and spread the spirit of political regeneration, through all upper, central, and lower Italy? What has fixed the admiring eyes of the civilized world upon Pope Pius, and his every act and declaration, if, as contended, he has done nothing, and attempted nothing, to restore free institutions to Italy, where they once flourished so illustriously? I leave this topic, sir; perhaps other Senators may choose to lay documentary evidence before this body, in vindication of the Pope of Rome against the cruel injustice done him in this debate. I hasten to make good two propositions, heretofore asserted by myself and others near me, and which have both been denied by the Senator from North Carolina. I have charged the Senator with having objected to this mission, in part at least, upon mere sectarian grounds. This he denies. He has also authorized his colleague to deny for him. that he accused the administration, in the speech made by him a few days since, (and which is now before me, in the National Intelligencer,) of having gotten up this mission for the purpose of propitiating the Catholic voters of the country; or, in the refined phraseology of the Senator from New Hampshire, the administration has been accused of pandering to Catholic feeling for political purposes. It will be sufficient to read from the Senator's own speech to satisfy all who hear me, that neither of the negations referred to are substantiable by evidence. Here are the printed words of the Senator himself.

"But what is the other reason assigned by the President? The recent political events which have taken place in the Papal States, under the direction of the present Pope. In what possible mode, I ask, do these political events make it necessary that we should send a minister to Rome? How are we connected with these political events? What intelligence is it expected that our minister can give us, over these events or the party connected with them; or, in what way will this mission, politically considered, be of service to this country or to the Papal States? What is the character of the political events which are now in progress at Rome? Nothing has ever taken place which in the least embraces any alterations in the form of government that has always obtained in those States. The present Pope is the same absolute master of his people that all his predecessors in time past have been. He has surrendered none of the absolute powers which adorn and strengthen the tiara which he wears. He erected no barriers against the abuse of those powers either by himself or by his successors. He stands now in auto-cal possessed of and exercising all the powers over all his subjects, who are absolute dependents on him for every privilege they enjoy—for every right which they exercise—for every relaxation which has been extended to them from the rigid severity of former days. He is nothing in the world, in comparison with his predecessors, but a good and kind master of his subjects, who are emphatically his vassals. He has made no reform, he has made no surrender of any of the principles of arbitrary power; he has not evinced any disposition to abridge the limits of his authority in the slightest degree. The uncontrollable authority of that scepire which he wields is the same unquestionable and unquestioned dominion which has been exercised by his predecessors. Now, sir, what on earth can induce us at this time to establish this mission to the Papal States? Do we expect to sustain his liberness in pursuing the course which he has adopted? Do we intend to extend to him our countenance and support? Why, in that point of view, I think it may be seriously questioned whether we do not greatly over estimate the position which we occupy, and whether his Holiness will consider himself at all obliged by our countenance and support.

"To such a mission, sir, I, for one, am opposed. I wish for our Roman Catholic citizens of this country precisely what we all enjoy—the absolute and unqualified possession of all our religious rights. They may make themselves dependent upon, or believe themselves dependent upon, and to be bound in spiritual submission to, any head of their church they please, here or elsewhere. But, rely upon it, the establishment of this mission will be considered, by the great Protestant interests of this country, as one undertaken for the purpose of giving a new character to that particular church of which the sovereign Pontiff is the head. It will be regarded as placing him and his church in this country upon a far different footing from that which is occupied by other religious denominations; and it will be felt throughout the extent of this land that the government of the United States has instituted, in reference to this particular church, a proceeding entirely dissonant from its past policy; and that it has departed, in no small degree, from the principles of universal toleration and that non-intervention in religious matters which the constitution has prescribed. When we look, sir, at the small amount of the commerce of the United States with the Papal States; when we consider the absence of every thing like an effort on the part of his Holiness the Pope to introduce the principles of free government in the Papal States, the idea will force itself upon the minds of all that, were it not for the thousands of foreign Roman Catholic voters in the United States, the efforts of his Holiness to ameliorate the condition of his subjects would have met with less sympathy, and the commerce of the Un-ted States with the Papal States would have attracted less odium before the occupant of the White House."

Sir, having supplied this full evidence to the Senate, I have no more to say, except this: The Senator from North Carolina has evidently mistaken the age in which he lives. This is no age in which sectarian feelings can be called into action, to disturb the machinery of governments, and defeat the most salutary measures of national policy. It is not in this age of light and knowledge; it is not in this country, where all religions are protected, and all creeds are tolerated, that a wild spirit of fanaticism can be enkindled for the destruction of our social peace, and the disruption of those fraternal ties which bind all true hearted Americans together, as co-heirs of the same blessed heritage, of civil and religious freedom. The Titus Oates's of faction, if there be such men, will have to go elsewhere to execute their wild schemes of disorganization, bloodshed, and massacre. How better could I conclude these remarks than in the words of a brilliant and distinguished orator of the Emerald Isle. "Oh, Prejudice! where is thy reason? Oh, Bigotry! where is thy blush?"

The question was then taken on the amendment by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Bagby, Benton, Cass, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Fitch, Foote, Johnson of Georgia, Mason—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Butler, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dayton, Greene, Hale, Hamegan, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, Morgum, Mason, Niles, Phelps, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Westcott.—28.

The amendment was therefore rejected, and after some further progress had been made in amending the bill, the Senate,

On motion, adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1848.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from William C. Anderson, on the causes of the explosion of steamboilers, and means of prevention; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MEMORIALS ETC., OF THE LEGISLATURE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. BAGBY presented a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Alabama, praying the assent of Congress to an act of the legislature of that State, leasing the canal around the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial from the same Legislature, praying Congress to pass a law dispensing with an administration on the estates of citizens of that State, who volunteered for the war with Mexico in 1846, and have fallen victims to disease contracted in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a memorial from the same Legislature, praying a donation of other lands for school purposes in that State, in lieu of valueless sixteenth sections; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the response of the same Legislature, to the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of State of Vermont, on the subject of slavery, and the war with Mexico; and the response of the same Legislature to the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, on the subject of the Tariff and the war with Mexico; which were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of the same Legislature, praying a donation of land for purposes of education; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the same Legislature, praying the payment of interest on advances made by that State for the use of the government during the Creek hostilities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial of the same Legislature, praying the extension of the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands in that state; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the same Legislature, praying a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of D. Lamb and others, citizens of the United States, in relation to the disposition of the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of Baltimore, praying the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, eleven petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for the abolition of slavery throughout the Union; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, eight petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for the immediate and peaceful dissolution of the American Union; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania and Delaware, praying the adoption of measures for the abolition of slavery throughout the Union; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. UPHAM presented the petition of Sarah Tyler, widow of a revolutionary soldier, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of the city council of St. Louis, praying an appropriation for the completion of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of John F. Howard, praying the establishment of a line of mail steamers between New York and Marseilles, in France; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of Waldo county, Maine, praying the establishment of a mail route between Augusta and Bangor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of Haym M. Salamon, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

MR. WISE'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed fifteen hundred extra copies of the communication of the State Department in answer to a call for the correspondence of Mr. Wise on the subject of the slave trade.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to inquire into the execution of the Senate's order of January 13th, directing the report of Dr Wislizenus to be printed, and report the progress, if any, made in the execution of the said order.

RETIRED LIST IN THE NAVY.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the propriety of providing for a retired list in the navy.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bills from the House of Representatives, for the relief of William Culver; for the relief of John Anderson; and for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Stewart, reported them without amendment.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were suspended, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1848.

The question pending, being upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by Mr. ATCHISON yesterday—

Mr. ATCHISON said: Since I proposed this amendment, I have examined the amendment submitted by the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, and as he is of opinion that his amendment will preclude the necessity for this, although I am not entirely satisfied that such is the case, I am willing to withdraw it.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I do not know whether it provides for the case; but the amendment I proposed, was offered at the instance of the Second Auditor himself; and, unless the proposition of the gentleman comes from the office where the clerks are to be employed, I would prefer not to encumber this bill with it, especially as there must be a bill passed for the next fiscal year, and it can then be acted upon more understandingly than it can now.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I do not wish to embarrass this bill, and as the Senator seems to think that speedy action upon it is necessary, I will withdraw my amendment.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BADGER.—As no question has been presented on the mission to the Papal States upon which a vote could be taken directly for or against the establishment of such mission, I will as I am opposed to the mission altogether, move, in order to have a direct vote, to strike out the words "Papal States."

Mr. ALLEN asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER.—Of course, if the motion succeeds, I shall follow it by a motion to change the amount of appropriation.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will allow me to substitute for the motion which he has made, a motion to strike out the words "Papal States," and to insert in their stead "for the salary of a minister resident at the Papal States, six thousand dollars"

Mr. BADGER.—The honorable Senator will perceive that that motion would not answer the purpose which I wish to accomplish. I wish to strike out the provision altogether. I am opposed to sending to the Papal States a mission of any description, I wish to preclude it entirely.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I heard a suggestion made yesterday by some gentleman in this chamber, which I thought a very proper one, and I would be happy to see it adopted. I understand this is a proposition to make good certain ascertained deficiencies in the appropriations. Is it a proper occasion to introduce new offices, whether chargéships or missions? I should prefer that all these missions, chargéships, or whatever they may be, shall be omitted, and with that view I should be in favor of a motion to strike out the whole proposition which relates to them.

The question being about to be taken on [illegible] to strike out the words "Papal States"—

Mr. WEBSTER said: If my motion is entertained, it is a larger one still; it is to strike out all the propositions for missions, and to confine this bill to what it purports to be, to supply ascertained deficiencies of appropriations for the established branches of the public service.

Mr. DAYTON.—I should like to understand why it is that this appropriation is inserted in this bill. I am myself, however, in favor of permitting the chargeship to stand.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I do not know what difference it makes whether the missions be instituted in this bill, or in the appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. The current fiscal year expires on the last day of next June. The President has recommended that missions should be sent to certain States, and as it was supposed to be desirable that these missions should be immediately provided for, they are inserted in the bill for supplying the deficiencies of appropriations for the current fiscal year. I cannot see that it can make any possible difference whether they be provided for in this bill which provides for the expenses of the year not yet expired, or whether they be provided for in the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I will not press the motion to embarrass the chairman of the committee, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. DAYTON.—It strikes me that the explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance is satisfactory. If these appointments are to be made, and made during the current year, I think this is the proper bill in which to insert them. So much for the place. It strikes me too, that there is no impropriety in sending charges to these several courts, although I should object to a minister resident, if for no other reason, from the fact that in Austria and other States of Europe of more importance—not only in themselves, but as respects our interests, we are now represented by chargés. It is true Austria is only represented here by a chargé d'affaires; but on the other hand the Papal States are not represented at all. What reason can we assign then to the surrounding courts if we dignify that court with a minister plenipotentiary, whilst at the others we have agents of a lower grade? I trust, however, the clause will be permitted to stand as regards chargés. It is not our commercial interests only that are to be regarded in this matter. The vast body of our countrymen who are continually visiting those States will be greatly accommodated by having an agent there; and, as it is a matter of very small importance in a pecuniary point of view, I hope the Senate will allow the provision to remain in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not know whether I ought to address my interrogatories to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, or to the chairman of the Committee on Finance; but I would like to know whether any of the principal Protestant countries of Europe have representatives at the Papal courts?

Mr. MANGUM.—I understand that there has been no representative at that court from any Protestant State, except one formerly from Great Britain. I perceive in the recent proceedings of the British Parliament, that there is a proposition to revive a mission from that country. I was not aware before that one had ever existed avowedly, although it was very well known that Lord Minto had resided there in the capacity of an agent of the British. I believe there is no minister there at this time.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have had some difficulty in bringing my mind to a conclusion upon this subject, and am very much inclined to vote with the Senator from North Carolina, to strike out the mission altogether. I can see no good reason for sending a minister plenipotentiary or a mission of any kind. I cannot very well see what he can do at Rome to forward our interests. If we were to send a mission to the Pope of Rome, it is not to be supposed that we should meet with any reciprocity. It is not to be supposed that our mission would make any impression upon the institutions which are under the direction of that prince, who is the spiritual and temporal head of the Roman Catholic church throughout the world. His government is founded in intolerance and proscription, and it is not to be supposed that he would remit any of that intolerance by reason of being complimented by a mission from us. We are conducting the administration of a government which assumes no jurisdiction over religious matters. Ours is a government which does not allow us to legislate for religion, and I am not willing indirectly to give countenance to a mission for religious considerations whilst I am precluded from doing any thing directly in reference to religion within our own country. If the Pope, as it is said, is determined to carry out reform, I do not think that he does so in reference to any institutions of ours; it would therefore be an idle compliment to the Pope to send a minister there. What would he have to do? To take charge of our commerce? I understand that we have but about one hundred thousand dollars worth carried on with all the Roman States. If, then, there be no commerce to justify the establishment of a mission, it must be created with reference to political considerations. We have no representative here and never will have, probably, from the Pope of Rome, and is it expected that our mission is to have a bearing upon the institutions of that country? Why the last thing the Pope would thank you for, would be for sending a minister in the supposition that he could have any influence at that court. I wish to make no discrimination in compliment to the Pope on the ground of his being at the head of the Roman Catholic Church. If we were to send a charge d'affaires, what business would he find to transact? What occupation would he have? There would be nothing for him to do. He might, it is true, employ himself in examining the ruins of the Forum where Tully declaimed, or he might look from the Tarpeian rock and make himself familiar with those classic scenes and come back with classic associations. According to my present impressions I shall vote with the Senator from North Carolina for I can see no reason so far as regards our relations with the Roman Pontiff or with his dominions for sending a representative there.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will simply say in reply to the Senator from South Carolina that it is not proposed to send a minister to the Pope in his spiritual character at all. It is intended to evince sympathy with the progress of liberty, the spirit of freedom which has burst out in Italy, its former cradle, but for so long a period its grave. Pope Pius the IXth, is a potentate as well as head of the Catholic church throughout the Christian world. He has temporal powers, however, which authorize other countries to send ambassadors to him, and I can see no harm that can arise to ourselves in the adoption of the same course. So far as the office of charge d'affaires is concerned, I would say now in explanation of what I shall hereafter do, that if I could have my will I would abolish the office entirely. You send an agent abroad as chargé accredited to whom? Not to the sovereign powers of the country, but to the prime minister. He cannot, in his diplomatic capacity, approach the sovereign, and consequently, it lowers his standing, destroys his influence, and lessens his weight. Abolish it altogether. Fix the salary at the same rate if you please, but change the name. So far as the expense is concerned it is but a trifle, and I do hope that it will not be refused as the mission to Rome is, in some respects, important. As was said by the Senator from North Carolina, Rome is the emporium of the intelligence of Europe. Rome is the fountain of not only the literature but of the political knowledge of all Europe. So far as the objection of the Senator from South Carolina is concerned, that the Pope will send no representative, sir, let me tell it is well understood that if we send a mission it will be reciprocated.

Mr. CASS.—Mr. President, I did not intend to speak upon the question of sending a diplomatic agent to Rome, and had I not received some foreign journals, which contain a good deal of information on topics alluded to yesterday by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] I should have contented myself with a silent vote in favor of the proposition. That Senator seemed to call in question, if not the sincerity of the Pope, at least the importance of the reform he has thus far accomplished.

Mr. President, circumstances are occurring in Europe, which give to this whole subject, a new and interesting aspect. Undoubtedly the Papal dominions are neither large in their geographical extent, nor very important in their productions or population. Still however, they compose a state of the third order in Europe, like Portugal, Denmark and Sweden, and which is inferior to Holland, but superior to Greece. It stretches across the peninsula of Italy from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic, having Naples on the south, and the Tuscan and Austrian possessions on the north. It has two principal ports, Civita Vechia on the western coast, and Ancona on the eastern. It has not much commerce, nor are its manufactures or agriculture in a flourishing condition, owing to the abuses of the government and the oppression, which has prevailed there for many centuries. These states form a temporal sovereignty, governed by the Pope, the acknowledged head of the Catholic church. A good deal has been said, sir, about the impropriety of sending a diplomatic agent to an ecclesiastical court. But our relations with the Pope are with him as a temporal prince, and not as head of the Roman Catholic church. In the same manner and position as the head of a great branch of the Christian church, this government has no concern with. But with his dominions we have relations, and policy seems to me to require, that these should now be extended and augmented.

The last packet from Europe has brought us news of striking and stirring events there. A new revolution has broken out in France, and no man can tell when or where will be its end. Its appearance is no less portentous than unexpected, and in various other countries upon the continent of Europe the people are in commotion, feeling their wrongs, asserting their rights, and determined to burst the bonds of oppression in which they have been so long held.

We cannot mistake, and ought not to misunderstand these signs of the times. Human rights are everywhere advancing, or rather man is awakening to a knowledge of his rights, and a conviction of his strength. The desire of liberty is an instinctive feeling in the human breast; but the practical enjoyment of liberty secured against wild licentiousness is a problem sometimes of difficult solution. It was solved here by our institutions, by the nature of our society, and by the intelligence of our people. In fact we were always free; and it was rather the fear of oppression, the fear of the consequences of the establishment of British legislative supremacy in our internal concerns, than any actual oppression, which drove our fathers to resistance, and taught that blessed lesson of equal rights, which the world, if slow, is sure to learn. But in other countries, under less favorable circumstances, where despotism has entered into the social system the road to free governments is beset with trials and difficulties. The habits of society must be changed, and this itself is no easy task in the old regions of the eastern hemisphere. Effort after effort has often to be made; but experience and knowledge are acquired at every step of the progress, and the public mind is enlightened by the conflict itself. Excesses have taken place, which, while they cannot be justified, find much alleviation in the condition of things. Revolutions are made here by the ballot-box, but in Europe by the cartridge-box. Political intelligence, however, comes with time and experience, and if it comes with trials and sufferings, its advent is not the less certain, and will not prove the less efficacious. National struggles constitute a great school, where lessons of freedom are learned, and though they may be often checked and interrupted, still their progress is onward, and their result we may hope beyond the reach of arbitrary power. We are no propagandists. We acknowledge the right of all other people to establish and maintain their own governments in their own way, content to enjoy the same privilege ourselves. This has always been our principle, and I hope always will be; but we cannot shut our eyes to what is going on in the political world, nor ought we to shut our hearts against the emotions they naturally excite. If we ought not to give them our aid, we can give them our sympathy, and the sympathy of twenty millions of people cannot but exert a happy influence upon the struggling masses, contending for themselves, in our day, for what our fathers acquired for us in theirs.

Now, sir, I do not think that the Pope is liable to the charge of having done nothing to meliorate the political condition of the people over whom he reigns. We must recollect, and make allowances for the difficulties of his position. He cannot under all circumstances act as he would. He is in the neighborhood of strong military powers, opposed by principle and interest to political reforms. His people have been educated, and lived under a condition of things vastly different from ours. And he may well move with a degree of slowness incompatible with our ideas of political progress. But, sir, the London papers that I hold in my hand, received by the last packet, show, that he is still moving, and moving effectually. The following extracts are from the Daily News of February 15, 1848:

"Advices from Rome of the 14th have arrived, and bring the confirmation of the anticipations we lately expressed. Measures are being taken for the establishment of a constitution, the Pope himself only reserving to himself the power of veto, and the cardinal present in Rome to which he put the same question, and whose answer is stated to be favorable. The constitution in time is decided on. Nothing definitive seems to be made out carrying it into effect; but it was said that a mixed commission composed of one and laical would be appointed to prepare a draft of the constitution, which would be published with all convenient speed. Various reports were in circulation. Some, that there would be two Chambers; the higher consisting of Roman princes and cardinals, the second, of members of the council of State, &c. Cardinal Lambruschini supported the measure, as being quite adequate in the present state of Italy, and the only means of establishing union and concord between the superior clergy and the people."

ROME, February 15.

The journals of this morning have come out with red printing ink, to glorify the three constitutional charters of Turin, Tuscany, and Naples. The Pope sent yesterday a circular note to every cardinal in Rome to attend at the Quirinal, and though the consistory was secret its object is not doubted. Cardinal Patrizi, the vicar general of Rome, a retrograde and narrow-minded ascetic, has resigned his office, and is succeeded by Cardinal Vicchi, a man of enlarged understanding, and conversant with human nature.

The Jews of Rome have clubbed to furnish the civics with a field-piece.

The Pope makes no progress towards the performance of his promises! No progress, sir, when it is perfectly known in Rome that a new state of things upon more liberal principles is in preparation! When a constitution is discussed by the government and the people, and as openly announced, as it is confidently expected! No progress, when the journals of Rome are filled with the details of the revolutionary movements in Italy, and commend them to the favor of the Roman people! No progress, when cannon are openly purchased by the Jews and presented to their Christian brethren, formed into a civic guard! Remember where all this is, sir, under the very dome of St. Peter's, in the shade of the Colisseum, and where an unmitigated despotism has prevailed for ages. Has freedom gained nothing, when the seven hills themselves resound with the cries of liberty, and when the Vatican is open to the complaints and the demands of the people? These are pregnant signs, sir. The first step has been taken in that career, where there can be no retrograde movement. If the government had the will, it has not the power to stop it. If it is wise, it may direct it and bring it to a happy conclusion. But that can only be done by convincing the people of their sincerity, and of their disposition to establish liberal principles, suitable to the present age of the world. If this is done, it will be well done. If not, the oft renewed contest between the few and the many will take place, and in these days the many know their strength, and know how to exert it successfully.

It seems to me the Pope has shown himself both a wise and a liberal sovereign. Nothing proves his favorable disposition towards political meliorations better than the unquiet jealousy with which he is regarded by the despotic powers of Europe. Immediately on his elevation to the chair of St. Peter, this feeling manifested itself, in consequence of his avowed determination to reform the errors and abuses of his government. It is not a little curious, sir, that the justice which the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] refuses him, Lord Palmerston voluntarily tenders to the course of his policy. In a letter just published from that statesman to the British ambassador at Vienna, dated August 12, 1847, to be communicated to the Austrian government, he says:

"Her Majesty's government have received no information as to the existence of any such scheme as that which Prince Metternich mentions in his second despatch, as being planned for the purpose of uniting the now separate States of Italy in one federal republic; and her Majesty's government entirely agree with his Highness in thinking, for the reasons which he assigns, that such a scheme could not be accomplished. But, on the other hand, her Majesty's government have been convinced, by information which has reached them from a great variety of quarters, that deep, widely spread, and well-founded discontent exists in a large portion of Italy; and when it is considered how full of defects, and how teeming with abuses of all kinds, the present system of government in several of those States, and more especially in the Roman States and in the Kingdom of Naples, are known to be, it cannot be surprising that such evil-ing evils should generate the strongest discontent; and it is very possible that men who feel the full intensity of the grievances under which they now are, and have for a long series of years been, and who see no hope of redress from the present rulers, should take up any scheme, however wild, from which they may fancy they could derive a chance of relief.

"This observation does not, indeed, apply with full force to the Roman States, because the present Pope has shown a desire to adopt many of those much-needed reforms and improvements which in 1832 Austria, in conjunction with Great Britain, France, Russia, and Prussia, urgently advised the late Pope to carry into execution; and it may be hoped that if the Pope is encouraged and assisted by Austria and the other four powers, in removing the grievances of which his subjects have long complained, the discontent which those grievances have created will soon die away.

"But there are other States in Italy, and more especially in the Kingdom of Naples, where reforms and improvements are required almost as much so in the Roman territory; and her Majesty's government would hope that, as no European power is more interested than Austria in preserving the internal tranquility of Italy, so will the great and well-known influence of Austria in Naples be beneficially exercised in encouraging those reforms and improvements which will tend to remove the discontent from which alone would spring any dangers by which that tranquility is likely to be threatened.

"Your Excellency will read this despatch to Prince Metternich, and will give his Highness a copy of it. I am, &c.

[Signed.] "PALMERSTON."

In another letter of September 11th, he says:

"The Austrian government has recently asked, and has received the assent of the government of Great Britain to the principle, that the several States into which Italy is divided, are entitled to defend and maintain their independence; and that this independence ought to be respected, and to be held inviolate by all the other powers of Europe; and her Majesty's government, in expressing their assent to this indisputable proposition, coupled with it another, which they conceive to be equally undeniable, that every independent Sovereign has a right to make, within his own dominions, such reforms and improvements as he may judge conducive to the welfare of the people whom he governs; and that no other government can be entitled to forbid or to restrain such an exercise of one of the proper attributes of independent sovereignty; and her Majesty's government are convinced that the cabinet of Vienna must be ready to acknowledge so plain a political truth. Whatever reports, therefore, may have reached her Majesty's government as to late transactions and recent diplomatic communications in Italy, they are persuaded that the government of Austria cannot contemplate with any authorized any proceedings at variance with the principles above mentioned; and that neither with regard to the King of Sardinia nor with regard to the Pope, can the Austrian government have any intention of converting any measures of internal legislation or administrative reform which those sovereigns may think fit to adopt in their respective dominions, into an occasion for any aggression whatever upon their territories or rights. Her Majesty's government, indeed, would deeply regret the occurrence of events which it would be impossible for Great Britain to view with indifference.

"The crowns of Great Britain and of Sardinia have long been bound together by the ties of faithful and intimate alliance; and Great Britain can never forget or repudiate claims based upon such honorable grounds.

"The integrity of the Roman State may be considered as an essential element of the political independence of the Italian Peninsula; and no invasion of the territory of that State could take place without leading to consequences of great gravity and importance.

"Your Excellency will read this despatch to Prince Metternich, and will give him a copy of it. I am, &c.

[Signed.] PALMERSTON."

This is a remarkable correspondence. The despotism and abuses of the Italian government are distinctly acknowledged, as well as the necessity for changes and meliorations, and the beneficial efforts of the Pope are commended and approved. As soon as the Pope announced his intended reforms, the echo spread through Italy, animating the people of the Italian States, and exciting them to similar and vigorous action. A revolution is in progress in Naples, which, if not terminated by concessions on the part of the King, must end in the fall of the dynasty, or in the establishment of a republic. Whatever event may happen, freedom is sure to be the gainer by the movement. Tuscany, too, has heard and heeded this cry for liberty. And the latest news from there informs us that the "Grand Duke has given a constitution to Tuscany. The news has just arrived here, [Leghorn,] and as I write the fortress is saluting and the bells ringing." It is indeed to be more democratic than that of Piedmont; indeed it could not well be otherwise, as there are not the elements for a purely aristocratic chamber in Tuscany. I avail myself of a steamer starting for Genoa to send this. The King of Sardinia, but recently as deeply imbued with the spirit of despotism as any sovereign in Europe, in a proclamation issued on the 8th of last February, recognizes that the "THE TIMES HAVE KEPT PACE WITH GREATER THINGS;" an admission which is itself a pregnant proof of the progress of political reform, as already made. He lays down the programme of a constitution based upon a representative government, and with limitations and guarantees which will ensure much and provide the way for much more. He concludes with this remarkable paragraph. I have heard sentiments less liberal in places they would quite as well become as the court of Charles Albert:

"May God protect the new era which opens to our people, and may they can enjoy the great liberties acquired, of which they are and will be deserving, we expect from them the rigorous observances of laws in vigor, and the maintenance of the tranquility so necessary to the termination of the task of the internal organization of the State.

"Given at Turin, the 8th of February, &c.

CHARLES ALBERT."

Liberty must often be purchased by sacrifices. But when once established, it is worth all it costs. I am satisfied, that the French revolution, lamentable as many of its occurrences were, has conduced more to political freedom and social regeneration, than any of the events, perhaps I may say than all the events, which marked the progress of the five preceding centuries. It swept away the accumulated abuses and oppressions of ages, and it seems to have given new vigor to the human faculties as well as new power to human exertion. Let him who wishes to learn the last outrages of licentious power and the degradation of the people, study the history of France before the revolution.

Now, sir, it has been asked, why a diplomatic agent should be sent to Rome? For the same reason that similar agents are sent anywhere, and for other reasons, arising out of peculiar circumstances. We have some commerce with the Papal States, and many American citizens reside there, for longer or shorter periods, led by the study of the fine arts, and by those associations which will always make the eternal city an object of interest to all civilized people upon the face of the earth. This commerce and these citizens require protection. And besides, sir, we occupy an important position in the world. It is proper that we should be represented at the various European courts, where questions are daily arising interesting to us as well as to other nations. Our government may need a better knowledge of events than is furnished by the newspapers of the day. Rome is at all times of considerable importance, even in the political world. To be sure it does not possess much physical strength, but it possesses and exerts a moral power, a moral temporal power, which has often been sensibly felt in the world. And at the present moment the circumstances to which I have alluded have given it additional importance. The eyes of Christendom are upon its sovereign.—He has given the first blow to despotism—the first impetus to freedom. Much is expected of him. I hope and trust he will not disappoint these expectations, and while events are marching to their consummation, the diplomacy of Europe will find full employment at his court, and its ablest professors will be there. Our government ought to be represented there also. It is proper that the interest we feel under circumstances like these, should be displayed, if with proper caution, certainly without concealment.

As to the grade of the minister, I think it should be of the first class. The Congress of Vienna established three classes of diplomatic agents accredited to the sovereign or chief magistrate of a country—ambassadors, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, and ministers resident. The former we neither send nor receive; the two latter belong to our diplomacy. As to charges, they are accredited only to the Secretary of State, and not to the head of the government. Their situation, therefore, is not so favorable, as precedence of position was in those elements in the social and political systems of Europe. For myself I shall vote for a mission of the first class, and if that fails, for one of the second, and failing that, for a chargé. This is precisely one of those periods when, if we appear at a new European court, we should appear under the most favorable circumstances, and I do not think that the difference in pay merits a moment's serious consideration when compared with the objects to be obtained.

A good deal has been said about the political relation between England and Rome. Well, sir, there are no such relations openly subsisting between these two powers. Soon after the reformation an act of the English Parliament prohibited, under heavy penalties, all communication with the Papal court. That act yet remains in force, and no English representative has since then resided at Rome. But from the very necessity of the case, communications have subsisted, though they have been carried on through the English minister at Florence. The British government have, however, in fact, an agent at Rome—Lord Minto, who, though unacknowledged, is truly their representative there. But this position of things is found to be an awkward one, and a proposition is before Parliament to repeal the prohibitive act, passed in an age of intolerance. Public demonstrations, however, have been made against it, and one would scarcely have expected that feelings so unworthy of the times, would have been exhibited in the British capital as appear by the following extract to have manifested themselves:

"PROTESTANT ALLIANCE AGAINST ROME.—A numerously attended meeting was held yesterday at Willis's Rooms, King-street, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against the measure now meditating diplomatic relations with Rome. The lower part of the room was crowded with the partizans of the Rev. Mr. Tidman. Mr. Plowden, M. P. was occupied elsewhere, in the absence of the Earl of Winchilsea, was elected on motion from the Bishop of Llandaff, and several members of the House of Commons were also elected to attend. Mr. G. R. Clerk proposed the first resolution, to the effect that the measure introduced into the House of Lords was opposed to the Bible as Christians now read it, to the Act of Settlement, and would be a violation of the constitution. Mr. Hope, M. P. in a speech of the most fervid description, moved the second resolution, which was Matilda of Tuscany, bequeathed her possessions to the Pope. They embraced the patrimony of St. Peter, on the Mediterranean, extending from the mouth of the Tiber, to the present frontier of Tuscany, and the march of Ancona on the Adriatic, with the adjoining district of Spoleto. Large accessions were subsequently made by conquest—Umbria, Romagna, Perugia, Orvieto, Città di Castello, Bologna, Ravenna, and other cities and districts of country. In the 17th century, the Duke of Urbino abdicated in favor of the Pope; and at a still later period, some further additions were made by arms. Thus, the territorial possessions of the Pope are held, like those of other sovereigns, by succession, donation, and conquest. I consider the territorial possessions of the Church, as much the dominions of the Pope, as the territorial possessions of Spain, are the dominions of her Most Catholic Majesty; and I see no more reason to decline diplomatic relations in the first case than in the last, unless there is in other respects a propriety in doing so.

It is true, there is a peculiarity in the form of the Papal government, from the fact that, the temporal head of the State, is also the spiritual head of the Roman Catholic Church. The Senator from North Carolina very justly remarked, that his chief ministers were ecclesiastics. As is well known, the most important political body in the Roman States, is the Sacred College or the Cardinals, who are the princes of the Church. They are seventy in number, the same in number as the disciples sent out by the great Founder of the Christian faith, to preach the gospel to the world. Six are cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons. I believe, the number has been invariable for two hundred and fifty years, though it is not always full. All vacancies are filled by the Pope, who is chosen by the cardinals from their own body. The government is, therefore, an unlimited elective monarchy, or if you please, a hierarchy, of which the Pope is the head.

The government is administered, under the direction of the Pope, by the Secretary of State, who is a cardinal. He is aided by several departments, bureaus, or boards, the chief of which is the Camera Apostolica, corresponding with our treasury department. It is under the charge of the Chamberlain, who is aided by a number of cardinals and subordinates of different grades. There is also the Buon Governo charged with the municipal police of the States: the Sacra Consulta, to which is entrusted the civil and political administration of the provinces; and the Sacra Ruota, the great court of appeals in judicial proceedings. There are several more of these boards, of which I do not remember the names or the functions; but they are all under the direction of cardinals. The Chamberlain is the only one of these executive officers who is appointed for life; and the reason for the distinction is that he administers the government on the death of the Pope for nine days, when a new election takes place; and during that period he has the privilege of coining money in his own name. The Secretary of State, who is the Prime Minister and the confidential adviser of the Pope, besides having the general direction of the administrative functions of the government, presides especially over the Sacra Consulta, or the department for the provinces—to give it a name suited to its functions.

There is another class of official dignitaries of high rank, under the papal government—the Prelates. They are always of noble birth, but not always in holy orders. There are some two or three hundred of these dignitaries employed in various departments of the government. The place of the prelate often opens the way to higher preferment, and is next in importance to a membership of the Sacred College. These are the great officers of the government.

Mr. BADGER.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him—for my recollection is not very accurate, and I am taking a great deal of interest in what he is saying, and listening to him with much pleasure—whether I understand him correctly as saying that these prelates are not always in holy orders? Are they not either in holy orders, or else undergoing an ecclesiastical apprenticeship, which involves the design to take holy orders.

Mr. DIX.—I said they were not always in holy orders, and I believe I am not mistaken. They usually, if not uniformly, fill offices under the government. Some of them are governors of provinces under the denomination of Delegates; and many of them are employed in the executive departments. Some of them become cardinals, but I should not consider it accurate to say of them as a body, that they were undergoing an ecclesiastical apprenticeship.

Let me now turn to the political divisions of the papal States.

The papal dominons are divided into twenty provinces. The first is the Comarca of Rome. The other nineteen are divided into Legations and Delegations. The former are six in number, and have each a cardinal to preside over them. The latter are thirteen in number, with prelates as their presiding officers. Each province is divided into Communes, with peculiarities of local government.

In the provinces the Legations and Delegations have a council, (Congregazione di Governo,) consisting of the Gonfaloniere, or mayor, of the chief town, and from two to five councillors, according to the magnitude and importance of the province. They are named by the Pope, and hold their office for five years. The councillors have no vote; but when they differ in opinion from the presiding officer of the province, their reasons are reduced to writing and sent to the Secretary of State.

Some of the Delegations are divided into districts, with governors subordinate to the Delegate. Each district is again divided into Communes, with their ancient magistrates or conneils. These councils are close corporations, the members of which are self-elected, subject to the veto of the Delegate, and retain their seats for life. A Gonfaloniere, or mayor, elected from their own body by themselves, presides over them. Of these Communes there are some eight or nine hundred, if I remember accurately, with similar forms of administration.

Thus it will be seen that the whole government is as far removed as possible from popular influence. It is from the centre to the extremities founded and administered upon the principles of a close corporation.

The administration of justice partakes of the nature of the political organization. It is founded on the basis of the Corpus juris civilis and the Corpus juris canonici—the civil and canon law. All criminal proceedings are conducted with closed doors, and the testimony taken in writing. The accused is entitled to the aid of an advocate, called the "avvocato de poveri," the advocate of the poor, who is appointed by the Pope and paid by the government. Imprisonment is the chief punishment for crime, fines are rarely imposed, there is no such thing as liberation on bail, and the whole administration of criminal justice is so dilatory that there are always a very large number of persons imprisoned and awaiting their trial.

In all I have said it will be readily seen how much the present head of the Papal States has to reform—in the theme of the government, in its administration, and in criminal jurisprudence. There is no participation by the people in the administration of public affairs. In Tuscany, Napoleon introduced publicity in criminal proceedings, and it has survived all succeeding changes of the government. In Rome it is excluded. Whether it was introduced there by Napoleon after the deposition of the Pope and the establishment of the Kingdom of Rome, I do not know.

When reforms the Pope contemplates, how far he proposes to allow the people to participate in the administration of public affairs through the choice of their own magistrates and the enactment of their own laws, I have until very recently considered doubtful—nor is the extent of the reform he contemplates very distinctly understood now. It will be recollected that a few months ago he called together a council of delegates from the different provinces. I read his opening address to them with great care, supposing it would contain an outline of the political changes he contemplated. He stated that he had called them together for consultation, which seemed to exclude the idea of legislation; that extravagant expectations had been entertained as to his purposes, and that he intended to transmit to his successors unimpaired the authority he had derived from those who had preceded him. Not long before this annunciation was received, I was invited to attend a public meeting in the city of New York, called to express the general sympathy which was felt in his measures of reform. Not being able to attend, I addressed a letter to the committee of arrangements; and there were several other letters written by gentlemen of distinguished character, and some of them occupying high official stations. Not feeling at that time quite sure of the sequel, I did not indulge in the enthusiastic expressions which some of the letters contained. I endeavored to render the Pope full justice. I desire to do so now. And I must say that the recent intelligence from abroad justifies all the expectations which have been indulged in respect to his contemplated measures of reform. He has already done much for good government in Italy. He arrayed himself boldly at the outset against the influence of Austria—an influence which, since the general pacification of Europe in 1815, has been a perfect blight upon the growth and progress of popular freedom. He has resisted fearlessly the designs of that government upon the independence of the Roman people. He has refused to the Austrian troops a passage through his dominions for the purpose of aiding the King of the Two Sicilies in putting down the struggles of the Neapolitan and Sicilian people against the narrow-minded tyranny by which they have been oppressed. He has done more. He has formed a national guard in the Papal States; he has put arms into the hands of the Roman people, and he is preparing them by military exercises for the assertion and maintenance of their own rights. He has, in a word, given an impulse to popular freedom throughout Italy; and it is owing, in a great degree, to him, that constitutional forms of government have been given to the people of Sardinia, Tuscany, and the Two Sicilies.

The late arrival affords us still more gratifying evidence of his movements. Two papers have been put into my hands from which I will read brief extracts. The first is from a letter in the Courier des Etats Unis, dated in Paris, which I will translate literally:

"The sensation of the revolution in Naples has been felt, as I foresaw, in the other part of Italy. The King of Sardinia and the Grand Duke of Tuscany have also given to their subjects a constitution, modelled after the French Charter. Pius the Ninth has promised in a proclamation and in conversation with those around him, something analogous to it. In the meantime, he has changed his cabinet, and has formed a ministry composed almost entirely of laymen. This is a great reform."

The other extract is from the letter of the European correspondent of the National Intelligencer, published in this morning's paper. I will read it:

"The good and conscientious Pope has left nothing as to his power to grant a reformed constitution to his people, fearing that his doing so would interfere with the oath which he took at his accession to office, to hand down the temporalities of his kingdom unaigured to his successor. He submitted his doubts to a council of ecclesiastics learned in such matters, and the result is a decision that his yielding to the wishes of the people and the spirit of the times will not be an infringement upon his official oath. It is supposed, therefore, that the people of Rome will soon receive a constitution founded on the same principles as those of Naples, Sardinia, and Florence. His Holiness has advanced a great step by his employment of well qualified laymen in high positions in the State, which have hitherto been filled by ecclesiastics. Three vacancies lately occurred, and three liberal minded laymen succeeded three churchmen. How much does the world owe to Pius IX.! His liberal conduct first put the ball of reform in motion: it is not destined to stop until it has regenerated Europe."

Thus it appears that the Roman people are to receive from the Pope a constitutional government. And what I consider of great importance as a measure of reform, he has already begun to introduce laymen into his political councils. At the general pacification in 1815 it was understood that the chief ministers of the Pope were to be chosen from the laity. This understanding was violated: and it has been one of the leading causes of public discontent in the Papal States. It has been for a quarter of a century one of the reforms most earnestly sought for; and it may be hailed as the precursor of an ultimate separation of the ecclesiastic and secular branches of the Papal government, by conferring political offices on laymen, and confining churchmen to the exercise of their ecclesiastical functions—an arrangement favorable alike to the State and the Church, by promoting the purity of the one and the prosperity of the other.

While the Pope has much to reform, he has much to contend against—not only from the opposition of those who are hostile to all progress, but from the embarrassed condition of the finances of the Papal States. Some ten years ago the revenues were about nine millions of dollars; two millions and a half were derived from internal taxes, chiefly on landed property; about four millions and a half from the customs, excise, &c.; about nine hundred thousand dollars from lotteries, and the residue from miscellaneous sources. Some of these revenues were collected at an enormous expense. The revenue from lotteries for instance, which yielded nine hundred thousand dollars in the gross, cost about six hundred thousand in the collection, leaving only three hundred thousand in the treasury as an offset to the general demoralization, of which they were the cause. In the same year the expenditures exceeded the revenues about half a million of dollars. Four years ago, I understood the deficiency exceeded a million, and the preceding year a million and a half. From the difficulty of obtaining statistical information, I could not ascertain the amount of the public debt; but from the interest paid on it, amounting to about two millions and a half of dollars, exceeding one quarter of the entire revenue of the Papal States, it must have exceeded forty millions of dollars. It cannot now, I think, be less than fifty millions. It may be much more.

Sir, this is a very heavy pecuniary burden for a small State. The whole superficial area of the Papal States is about thirteen thousand square miles, less than one third the area of the State of New York, and a population, according to the raccolta or census of 1833, of two million seven hundred thousand souls, about the same as the population of New York. While Rome has two hundred and ten inhabitants to a square mile, from the difference in surface, New York has but sixty. The population of the Papal States is very unequally distributed. Only about one-third of the surface is cultivated, and a considerable portion is very thinly inhabited. I doubt whether the population has much increased during the last fifteen years. In 1833, the city of Rome had about one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants; in 1838, it had less than one hundred and forty-nine thousand—a slight decrease.

The Papal States have some commerce; but little is carried on in her own vessels. There are but two harbors for vessels of any considerable burthen—Civita Vecchia on the Mediterranean and Ancona on the Adriatic. The excellence of both ports is due in a good degree to the Emperor Trajan. There were other valuable ports once, but they have become useless for large vessels. Terracina, the ancient capital of the Volsci, was once a naval station of great importance; but it is now obstructed by deposites of sand. The Porto d' Anzo, the ancient Antium, about midway between Terracina and the mouth of the Tiber, is also obstructed and nearly useless from the same cause.

There is but one navigable river in the Papal States—the Tiber. As there have been some allusions to it in the course of the debate, I hope I shall be excused if I make some references also to its condition as to commerce and navigability. It empties into the Mediterranean seventeen miles from Rome. As it approaches the sea it divides into two channels. On the left arm stood the ancient Ostia. It has long since fallen into ruins, and a modern Ostia stands near it. But from the unhealthiness of the place, it is almost deserted, and the channel of the river is nearly filled up. The right arm is navigable to the sea. On this channel stood the ancient city of Portus; but only the ruins are now visible, and the modern town of Fiumicino has risen up a mile and a half below. The channel is narrow, deep and rapid. The description of Virgil, as he makes Æneas first see the Tiber, is still applicable to it. I do not know that I can quote him accurately, but if I do not, there are gentlemen of classical learning on both sides of the chamber, who will correct me:

> ——Ibam forte Tiberina ad ripam
> Vorticibus rapidis et multa flavus arena,
> In mare prorumpit.

The description is not inaccurate: with rapid whirlpools, and yellow with earth, it bursts into the sea. The current is so rapid, that vessels could only stem it with strong winds: but they are now towed up by steamers. Vessels of small size—among them a steamer—go up to Rome, and at some seasons there is a good deal of freighting done on it. Indeed, the river is navigable for boats to its juncture with the Nera, some forty miles above. But from the rapidity of the current near the city and below, deposits of sand are constantly obstructing the passage, and an annual appropriation of money is made to keep it open.

The exports of the Papal States are not large, but they are numerous. They consist of corn, oil, silk, skins, fruits, wood a substitute for indigo, which grows spontaneously in Southern Italy, and hemp, &c. Wool is exported in large quantities to England. I believe one of the most valuable exports is tobacco, of which they send abroad annually about 300,000 pounds.

They can scarcely be paid to have a commercial marine. Some ninety vessels, averaging probably about eighty tons each, constitute the whole, excepting that of fishing smacks, and small coasters. There are six merchant vessels in the City of New York with an aggregate tonnage exceeding the ninety merchant vessels of the Roman States. This, however, we need not regret; for if we can extend our commercial relations with them, we shall do all the carrying, both for them and ourselves.

Agriculture, the basis of all industry, is in a very depressed state, and from peculiar causes. The great peculiarity of the agriculture of the Papal States is the division of the champaign land into immense farms. The Campagna around Rome, called the "Agro Romano," (the Roman field,) the Maremma extending from the frontier of Tuscany, along the coast to the southward, and the low lands in other districts are owned by a few persons. The farms usually contain several thousand acres. The entire Agra Romano contains over eight hundred and fifty square miles. This tract is in the hands of about forty farmers, or "Mercanti di Campagna," as they are called. The farms are worked on the "Mezzeria" system, or at halves, under the direction of fattori or stewards, who occupy farm-houses on the land, while the owners live in the cities. The same system prevails in Tuscany, where it has worked tolerably well. In Rome it is thought exceedingly unfavorable to agricultural improvement. Something is attributable to the peculiarity of the Roman plain, in respect to climate and health, which renders it necessary to devote the greater part to grazing. In the winter it is covered with cattle and sheep—not less, perhaps, than a million of both, under the guardianship of shepards and herdsmen. As the summer advances, the Campagna becomes too unhealthy to be inhabited, and the cattle are driven to the Sabine hills, and even to the mountains of the Abruzzi. When the harvest season arrives, the heat becomes almost intolerable; and multitudes of the laborers, who come down from the mountains to gather the harvest, perish from the fatal effects of the Malaria. As soon as the grain is gathered, the Campagna becomes a desert until the summer heats are over. Neither men nor cattle are to be seen. The buffalo, who seem to be proof against the heavy pestilential vapors which the burning sun brings out from the humid earth, are almost the only inhabitants of the deserted plain from June to October.

With this imperfect agriculture, a complete monopoly is given to the rural proprietors by the corn-laws of the Papal States. When the price of flour on the Mediterranean is under $9, and on the Adriatic $8 25 per barrel, the introduction is prohibited. It is the same with wheat. When it is under about $1 40 the bushel on the Mediterranean, or $1 20 on the Adriatic, it is not allowed to be introduced. The operation of this system is to give the entire market to the Roman agriculturist, and by excluding the cheaper breadstuffs of the Levant and Austrian provinces on the eastern shore of the Adriatic, to compel the Roman people, in some districts, and in times of scarcity, to eat dear bread.

Notwithstanding the depressed condition of the industry of the Papal States, there is no country capable of a more rich or varied production; and if the measures of reform now in progress shall be carried out, and the social as well as the political condition of the people be elevated by the abrogation of bad laws, I know no State of the same magnitude, which may hope for a higher prosperity.

I have thus, Mr. President, presented some statistical details in respect to the condition of the Papal States—not with the expectation of influencing the vote of any Senator on this floor, but for the purpose of assigning the grounds on which I place my own. I am in favor of establishing diplomatic intercourse with Rome; first, with a view to friendly relations—the object for which most missions are created; and second, with a view to commerce. I repeat, I do not regard the mission as political, unless that term be understood in its broadest sense; and in this view of the mission I am political. I consider it our sacred duty to keep aloof from the internal agitations of European States, and from the movements of their sovereigns and people. We must sympathize with everything that is favorable to freedom; but we can do no more. Our rule of action is non-intervention in the political concerns of the eastern hemisphere; and by a rigid adherence to it, we may with the more confidence insist on an application of the same principle by European States to the political concerns of the independent communities on this continent. I look then, first, to friendly relations with central Italy.

But I look chiefly to commerce. Depressed as the industry of Rome is, I think something may be done to extend our commercial relations and intercourse with her, and perhaps also with Tuscany, lying on her borders. Great Britain has an immense trade with the Mediterranean. She sends every year fifteen millions of dollars in value of her own products into Italy alone, and probably from five to ten millions more of foreign products, which she imports for re-exportation. A portion of this lucrative trade legitimately, should be ours; and I think we may obtain it, if we send a discreet and intelligent man to Italy.

I voted for a minister plenipotentiary, as proposed by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) supposing it would be followed, if his amendment had prevailed, by a proposition to abolish the post of charge d'affaires at Naples. The post of charge d'affaires at Turin I would not have touched. Sardinia is distant, and has distinct commercial interests. But we might have sent a minister with full powers to central and southern Italy, to reside a part of the time at Rome, and part of the time at Naples—an arrangement not unprecedented in diplomatic intercourse with states bordering on each other. I thought, in opening diplomatic intercourse with Rome, it should be done in the mode most acceptable. A minister is accredited to the sovereign of the country to which he is sent—a charge d'affaires to the secretary of foreign affairs, or the chief executive department. A minister would be on a footing with the diplomatic representatives of the States of Europe, at the Papal court—a charge will be inferior in grade and in influence. Rome and Naples are but 160 miles apart. Four years ago, a railroad was in a course of construction from Naples to the Roman frontier. It was nearly finished to Capua. Gregory the 16th. the predecessor of ihe present Pope, refused to charter railroad companies. He did not encourage foreign intercourse, social or commercial. Pius the IX, is of a totally different temper. He is desirous of promoting in every way, facilitities for communication, foreign and domestic. He has chartered a company to construct a railway to Civita Vecchia; and another, as I understand, to meet the Neapolitan railroad at Terracina. In two years, Rome and Naples will probably be but five hours apart. The arrangement suggested would, therefore, have been convenient as well as proper. But, as the proposition failed, I shall vote for a minister resident.

Before I conclude, I wish to say a few words on the religious question. I have already said, I do not regard it, in any sense, as a religious mission; nor can I conceive that it can be properly so considered. Gentlemen have gone so far as to suppose that it will be repugnant to the Protestant feeilngs of the country. I cannot believe there is any just ground for such an apprehension. We send a diplomatic representative to the Emperor of China, who claims to be the sole vicegerent of the Supreme Being on earth. We have a minister at Constantinople, and three consuls, salaried officers, exercising diplomatic functions, in Syria—two in the Barbary States, and one in the Empire of Morocco; and the people of all these countries are either Turks, Moors, Berbers or Jews, all utterly denying the authenticity of the Christian faith. And yet, when it is proposed to send a diplomatic representative to a temporal sovereign in Europe, it is objected that the Protestant feelings of the country may be wounded, because he is also the head of a most respectable and important branch of the Christian church. Sir, I cannot comprehend this feeling, and I am, therefore, disposed to doubt its existence. At all events, I shall vote for the appropriation; and trust to my Protestant friends for a just appreciation of my motives.

Mr. BADGER.—It is not my intention to enter into this discussion, for I have already stated the grounds upon which I am opposed to this mission in any form; but simply to make one or two remarks which have been suggested to me by what has been said by the honorable Senators from New York and Michigan. The Senator from Michigan seem to suppose that I have said that the present Pope has done nothing for the amelioration of the condition of his subjects. I am very certain sir, that I never intended to say any thing of the kind, and I do not think I did say it. I have said this, and I repeat it, that while the Pope is a good man, and a wise prince, and I believe has done several things for the present benefit and relief of the people of Rome he has done nothing towards establishing a free government in Rome, that he has done nothing to relax that absolute authority which he has received from his predecessors.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him—

Mr. BADGER.—I hope I shall not be interrupted.

Mr. FOOTE.—Have I not a right to explain?

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from North Carolina does not yield the floor.

Mr. BADGER.—I am speaking now of the views which I have heretofore submitted to the Senate, or which I intended to submit for the purpose of correcting what has fallen from the honorable Senator from Michigan this morning. The position I have taken is, that the Pope has done nothing to secure to his subjects any share in the administration of the government, that he has established no barrier against the use, either by himself, or by his successors, of the absolute power which he possesses. No doubt as a wise Prince he has done many things for which he is entitled to high credit; he is disposed to patronize the present schemes and projects for opening communications by railroads; and the other improvements of the day. He has established a national guard, and put arms into the hands of his subjects. He has endeavored to attract the affection of his subjects, and to engage their personal regard by showing himself solicitous to promote their interests. He has as a wise prince taken measures to prevent the interference of Austrian influence which has always been deleterious to the minor states of Italy as we all know. All this he has done, and for this he deserves credit, but what I mamtain is, that the Pope has yet done nothing to establish a free government in the Papal dominions, and nothing has yet been pointed out by any gentleman who has spoken upon this subject, nothing has been done by him which shows him belong to that class of reformers. The honorable Senator from Michigan after reading an extract from some letter or speech, I did not exactly understand which—of Lord Palmerston——

Mr. CASS.—It was a letter.

Mr. BADGER——a letter of Lord Palmerston in which his Lordship remarks upon the desire of the Pope to make some reforms in the government of his states, remarked that his Lordship had done more justice to the Roman Pontiff, than he had received at my hands. Why I have had no means of determining what his desires or purposes were. I can only ascertain what he wishes to accomplish, by what he does. Well now I ask what has he done? Why it is said he has called a consistory, and that the distinguished ecclesiastics who belonged to it were in consultation upon the propriety of making certain organic changes, and that it is understood that their impressions or opinions, were favorable to the establishment of a constitution, but what kind of constitution is yet unknown. It is remarked that the Pope intends to establish some sort of a constitution. Well this may be so. He may design to do so, and he may accomplish it. When he does accomplish it he will entitle himself to still higher praise than he has yet earned by any thing that is past.

The honorable Senator from Michigan will also recollect that in the address which the Pope himself made to some public assembly, he stated that it was his design to transmit entire to his successors, the same authority which he had received from those who went before him. Whether his Holiness has changed his mind on that subject I know not, but here is a public authentic declaration of his intention, to retain his power undiminished. In opposition to that, we have a rumor that in a consistory, a project for some kind of a constitution has received favorable consideration. We have been also told by the Senator from Michigan, and by the Senator from New York, that all the Protestant powers of Europe, have sent representatives to the Papal court, and that we send representatives to Turkey and China. Now the Emperor of China claims to be the Vicegerent on earth.

Mr. DIX, (in his seat.)—The sole Vicegerent.

Mr. BADGER.—That claim stands exactly on the same foot ing as that of the Pope. But certainly I never objected to sending a mission to his Holiness if the interests of the country required it—if we had commerce to be protected there, or any object connected with the welfare or advancement of the country to be accomplished. That is my view. Show me that the mission can be sustained on such grounds, and every objection which I have urged falls to the ground. But it must be conceded—certainly it has been generally conceded, if I apprehend correctly the remarks of gentlemen, who have taken part in the debate, that we have no commercial interests in the Papal states that require the protection of such a mission. My friend from New York says, that he would gladly see our commerce in Italy and the Mediterranean extended. So should I, but are we likely to obtain the fulfilment of our wishes by this mission to Rome. Assuredly my friend has not given ship-masters a very inviting description of the facilities which the Tiber, either now or as it was in the days of ancient Rome, presents for the profitable prosecution of commere. A river which is described as a whirlpool, and in which the tide is so swift, that it pours itself filled with yellow sands into the ocean; seems to hold out a very uninviting prospect to the eyes of a shipmaster, looking out for some profitable commercial opening. However, it must be conceded at all events, that at present there is no commerce to be protected, and if it is with a prospective view that the mission is to be established, I think that we should give the subject a little more consideration before we adopt such a measure.

The Senator from Michigan does not agree that this can be considered as a mission to the Pope in his ecclesiastical character. It is contended by the Senator, that he is a temporal, as well as a spiritual prince, and that it is in the former capacity alone, we would establish with him this diplomatic relation. Well, now, it is clear, and I think the honorable Senator himself has proved it in his observations, that the temporal authority of the Pope is a mere incident to his ecclesiastical dominion, and the historial account given given to us by the honorable Senator from New York, as to the mode in which the Papal dominion is formed is a striking proof of the correctness of that view of his character.

At first the Pope, though the first Bishop of Italy, was without any temporal authority. A small Dutchy was given to him to which subsequent additions were made either by negotiation or conquest, or the pious donations of members of the church for the purpose of giving dignity and respectability to the Church's head. Indeed the Senator from Michigan tells us that notwithstanding the new regulation introduced for the purpose of getting over all the difficulties in European countries about precedence by which the minister holding the oldest commission of his grade takes rank, yet in every court in Europe, by common consent, the Pope's ambassador takes precedence of the minister of the oldest and most powerful State; and this appears to me to furnish additional evidence of the correctness of my view. For, is it because he is the representative of a temporal prince who has under his authority two and a half millions of people that the Pope's ambassador takes precedence of the ministers of Austria, of Russia, of Prussia, of France, and even of Great Britain, who, since the time of Queen Elizabeth, I suppose indeed from the time of Edward the VIth, has had no formal diplomatic connection with Rome? What is this deference but a token of respect to the great spiritual head of the Roman Catholic Church, who looks through the whole wide extent of this earth and finds subjects amongst the people of every nation, and tongue, and kindred? Why, I see this morning in the New York Herald, a proclamation of the Pope addressed to Roman Catholics everywhere, in view of the reforms which he is making and the probable hostility which he may provoke in some of the neighboring powers. In that proclamation his Holiness says:

"But we principally—we, the head and sovereign Pontiff of the entire Holy Catholic religion, should we not have in our embrace, and cherish with paternal love, even our most cruel persecutors, who would refuse the name of children to the embrace of their father? It is indeed a great blessing that there is at present in Europe a monarch, who is proud to rule over 2,000,000 of our subjects, [meaning the Queen of England] a nation and of every tongue."

Here the Pope issues his proclamation not to his own immediate subjects in the Papal States, but to the whole Roman Catholic population of the world calling upon them in case of any interference with his projected reforms to render him assistance and enable him successfully to accomplish his desires. His, then, is unquestionably a spiritual sovereignty, a spiritual jurisdiction, and it was upon that ground that I thought, and still think, that the Protestant population of the United States would not only feel deeply aggrieved by the establishment of this mission, but I believe they would have a right to look upon it as giving undue advantage to another section of the Christian church.

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. President: Circumstances have devolved upon me a painful duty. I am not very conversant with parliamentary usages, but I hope some of these days to master completely that profound and invaluable branch of modern science. I am informed though, by the oldest, most experienced, and most accomplished members of this body, that it is a well understood and universally respected usage of the Senate, that when any Senator is addressing the body, if a brother Senator requests the privilege of explaining, an immediate opportunity of doing so is accorded to him. Well, sir, whilst the Senator from North Carolina was speaking a few minutes since, I rose and courteously asked to be allowed to explain, which the Senator, as I think, most abruptly refused. Sir, I am not too much excited to permit the Senator to explain his conduct, if he choose to do so; though I beg leave to premise, that if an explanation completely satisfactory shall not be immediately rendered, I have words to utter that I presume will be anything but agreeable to the Senator from North Carolina. And now I demand of him, whether, in refusing to yield the floor, when I applied for it, he intended any discourtesy or disrespect to me?

Mr. BADGER.—I shall say precisely what I should have said, if the Senator from Mississippi had not concluded with the observations which he has made. I declined to yield the floor to him, without any idea in the world that such refusal could be an insult or discourtesy to any gentleman in the chamber, but simply because the as I was engaged in replying to what had been said by others in the debate, I did not perceive how any explanation or inquiry which could be given or put by the Senator from Mississippi could aid in the discussion in which I was engaged.

Mr. FOOTE.—I understand the Senator to disclaim all intentional disrespect; and yet his present explanation appears at least to imply some discourtesy, as he seems to have acted upon a presumption not very respectful to me certainly, that I was capable of attempting to interrupt a Senator's speech, by mere impertinence.

Mr. BADGER.—That's no word of mine!

Mr. FOOTE.—Very well. I leave the subject. But now, sir, whilst I am up and in the right humor for further explanations, I will announce, once for all, that whilst I am not much in the habit of reading what is daily published in certain whig newspapers in ridicule and denunciation of my conduct here, and whilst I hope that my sensibilities are not particularly pervious to such petty assailment from mercenary scribblers, yet I could not help noticing the fact that in more than one whig newspaper lately, I have seen it declared to be a formed and deliberate design of certain Senators here to unite their forces for the purpose of reducing me to contempt by cautiously refraining from any direct notice of my remarks, but responding nevertheless to what may come from me deemed worthy of notice, as if the same had originated with others on this side of the chamber. This statement is only deemed important as connected with certain transactions of actual occurrence in this body, and as more or less illustrating what others beside myself have several times observed to take place. I shall not now go farther into particulars, but I take leave to say, that if Senators have conspired to pursue this course towards me, they are perfectly welcome to do so. But I shall nevertheless not be in the least degree restrained from replying to any thing which may be said by them which I shall deem it right thus to notice, and that no arrangement which may be fallen upon, either of the kind mentioned or of any other nature, will preclude me from the full exercise of my rights here as the representative of a sovereign State upon this floor. I beg leave further to say, what I have several times hinted before, that I do most sincerely defer to many worthy gentlemen here, whose superior experience, wisdom, and efficiency, I gladly acknowledge; yet that I claim, in my official capacity perfect equality of power and dignity with the proudest Senator in this hall, and that I shall at all times be prepared to vindicate my rights against assailment from any quarter whatever, whether open and manly or covert and insidious. I conclude with the words of a distinguished member of this body, uttered in this chamber some years since. "This is a Senate of equals, composed of men of individual worth and of absolute independence. We know no masters; we acknowledge no superiors."

Mr. MANGUM.—I do not rise to protract this debate, but simply to state the grounds on which my vote will be given. I have regretted that any irrelevant topics have been introduced. I have listened with great interest to the expositions given to-day, and especially to the remarks of the Senator from New York. He, I know, has had opportunities of acquiring valuable information on the subject of the government of the Papal States, having for some time resided at Rome, and his views are thus entitled to great consideration, for I have been long convinced that the knowledge acquired from books with regard to the social and political condition of mankind is always more or less defective, and is far inferior to that to be obtained by looking at the people themselves. I have also listened with interest to the expression of the views of my colleague on other aspects of the case. His views were presented with great clearness, and on some points his argument was, in my opinion, quite conclusive. But I think our action on this matter should be determined on other grounds entirely. In one point of view, the remarks of the Senator from New York made a strong impression upon my mind. He gave the extent of the commercial traffic of Rome. I understand the commerce of Great Britain with the Papal States amounts to some fourteen millions of dollars.

Mr. DIX.—The commerce in all Italy.

Mr. MANGUM.—Including Naples, Turin and other ports. At these two points we have already diplomatic representatives. I indicated yesterday that this subject had been the topic of a conversation some years ago in a very intelligent circle, and it had struck me very forcibly that we could unite these missions in one of the first grade, which, with the aid of consuls, or consuls general, as might be thought most expedient, would be eminently desirable. Although I go for the doctrine of non-intervention as strongly as any one, and hold that it is no part of our mission to interfere with the creed, civil, religious, or political, of any other people, yet it is in my judgment, vastly important that we should be correctly informed in regard to great political movements in other parts of the world, that may affect our commercial interests and in effect, perhaps, our political condition. In that view, Rome, as the great point of confluence of the intelligence and influential classes of the European world, might be a favorable location for a mission. From that point we might be able to penetrate Austria and other States of Europe, learning many things of importance to us to know.

As regards the religious considerations which have been involved in this case, I repeat what I said yesterday that we cannot allow them any weight. The government of this country is not permitted to descend into contact with any church influences; and it is, I think, one of the wisest provisions in our system of government, that every man is secured in the enjoyment of his religious rights, being free to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience. It is owing to that that we are wholly free from those collisions between sects which have agitated other nations. All the churches stand on the same basis, and alike depend wholly on the voluntary support of their own members. This is as it ought to be; and therefore, in the present case, with me, the religious consideration has not the weight of a feather, I should like to know the religion of the Imaum of Muscat! What, again, have we to do with considerations of the form of civil government in reference to the establishment of diplomatic relations with any country? All we look to is the existence of a recognized government with which we can make commercial treaties; and the only question that presents itself in such a case is whether the commercial inducements are sufficient to authorize the establishment of such a mission. Why, in each of the small insignificant Barbary States, we have an agent for commercial purposes, and charged also with political trusts. Are we influenced by religious considerations in those cases? Not at all. We regard simply our commercial interests, and add to that the great political considerations which may render the agent influential. And here I would again express my desire that a greater degree of dignity and respectability might be given to the diplomatic agents of the United States by a more liberal provision for their support. In this business, Great Britain exhibits her usual sagacity. She has connected herself with every commercial power on the face of the globe—every branch of commerce has been carefully protected in every sea, and wherever she has sent her agents, they appear with a prestige—that sort of respectability that grows out of the possession of adequate means to live in a style becoming their position. Perhaps no small degree of the commercial greatness of Great Britain has been owing to the wisdom and liberality with which she has managed her diplomatic missions.

I have regretted the appearance of any excitement on this subject. Certainly in my judgment the subject of itself is not calculated to create any such feeling. The honorable Senator from Mississippi will suffer me to say that his sensibility on this subject, in consequence of the idea that there is any purpose entertained on this side of the chamber by any gentleman to treat him with any less respect or consideration on this floor, than that which is extended to all, has been needlessly excited. I not only do not know of any such design to treat him with discourtesy, but I am sure that no such purpose can be be entertained. There is not any such purpose on the part of my colleague, and I think that the excitement which has been manifested on this subject, has been altogether disproportioned to the importance of the case.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have had some hesitation in determining upon the vote which I intend to give on this question, and I rise to state the reasons which induce me to vote against the proposition to strike out. In the first place, I may refer to those considerations which have with me, little or no weight. I do not favor this mission because the Pope is a reformer, though I do not at all doubt that he is a very wise and liberal reformer. I am inclined to think that he has gone as far as he ought to go, considering the nature of his power and the people whom he governs; and I do not think the less of him on that account; but on the contrary I am the more favorably impressed by his wisdom in proceeding cautiously. There is very little confidence to be reposed in any reform that originates in force and violence. But, sir, I do not think the fact that the Pope is a reformer, furnishes a sufficient reason for the establishment of a diplomatic mission to the Papal states. I am in favor of non-interference in the highest sense. I wish him well. I desire his success. Although as I believe the Pope will not be able to proceed far, yet he will succeed to some extent in ameliorating the condition of his people. Again, it is to be considered that recent occurrences in Europe may put an end to the present movement of the Pope. A counter movement may be made. He is in favor of proceeding slowly; but there is a people north of his dominion, who are of a very different temperament; and who spring at a bound to the object at which they aim. How far the Pope may be intimidated or influenced by these occurrences, time will show.

As to another consideration which has been presented in this debate, according to my conception, the federal government has nothing whatever to do with religion. The states may act upon that subject, but certainly there is no power here to do so; and we have no right to be influenced at all by considerations of that nature. And here let me say, in reference to a remark made by the Senator from Michigan, that I do hope that rule which he says prevails in Europe with regard to the precedence of the Pope's legate, will not be permitted to operate here. Our established rule is, that the minister bearing the oldest commission in each grade, takes precedence. I feel assured, that to give precedence here to the Pope's legate, upon spiritual grounds, which is the case in Europe, would produce a very undesirable and dangerous excitement. If the Pope should entertain any design of sending a legate to this government, I trust that the precaution of informing him with regard to the difficulty on this point, will be observed.

Nor do I vote for this mission upon commercial grounds. Our commerce with Rome is inconsiderable, and is not likely to improve. It is not sufficiently important to require the presence of a chargé, and has been heretofore very well attended to by our consul. The fact, alluded to by an honorable Senator, that Rome was a point of confluence for great numbers travelling for amusement and instruction, ought not to influence our action.

It may, then, be asked, why I am induced to favor this mission? My reason is to be found in the present political condition of affairs. The Italian States, not under the authority of Austria, and perhaps, I may add, some of these under the control of that power, are in a state of revolution, which, in Italy, may very likely run to some excess. We know that the Pope is the central moving power of this reform. We know that the Pope has the power of controlling these movements. Now, reform in Italy may run into a certain degree of violence and disorder; and it may be very important that we should be able through the Pope to guard our commerce, and protect our citizens engaged in commerce from injury. I believe that Rome is the most favorable point at which you could place a minister, if events in Italy should take a certain direction. The reason is a temporary one, and I should therefore put this mission on a temporary basis. It is possible, that besides affording protection to it, in the event of certain occurrences, through the influence of the Pope, a liberal turn might be given to our commerce in Italy. Though, that, under his immediate direction, is not important, yet the commerce of the whole of Italy is very important, and may be made still more so. A large portion of Italy is admirably cultivated—better perhaps than any other portion of Europe, and is inhabited by a thriving and vigorous population. For these reasons I am induced to cast my vote against striking out the provision of the bill.

Mr. CASS.—I have one word to say with regard to the question of the precedence of the Pope's legate. In Europe, by universal consent, the Pope's legate takes precedence of any member of the same grade in the diplomatic corps. This is not a mere matter of form there. It is a part of the general law, and carries with it some substantial advantages. In this country, of course, the principle is unknown, and I really do not see how the government can be called on to settle such a question.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It has settled it.

Mr. CASS.—Well, I cannot imagine how such a question could arise, except as a matter of etiquette in going to the dinner table.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator certainly must know that as between the diplomatic corps this is a point insisted upon, and that it has been passed upon here. Within my recollection a case has occurred in which swords were drawn between the French and English ministers in the ante-chamber of the Presidential mansion; and during the short period in which I was in the department of State, the point was presented, requiring grave deliberation, so much so that in that case I thought proper to consult Mr. Adams, who had had more experience in such matters.

Mr. CASS.—That case does not apply to the point of my remarks.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It was then established that any minister should take rank according to the date of his commission. Though as between ourselves there may be no question of this kind, yet there can be no doubt that if the Pope's legate, if sent here, should take precedence of all the other members of the diplomatic corps in the face of this established principle, I take it for granted that his claim would not be respected; and the Pope should be apprised of it.

Mr. CASS.—I assure the honorable Senator from South Carolina that were the Pope's minister here, every member of the diplomatic corps would make his bow to him and allow him to pass first to the dinner table.

The yeas and nays were then seconded and taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bernen, Butler, Hale, Hannegan, and Rusk—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Bagby, Bell, Bradbury, Breese, Calhoun, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Dayton, of Del., Dayton, of Miss., Davton, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Ewing, Foote, George, Hunter, Johnson, of La., Johnson, of Md., Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalf, Moor, Niles, Phelps, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Westcott, and Wilcox—36.

The amendment was then agreed to, and no other amendment being offered, it was Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time as amended.

Resolved, That the bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

CHURCH LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the trustees and members of the Catholic church of St. Augustine, submitted a report accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of B. Madeore, Vicar General, &c., and the memorial of the trustees and members of the Catholic church at St. Augustine, Florida, and all the accompanying papers, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that the Secretary of the Senate cause the translations of papers filed to be corrected and verified before the same are printed, and all said documents to be transmitted to the Solicitor of the Treasury, who is directed to examine the same and investigate said case, and procure copies of all documents and papers relating thereto, in the public departments or offices, and other testimony that he can obtain, relating to the title of the United States to the property claimed, and communicate the same to the Senate, and make report as to the merits of said case as early as practicable during the present session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE LOAN BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were suspended, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of sixteen millions of dollars; and it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1848.

MEMORIALS ETC. OF LEGISLATURES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, praying the adoption of measures for ensuring greater regularity in the transportation of the United States' mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of said State, in favor of the passage of an act ceding to that State a portion of public land for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Big Black river, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATCHISON presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying the adoption of measures for the extinguishment of the Indian title to certain lands in that territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented a petition of citizens of Peoria county, Illinois, praying that the public domain may be distributed in suitable quantities to actual settlers, not possessed of other lands, without price; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Rebecca Robeson, widow of a deceased revolutionary officer, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Cadwalader Evans, praying the purchase, by the government, of his patent-right for an invention for preventing the explosion of steam-boilers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a petition of citizens of Apalachicola, Florida, praying an alteration of the plan of the light-house now in progress of construction on Cape San Blas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MOOR presented a petition of Albert Dole, and others, citizens of the United States, praying certain modifications of the patent laws, and a repeal of the act of February 26, 1845, extending a patent heretofore granted to William Woodworth; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a petition of Albert Dole and others, citizens of the United States, praying an amendment of the 17th section of the act of July 4, 1836, in relation to granting injunctions against patent rights; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a petition of citizens of Maine and Massachusetts, praying that lumber manufactured in New Brunswick, from timber grown in the State of Maine, may be admitted into the United States free of duty.

Mr. MOOR said: As this is a matter of considerable importance to the State I in part represent, as well as to these petitioners, I feel it to be my duty to state some of the facts connected with the subject. In the treaty of Washington is contained a provision for the benefit of the inhabitants of that part of Maine which is watered by the St. John's river and its tributaries, and as the provision may not be familiar to the Senate, I beg leave to read from the treaty:

"It provides 'that the produce of the forest in logs, lumber, timber boards, staves and shingles, grown in so much of those parts of the State of Maine as lies on the river St. John's and its tributaries, having their sources in the State of Maine, to and from the seaport at the mouth of said river, St. John's, and round the falls of said river, either by boats, rafts, or otherwise.'"

This clause was inserted avowedly for the purpose of promoting the interests, and stimulating the industry of the inhabitants of that particular part of the country. There is also another provision which says that the agricultural produce of the state of Maine, passing through the province of New Brunswick, shall be dealt with as it it were grown in that province. Under this provision the authorities of New Brunswick have imposed upon all the lumber of the state of Maine, which passes through that province an export duty. Formerly there was a crown land duty of a shilling a ton, upon all timber cut on the crown land in New Brunswick, but after the passage of the treaty, that duty was remitted, and an export duty was imposed upon their own lumber, and ours also, thus subjecting the timber grown in the state of Maine, which is bound to pass through New Brunswick in order to reach a market at home or abroad, to taxation.

Now the citizens of Maine generally believe that this tax is a violation of, at least, the spirit of the treaty of Washington—if that treaty ever had any spirit. They believe it is a wrong inflicted upon them—that it is an invasion of their rights. I shall on some future occasion call the attention of the Senate to this subject by a resolution calling upon the President for the correspondence which has passed between this government and the government of Great Britain touching this imposition of duties upon American lumber.

The object of this petition is to meet another evil. The lumber of the State of Maine that is cut upon the waters of the St. John's and its tributaries not only meets with this imposition of duties under the provincial law, but it also encounters a legislative enactment at home which denationalizes it. The tariff of 1846 imposes a duty upon lumber imported into the United States, and the construction put upon this is that all lumber which is manufactured in New Brunswick, although it may have been taken from the State of Maine originally, upon re-entering the State is subject to this duty. But that which is cut on the south and west side of the St. John's river on American soil must be manufactured in New Brunswick in order to be fitted for the market—and being manufactured there under the construction given to the law by the Secretary of the Treasury it becomes denationalized, and before it can reach the market a duty has to be paid of some two dollars and a half a thousand. It is to remedy this evil that these memorialists have petitioned Congress. I will state the amount of interest which the State of Maine has in this matter. There are one hundred and forty townships of land drained by the St. John's and its tributaries, and lying on the south and west side of that river, within the State of Maine, each township containing about twenty-three thousand acres, making a territory equal to five thousand square miles, nearly as large as one of the smaller states of the Union. This territory is well timbered, and the enterprise of our citizens has induced them to carry their operations even beyond the highlands, which were divided by Great Britain as the dividing line between this country and the Province of New Brunswick. A large portion of the produce of this vast tract of land must necessarily go down the St. John's river, and in doing so, the owners have to pay a provincial duty of fifty cents a thousand, in addition to the duties of two dollars and fifty cents a thousand—making altogether three dollars a thousand. This amounts to a prohibition. A portion of this land is owned by citizens of the State of Maine and Massachusetts, but chiefly by the two States, and in consequence of these duties lumber, the product of the forests of Maine, is excluded from our own market. For the purpose of urthering the views of the petitioners, I give notice, that I will to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill; and for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the correspondence between our government and the government of Great Britain, relative to our rights under the third article of the treaty of Washington, I have a resolution, which when in order, I will ask permission to offer. I ask that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I would suggest that it ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations or to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOOR.—It seeks for relief from the operation of the revenue laws. The duties now imposed amount to a prohibition. I suppose the Finance Committee to be the appropriate committee. The correspondence when received will go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a memorial of Nathan Cummings and others, citizens of the United States and owners of lands supposed to be, at the time of purchasing, within the limits of the State of Maine, but since ceded by the treaty of Washington to Great Britain, praying that the products of those lands may be admitted into the ports of the United States free of duties.

Mr. BRADBURY said: The petitioners in this case are citizens of the United States, and nearly all of them of the State of Maine. They are, in some respects, similarly situated with those whose petition has just been presented by my colleague. They are the owners of land within the former limits of that State. Congress, with great unanimity, declared our boundary to be such as embraced the region where this land is situated. The purchase was made, as the petitioners alledge, in the full belief that the land was, and would be held to be, within our limits. It was of a very considerable tract, more than two hundred and thirty thousand acres I think, and for which a large amount of money was paid. By the treaty of Washington this land is placed within the Province of Lower Canada. It is valuable principally for the timber upon it; and this timber is now subject to onerous burdens.

The petitioners ask for relief, either by an appropriation that shall afford them adequate compensation for the damages sustained by the cession which placed their land out of the limits of the United States, or by a remission of duties on their lumber, and allowing it to be entered and sold in our own markets duty free. And they further ask the interposition of this government to procure an exemption of their timber from the export duty imposed on it when passing down the St. John's river.

So far as it relates to timber cut upon lands within the State, the imposition of the export duty by the Provincial government of New Brunswick, is regarded as a violation of stipulations in the treaty of Washington. It is in manifest violation of the spirit of that treaty and of a right intended to be secured.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Thomas Roll, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a Pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXPORT DUTIES ON AMERICAN LUMBER.

Mr. MOOR submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, copies of the correspondence which has taken place since August, 1842, between the authorities of the American and British governments in relation to export duties on American lumber exacted or levied by the Provincial or other British authorities in New Brunswick; or copies of such portions of that correspondence as may be communicated without detriment to the public interest.

TARIFF OF FEES IN U. S. COURTS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an uniform tariff of bonds and costs to be allowed in all cases in the courts of the United States; to report by bill or otherwise.

MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Benton in Saline county to Pine Bluffs in Jefferson county, Arkansas.

ISLANDS IN THE MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI.

Mr. ATCHISON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of the Islands in the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, not heretofore surveyed and offered for sale.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of E. G. Smith, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Jonathan Moore, of the State of Massachusetts; for the relief of Robert Ellis; and for the relief of Catharine Fulton, of Washington county, Pennsylvania, reported them without amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to change the name of Photius Kavasales to that of Photius Fisk, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Polly Taylor, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for her relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

U. S. COURTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for dividing the State of Georgia into two judicial districts; and organizing and establishing an additional district court of the United States, with circuit court powers and jurisdiction, reported it without amendment.

RETIRED LIST IN THE NAVY.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to promote the efficiency of the navy; which was read and passed to the second reading.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, relating to the collection district of New Orleans, reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, the 21st instant, the enrolled bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

AMERICAN HEMP FOR THE USE OF THE NAVY.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the prior orders were suspended, and the engrossed joint resolution to promote the purchase of American hemp for the use of the American Navy was read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the resolution—

Mr. YULEE.—As an inquiry was made by my honorable friend the other day, in reference to this subject, I desire now to state to the Senate that this resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and their consideration of it resulted in reporting the resolution to the Senate, with a recommendation for the favorable action of this body upon it, founded upon the previously established system with regard to the purchase of hemp, for the use of the Navy. It will be found by examining the proceedings of Congress, that four or five years ago, a system in reference to American hemp was adopted, and that that system has been pursued by subsequent legislation. The only difference between that and the one now proposed, is that this resolution provides that the Secretary may make the contracts for a period not exceeding five years, and that the receiving and inspecting of the hemp may take place at the place of purchase. The Secretary is of opinion that there will be a considerable saving to the government effected by this plan, because the refuse hemp can be sold to the hunters and trappers. I find that the price of hemp has been as high as one hundred and eighty dollars a ton, and it is expected that the Secretary will be able to procure it for one hundred and ten. This will be a large reduction. And I learn also, that American hemp is of a very superior quality. The committee, therefore, considering the resolution to be in keeping with the system already established by Congress, and that it would probably be of advantage to the Naval service have thought proper to recommend the resolution to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the resolution by inserting the following proviso—"provided that it shall be received by the Navy department at the average price at which foreign hemp can be procured at the time of delivery."

Mr. HALE.—It seems to me that this bill ought not to pass. It seems to me that the price paid for hemp should not be the price which it has borne for the last five years. I take the same exception which was taken by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania the other day, that if this article is to be protected, other articles, such as iron and coal should also be protected.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The object of this bill is not the protection of American hemp, for it can be furnished cheaper than the foreign article. The object is, by authorizing the contracts for a longer period to procure the supply upon more favorable terms. The new method of preparing hemp in the western country involves a considerable outlay, and this enlargement of the time in which the hemp is to be furnished affords an opportunity to those engaged in its preparation to produce the article at less cost to themselves. The resolution contains a restriction, that the price to be paid shall not be above the price of the foreign article, and the department is satisfied that it can be procured for much less.

Mr. HALE.—I have not the least objection to the resolution, so far as it authorizes the Secretary to make constructive contracts for five years. But I do object to giving him permission to give the same price five years to come, that has been paid for five years past. If there is any meaning at all in that portion of the resolution, it had better be stricken out. I shall ask for the yeas and nays in order that those who do not think it right to give this authority to pay this price may record their votes against it.

The yeas and nays were not seconded.

Mr. NILES.—As far as regards the making of long contracts, there can be no objection to the provisions of this resolution, but as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, the price which has heretofore been paid is altogether too high to be made the standard of what shall be paid in future. I am willing to give American hemp the preference in the naval service, provided no more is to be paid for it than the market price. The price to be paid ought not to be discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. YULEE.—I would suggest to the Senator, that one of the advantages of long contracts over those for one year is to secure the government against the fluctuations in price. In the purchases of hemp the government has had to go as high as one hundred and eighty dollars per ton, and the probability is, that from the disturbances in Europe, for the next five years the price of foreign hemp will be greater than it has been heretofore. The opinion of the Secretary was, that there would be a saving by this arrangement. With regard to the average cost for the last four or five years, I will remark that the terms of the resolution contain a limitation upon the exercise of discretion on the part of the Secretary.

Mr. NILES.—The Senator says that hemp has cost sometimes as much as one hundred and eighty dollars per ton, and that the price recently has been one hundred and ten dollars. The average price then would be greatly beyond what it can be purchased for now.

Mr. YULEE.—The Senator misunderstands me. One hundred and ten dollars is the price at which the Secretary expects to be able to purchase it under large contracts. One hundred and twenty dollars would be the average.

Mr. NILES.—The principle would be the same. The price is now falling. I think we ought not to pay what has been the average for the last five years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—The resolution is worded in such a way as to give the Secretary of the Navy a discretionary power over the subject, and I think there are advantages in giving this discretionary power, and in permitting him to make large contracts, because the process of water-rotting hemp is different from the old mode, and the effect of the discretionary power would be to make more advantageous contracts. Those who adopt the process of water-rotting have to go to considerable expense in prepation which they would not do if the sale of the article depended upon the state of things as they now exist. I hope that the Senate will perceive the advantage that will arise out of it and pass the resolution in its present shape. The Secretary is not compelled, in making the contracts, to come up to the average price. He will have the interests of the government in view, I have no doubt, and obtain the contracts upon the most favorable terms. I hope, therefore, that the recommendation of the committee will be adopted.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I would enquire of the chairman of the Committee, whether there is any change made in regard to the necessity of advertising.

Mr. YULEE.—It will not be under this resolution necessary to advertise.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I would be glad if the chairman would explain why it is that advertising will not be necessary under the new system.

Mr. YULEE.—There is but one establishment where the process of water-rotting is carried on, the Secretary will be enabled to make contracts upon terms advantageous to the government by reason of the longer time which the contracts will have to run. And for the same reason there will be no necessity for advertising.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I beg leave to make a single remark. The honorable Senator is mistaken in supposing there is but one establishment at which this water-rotted hemp is made. There are several; and it is a matter that is of great importance to the whole western country. I am in favor of this resolution. One reason for dispensing with advertising is I apprehend, that by the terms of the resolution you fix the price which you are to pay, which is not to exceed the average price of the foreign article. This is easily ascertained. The object of competition is generally to reduce prices, here you take an ascertained price and say that you will give that price for five consecutive years. I hope that the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. HALE again asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the passage of the resolution, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Bermen, Breese, Cameron, Clarke, Critteden, Dix, of Miss. Dixon, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Greene, Johnson, of La. Johnson, of Ga. Miller, Moor, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Webster, Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Bagby, Butler, Calhoun, Hale, Hunter, Lewis, Mason, Niles, Turney—10

So it was

Resolved, That the resolution pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

Mr. CASS gave notice that as soon as the loan bill shall have been disposed of, he will move to proceed to the consideration of the bill providing for the further prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the republic of Mexico.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying documents, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th January, 1848, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, the correspondence of Mr. Wise, late minister of the United States at the court of Brazil, with the Department of State of the United States.

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, March 22 1848.

The message having been read—

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and be printed.

THE LOAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Finance were considered and agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate and the amendments were concurred in.

The question being upon ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time—

Mr. ATHERTON addressed the Senate in reference to the financial affairs of the government.

Mr. WEBSTER then took the floor, and on his motion the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1848.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by seventy five copies of the Navy Register for the year 1848.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Senate, made in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the causes of the delay in printing the report of Dr. Wislizenus.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Mr. FELCH presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Detroit to Michigan, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution passed by said Legislature in favor of the passage of an act granting to the St. Mary's Canal Company the right of way over the public lands lying on the route of their canal; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH having moved that the resolution be printed—

Mr. NILES said: I observe that an unusual practice is gaining ground in regard to the printing of memorials, and that it is becoming quite a common thing.

Mr. FELCH.—I understand the practice to be that the resolutions of the Legislatures of the different States are ordered to be printed as a matter of course for the use of the Senate.

Mr. NILES.—Is this the resolution of the Legislature?

Mr. FELCH.—It is.

Mr. NILES.—In that case I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

In presenting a resolution from the Legislature of New York.

Mr. DICKINSON said: The subject of the resolution is one which interests not only a great portion of the citizens of my own State, but the agricultural classes generally throughout the Union. It is a subject of the weightiest consideration, but as Congress has other matters before it, I shall not do more at this time than move that the resolutions be printed and laid upon the table, which is, I believe, the usual disposition made in matters of this kind. Without keeping the Senate in further suspense, I remark that it relates to Jethro Wood's patent plough. I ask that the resolution may be also read; I believe that is usual.

Mr. HALE.—I object. It is not the usual course.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Let the Senate decide. I move that they be read.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was read by the Secretary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GREENE presented the petition of John S. Harris, late Deputy Collector and Measurer of the port of Providence, in Rhode Island, praying compensation for his services; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FELCH presented a memorial of citizens of the town of Sault de Ste Marie, in Michigan, praying the appointment of a board of Commissioners for the adjustment of land titles in that place; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Sarah Hubbard, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Carroll county, New Hampshire, praying the establishment of a mail route from Ossipee to Moultonboro', in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of Henrietta Bedinger, widow of a deceased revolutionary officer, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC LANDS AT FORT SNELLING.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what quantity of public land has been reserved from sale and settlement at or near Fort Snelling on the Upper Mississippi river, stating the quantity on each bank of the river so reserved; the purposes to which the lands are devoted; the amount of forces at that post, average for the last five years; and whether in his opinion the lands reserved on the east bank of the river are really necessary for any military purpose.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Mississippi Baptist State Convention, presented the 9th March.

Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Newell.

DUTIES ON LUMBER.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MOOR asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to admit lumber cut on the territory of Maine, and manufactured in New Brunswick, into the ports of the United States free of duty; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.]

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Col. Robert Wallace, aid-de-camp to Gen. William Hull; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a joint resolution relating to the evidence which shall be deemed satisfactory on application for bounty lands, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

BOUNTY LANDS.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives relating to the evidence which shall be satisfactory on application for bounty lands, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—If there be no objection, this resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CASS.—I hope the resolution will not be referred. This is a subject which is very important, and I believe there cannot be the slightest objection to it. I hope it may be considered now.

The Senate proceeded to consider said resolution as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this resolution pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

DUTIES ON AMERICAN LUMBER IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. MOOR, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, copies of the correspondence which has taken place since August 1842, between the authorities of the American and British governments, in relation to export duties on American lumber exacted or levied by the Provincial or other British authorities in New Brunswick; excepting such portions of that correspondence as may be communicated without detriment to the public interests.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. RUSK gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day thereafter, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to regulate trade and intercourse between the several tribes of Indians residing within the State of Texas.

THE LOAN BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Mr. President: On Friday a bill passed the Senate for the raising of ten regiments of new troops for the farther prosecution of the war against Mexico; and we have been informed, that the measure is shortly to be followed, in this branch of the Legislature, by a bill to raise twenty regiments of volunteers for the same service. I was desirous, sir, on Friday, to express my opinion against the object of those bills—against the supposed necessity which leads to their enactment, and against the general policy which they are apparently designed to promote. Circumstances personal to myself, but beyond my control, compelled me to forego on that day the execution of this design. The bill now before the Senate is a measure for raising money to meet the expenses of the government, and to provide the means as well for other things as for the pay and support of these thirty regiments.

Sir, the scenes through which we have passed, and are passing here, are various. For a fortnight the world supposes us to have been occupied with the ratification of a treaty of peace, and that within these walls—notes of peace—hopes of peace—nay, strong assurances of peace, and immediate peace, have been uttered to console us, and to cheer us. It has been over and over again stated, that we have ratified a treaty—of course a treaty of peace; and, as the country has been led to suppose, not of uncertain, and empty, and delusive peace, but real, gratifying, and enduring peace;—a peace that shall staunch the wounds of war, prevent the farther effusion of blood, cut off these enormous expenses, and return our friends, and our brothers, and our children—if they be yet living!—from a land of slaughter, and a land of still more dismal destruction by climate, to our firesides, and our arms. Hardly have those halcyon sounds ceased upon our ear, until in resumed public session, we are summoned to fresh warlike operations—to the creation of a new army of thirty thousand men for the further prosecution of the war—to carry our power, in the language of the President, still more directly into the vital parts of our enemy and to press home by the power of the sword, the claims that we insist upon against a fallen, prostrate—I had almost said—an ignoble foe! If I may judge by the opinion of the honorable member from Michigan, or other speeches delivered in this chamber, there has not been a time from the commencement of the war, when it has been more urgently pressed upon us, not only to maintain, but to increase our military means—not only to continue the war, but to press it with more vigor—than at the present time. Pray, what does this mean? Or, I ask, is it confessed, then, that we are are no nearer to peace than we were when we snatched up a bit of paper called, or miscalled a treaty, and ratified it? Have we yet to fight it out to the utmost, as if no pacification had intervened? I wish to treat the proceedings of this and every department of this government with the utmost respect. God knows that the constitution of this government—and the exercise of its just powers, in the administration of the laws under it, have been the cherished object of all my unimportant life. But if the subject were not too deeply interesting, I should say that our proceedings here might well enough cause a smile. In the ordinary transaction of foreign relations, in this and all other governments, the course has been to negotiate first, and to ratify afterwards. This would seem to be the natural order of conducting intercourse between foreign States. We have chosen to reverse the order. We ratify first, and negotiate afterwards. We set up a treaty, such as we find it, and such as we choose to make it, and then we send two ministers plenipotentiary to negotiate thereupon in the capital of the enemy! One should think, sir, that the ordinary course of proceeding, was much the wiser—that to negotiate, hold intercourse, come to some arrangement by authorized agents, and then to submit that arrangement to the sovereign authority, to which those agents are responsible—would be always the most desirable method of procedure. It strikes me, that the course we have adopted, is strange—is grotesque. So far as I know, it is unprecedented in the history of diplomatic intercourse. Learned gentlemen on the floor of the Senate, interested to defend and vidicate this course, may, in their extensive reading, have found examples; I know none.

"The world stint our"

Sir, we are in possession, by military power of New Mexico and California, countries belonging hitherto to the United States of Mexico. We are informed by the President, that it is his purpose to retain them—to consider them as territories fit to be attached, and to be attached, to these United States of America; and the military operations and designs now before the Senate, are intended to enforce this claim of the Executive of the United States. We are to compel Mexico to agree, that that part of her dominions called New Mexico, and that other part called California, shall be ceded to us. We now in possession of these territories it is said, and she is to be compelled to yield the title. This is the precise object of this new army of thirty thousand men. It is the identical object, sir, in my judgment, for which the war was originally commenced—for which it has been hitherto prosecuted, and in furtherance of which this treaty is to be used, but as one of the means to bring about the general result; that general result depending, after all, upon other superior powers, and the necessity of submitting to any terms which we prescribe, to fallen—fallen—fallen Mexico!

The members composing the other House—the more popular branch of Congress—have all been elected since,—I had almost said the fatal,—the remarkable incidents of the 11th of May, 1846; and it has passed a resolution affirming that "the war with Mexico was begun unconstitutionally and unnecessarily by the Executive government of the United States." I concur in that sentiment. I hold that to be the most recent, authentic expression of the will and the opinions of the people of the United States. There is another proposition, not so authentically announced hitherto, but in my judgment equally true—equally capable of demonstration—and that is, that this war was begun, has been continued, and is now prosecuted, for the great and leading purpose of the acquisition of new territory, out of which to bring new States, with a Mexican population, into this our union of the United States. If unavowed at first, this purpose did not remain unavowed long.—However often it may be said that we did not go to war for conquest—credat Judæus Apella!—yet the moment we get possession of the territory, it is said that we must retain it and make it our own. Now, I think the original object has not been changed. Sir, I think it still exists in the eyes of those who originally contemplated it—who began the war for it—that it is as attractive to them, and from which they have no more desire to avert their eyes now than they had then, or have had at any time since we have compelled a treaty of cession. We know in our consciences that it is compelled! We use it as an instrument, and an agency in conjunction with other instrumentalities and agencies of a more formidable or destructive character, to enforce the acquiescence of Mexico in the acquisition by us of new territory to form new States—new States to be added to this Union. Every intelligent man knows that there is a strong desire in the heart of the Mexican citizen to retain the territories belonging to that republic. We know that the Mexican people part with their territory—if part they must—with regret, with pangs of sorrow. That we know. We know that the cession is altogether forced; and therefore, because we know it must be forced—because we know that whatever the government, which is our creature, may do or agree to—we know that the Mexican people will never accede to the terms of this treaty, but through an impulse of absolute necessity and the impression made upon them by absolute irresistible force. Therefore we propose to overwhelm them with another army. We propose to raise immediately ten regiments of regular troops and twenty regiments of volunteers, and to pour them in and upon the Mexican people.

Now, sir, I should be happy to concur, notwithstanding all this toesin, and all this cry of all the Sempronius' in the land that their voice is still for war;—I should be happy to agree, and substantially I do agree, with the honorable member from South Carolina that after all, the war with Mexico is substantially over—that there is no more fighting. My opinion in the present state of things is, that the people of this country will not sustain this war. They will not go to the expense. They will not find any gratification in putting the bayonet to the throat of the Mexican people. For my part I hope the ten regiment bill will never become a law. Three weeks ago I should have entertained that hope with the utmost confidence. Events since, have struck me with pain and shaken my conviction. Still I hope it will not pass. And here, I dare say, I shall be called a "Mexican Whig." A man who can stand up here and say that he hopes that what the administration projects for the further prosecution of the war against Mexico, will not be carried into effect is "an enemy to the country;" or, what gentlemen would consider the same thing, an enemy of the President of the United States and his administration, and his party! He is a "Mexican?" Sir, I think very badly of the Mexican character, high and low, out and out. But names do not terrify me. Besides if I am a sufferer in this respect—if I be made the subject of reproach by those stipendiary presses—those hired abusers of the motives of public men—I have the honor on this occasion to be in very respectable company. In the vituperative—the accusative—the denunciatory sense of that term, I do not known a greater Mexican in this body than the honorable member from Michigan at the head of the Military Committee!

Mr. CASS.—I should like the honorable gentleman to explain what sort of Mexican I am!

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is exactly the thing I now propose to do!

Mr. CASS.—I shall be glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. WEBSTER.—In his remarks on this bill in the Senate, the other day, the honorable gentleman told us that his object was to frighten Mexico—it would touch his humanity to hurt her.

Mr. CASS.—Does the honorable gentleman mean to say that I made such a remark?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I mean to say that the gentleman said it twice.

Mr. CASS.—I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said no such thing. Will the gentleman allow me to state what I did say? I remarked that we had two objects to accomplish in raising these regiments; one was, the vigorous prosecution of the war; and secondly, to produce a moral effect upon Mexico by convincing her of our determination, and thereby hold out an inducement to her to make peace.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The gentleman said that his principal object was to "frighten" Mexico, and that that would be more humane than to harm Mexico.

Mr. CASS, (in his seat.)—True.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is true? Very well, I thought as much. Now the remarkable characteristic of his speech which makes it so much a Mexican speech is, that the gentleman spoke it in the hearing of Mexico, as well as in the hearing of the Senate. We have been accused, sir, of being "Mexican Whigs," because what we say here is heard by Mexico, and Mexico derives countenance and support from what is said here. But the honorable member comes forth and tells Mexico that his object is to frighten her! His words have passed along the wires—they are on the gulf—they are floating away to Vera Cruz, and when they get there, they will satisfy the Mexicans that after all—after all, "ye good Mexicans our principal object is to frighten you!" And to the end that they may not be frightened too much, he gives them notice that the object is to frighten them! Mr. President, when Snug, the joiner, was to represent the lion, and roar on the stage, he was quite apprehensive that he might too much frighten "the duchess and the ladies;" and, therefore, by the advice of his comrade, one Nicholas Bottom, he wisely concluded that in the heat and fury of his effort, he would show one half his face and say—"Ladies, fair ladies, I would wish you, or I would request you, or I would entreat you, not to fear, not to tremble; my life for yours, if you think I come hither as a lion, it were pity of my life! No, I am no such thing; I am a man as other men are; I'm Snug, the joiner!"

But, sir, in my view of this case—in my view of the proper policy of this government, according to any man's apprehension and judgment, where is the necessity of this augmentation of regiments of the military force of the country? I hold in my hand a note—I suppose substantially correct—of the present military forces of the United States. I will not vouch for its entire accuracy; but I believe it is substantially according to fact. There are now twenty-five regiments of regular troops of various arms, which, if full, would give us a force of 28,960 rank and file, including officers, thirty thousand and odd men. These, with the exception of six or seven hundred men, are now all without the limits of the United States, in field service in Mexico, or on the route to Mexico. These regiments are not full. Casualties and the climate have sadly reduced their numbers. If the recruiting service would now yield ten thousand men, it would not more than fill up those regiments so as to give the field officers their full command. I understand, sir, that the report from General Scott—General Scott! A man that has performed the most brilliant campaign in military annals! A man that has warred against the enemy—warred against the climate—warred against a thousand unpropitious circumstances, and carried the flag of his country to the capital of the enemy,—honorably, proudly, humanely, to his own permanent honor and the great credit of his country! General Scott! And where is he? At Puebla! At Puebla, undergoing an inquiry before his inferiors in office, and other persons not in office, while the high powers that be exercised, and exercised with so much distinction, are turned over to another—I do not mean to say an unworthy gentleman,—but his inferior in military rank and station. But, General Scott reports, as I understand, that in February, there were twenty thousand regular troops under his command and en route. Add the thirty regiments of volunteers, and if full they would make thirty four thousand men, officers included over thirty five thousand, and there would be a force of regulars and volunteers amounting to not less than fifty five thousand or sixty thousand men, including the recruits on the way. If my information be exact—and the honorable member from Michigan can correct me if it be not,—I presume that it is correct—in February General Scott had under him in Mexico thirty thousand troops regulars and volunteers. Now, all these troops are regularly officered. There is no deficiency of officers in the line or in the staff. They are all full. Whatever deficiency there is, consists of men. Now, sir, there is a plausible reason for saying that it is difficult to recruit at home for the supply of deficiences in the volunteer regiments. It will be said that volunteers choose to enlist under officers of their own selection—that they do not incline to enlist here as individual volunteers, when the regiment is abroad under officers of whom they know nothing. There may be something in that, but pray, is that does that conclusion lead? Does it not lead to this, that all those volunteer corps must moulder away so far as the privates are concerned and come to nothing; meantime the places of the commissioned officers are continually filled; the regiments being full of officers, although the privates, by casualty or by disease, are reduced to be less in number than the officers themselves? But, however that may be, in regard to the recruiting for the regular service you can fill up the regiments by pay and bounty, according to existing laws, or new laws, if new laws be necessary. There is no reason upon earth why we should now create five hundred new officers for the purpose of getting ten thousand new men. There are officers to command them. All that is wanted is men; and there is a place for the men, and I suppose that no gentleman can stand up here or elsewhere and say, that the recruiting service can go on faster than it will be necessary to go on in order to fill up these deficiencies in the regiments abroad. But now what do we want with a greater force than we now have in Mexico? Without asking what need there is for the supply of deficiencies in the existing regiments, what do we want beyond the thirty thousand regulars and volunteers now in field service? What is the purpose? There is no army to fight. I suppose the enemy has not five hundred men together under arms in any part of Mexico. Except in one instance, perhaps, there is not half that number. Mexico is prostrate. There is no government to resist us. Why, it is notorious that the government is on our side. It is our instrument by which we hope to establish such a peace, and accomplish such a treaty as we wish. As far as I can understand the matter, the government of Mexico owes its life and breath, and being, at this moment, to the support of our arm; and to the hope—I will not say how inspired,—that somehow or another, and at no distant period, there may be pecuniary means arising from our three millions, or our twelve millions, or some other of our millions. What do we propose to do, then, with those thirty regiments that we design to pour into Mexico? Are we going to cut the throats of the Mexicans? Are we going to plunge the sword deeper and deeper into the vital part of Mexico? What do we propose to do? Sir, I see no object, and yet we are pressed and urged to adopt this proposition in its full length—ten regiments of regulars, and twenty regiments of volunteers! We are told, and the public is told, and the public believes, that we are on the verge of a safe and honorable peace. Every man looks out in the morning for tidings of confirmed peace, or confirmed hopes of peace. He gathers it from the administration, and every organ of the administration, from Dan to Beersheba; and yet the warlike operations,—the incurring of additional expenses—the imposition of new charges upon the treasury, are pressed here as if peace was not in all our thoughts, at least not in any of our expectations!

Now, sir, I propose to hold some plain talk to-day; and I say that according to my best judgment and apprehension of matters, the main object of these bills is patronage—office—the gratification of friends. This very measure for ten additional regiments, creates four or five hundred officers, colonels and subalterns, and not them only, for whom I have some respect, but then there come, paymasters,—contractors,—persons engaged in the transport service,—commissaries,—even down to sutlers, et id genus omne,—people who handle the public money without facing the foe; one and all, the true representatives if not the true descendants, of corporal Nym, who said

"I will have what belongs to me, by cock and pie, or I can tell the reason why."

Sir, I hope without disrespect to those applicants and aspirants, and those patriots, some of them patriots ready to fight, and those other patriots not willing to fight, but willing to be paid,—I hope—without disrespect to any of them, according to their rank and station, and merits, that they may be all disappointed. I hope, sir, as the weather grows genial, and the season advances, they will, on the whole find it their interest, to place themselves one of these mild mornings, in the cars, and take their destination to their respective places of honorable, private occupation and civil employment! They have my good wishes, that, bidding adieu to the Avenue and the Capitol, and the purlieus of the President's House, they may reach their homes, in good health themselves and find their families all very happy to receive them!

But, sir, paulo majora canamus! This war was waged for the purpose of creating new States, near the southern portion of the United States, out of Mexican territory, and with such population as might be found resident therein. I have opposed that project. I am against the creation of new States. I am against the acquisition of territory to form new States. And this, sir, is not a matter of sentimentality, which I am to parade before mass meetings or before my constituents at home. It is with me no matter of declamation, regret, or expressed repugnance. It is matter of firm, unchangeable purpose, to yield to no force of circumstances that have occurred or that I may consider likely to occur; and therefore I say, sir, that if I am asked to-day, whether for the sake of peace I will take a treaty that brings two new States into this Union on its southern boundary, I say no, distinctly no! and I wish every man in the United States to understand that to be my judgment and my purpose. I have said on the southern boundary, because there the present proposition takes its locality. I would say the same of the western, the northern, the eastern, or any other boundary. I would resist to-day, and to the end, here and every where, any proposition to add any foreign territory, on the south or west, north or east, to the States of this Union as they are now constituted and held together under the constitution. I do not want the colonies of England on the north; I as little desire the Mexican population on the south. I resist and reject all, and all with equal resolution; and therefore, I say, that if the question is put to me to-day, whether I will take peace in the present state of the country—distressed as it is—in the exigency of this war, odious as it is—in circumstances so afflictive to the community, and so disturbing to the business of those whom I represent as those which now surround us—I say still that if the question be put to me whether I will have peace, with new States, I say no—no—no! Why? Because, sir, there is no necessity of being driven into the dilemma in my judgment. Other gentlemen may think differently. I own no man's conscience but mine own. I mean to make a clean breast for myself, and I protest that I see no reason whatever to believe that we cannot obtain as safe a peace—as honorable a peace, and as prompt a peace without territory, as with it. The things are separable. There is no necessary connection between them. Mexico does not wish us to take her territory that she may receive our money. Far from it. She yields her assent—if she yield it at all—reluctantly, and we all know it. If she yield, it is the result of force; and there is not a man here that does not know it. Let me say, sir, that if this Trist paper shall finally be rejected in Mexico, it is most likely to be because those who, under our protection prepared it, cannot persuade the Mexican Congress or the Mexican people to agree to this cession of territory. The thing most likely to break up what is now expected to take place, is the repugnance of the Mexican people to part with Mexican territory. They would prefer to keep their territory, and that we should keep our money; or we resolve that we should keep our money and allow them to keep their territory. We shall see. I pretend to no powers of prediction. I do not know what may happen. The times are full of strange events. But I think it probable, that if the treaty which has gone to Mexico shall fail to be ratified, it will be because of the aversion of the Mexican Congress or the Mexican people to cede their territories, or any portion of them, belonging to their republic.

I have said that I would rather have no peace for the present, than to have a peace that brings territories for new States, and the reason is that I believe we can get a peace just as soon without territory as with it—a peace more safe, more enduring—vastly more honorable to us, the great republic of the western world. I hear gentlemen say, that we have must have some territory—that the people demand it. I deny it; at least I say I see no proof of it whatever. I do not doubt that there are individuals here and there, of an enterprising character, disposed to emigration, who know nothing about New Mexico, but that it is far off; and nothing of California, but that it is still farther off; who are tired of the dull pursuits of agriculture and civil life. I dare say that there are hundreds and thousands of such persons who might wish for territory, in which to seek their fortunes. Whatever is new, is attractive to such minds. They feel the spirit of a borderer, and that is, I take it, to be pretty tolerably content with his condition till somebody passes beyond him; and then his disposition to take up his "traps" and pass beyond him who has passed himself, and sit down farther off, is an irresistible passion. At least, so says that great and sagacious observer of human manners, M. Talleyrand, when he travelled in this country in 1797. But, I say, sir, that I do not find anywhere, nor that there exists anywhere, any considerable, respectable number of persons who think that we want more territory and such territory. There were twenty-four of us last year, who voted against the prosecution of the war for the acquisition of territory, on the ground that we did not want it—southern men and northern men. I believe there were southern gentlemen who concurred in that vote; and who found themselves, even against what might be supposed to be the local feeling and partiality able to sustain themselves upon the ground of the wisdom of the general policy of not seeking for territory, and by the acquisition of territory to bring into our politics certain embarrassing and embroiling questions. I do not learn that they suffered by the advocacy of such sentiments. I rather believe that they triumphed in them, and I believe that through the greater portion of the South—if we can trust what has been said here, through the south-west to a very great extent, the same sentiment is general—that there is no prevalent opinion in favor of new territory and such territory, or of an augmentation of your population and by such population. I need not say that that is, if not the undivided, the preponderating sentiment of all the North. But we think we must take territory. For the sake of peace we must take territory! This is the will of the President! If we do not take it we may fare worse! Mr. Polk will take no less! That is fixed upon! He is immovable! He has put down his foot! He had put it down, sir, on "fifty-four forty," but it didn't stay! I speak of the President of the United States as I speak of all Presidents, without disrespect, but I know no reason why his opinions, his will, his purpose declared to be fixed, should control us any more than our purpose formed upon equally conscientious motives, and I may add, formed under as high responsibilities as those which should control him. We think he is firm and will not move. I should be sorry, sir, very sorry indeed that we should entertain more respect for the firmness of an individual at the head of the government than we can entertain for our own firmness. He will stand out, it is said, against us.—Do we fear to stand out against him? For one, I do not. It appears to me to be a slavish doctrine. For one, I am willing to meet the issue; and to go to the people, over all this broad land. If we will take peace without new States, and the administration will have no peace without new States, I am willing to stand upon that, and trust the people. I do that because in the first place I think it is right; and in the next place I have no distrust of the people. I am not unwilling to put that to their sovereign decision and arbitration.

Sir, I hold this question to be vital—permanent—elementary—in the future prosperity of this country and the maintenance of the constitution, and I am willing to trust that question to the people. I prefer that it should be submitted to them; because it what I regard as a great constitutional principle, or a principle essentially important to the maintenance of the constitution be broken down, let it be the act of themselves. It shall never be my act. I therefore do not distrust the people. I am willing to take their sentiment on this issue, from the gulf to the British provinces, and from the ocean to the Missouri. I am willing to ask them—will you continue this war for territory—for territory to be purchased after all for an enormous price, a thousand times the value of all that is purchased; or will you take peace contenting yourselves with the honor that the country has reaped by the military achievements of its armies? Will you take peace without territory and preserve the integrity of the constitution and the Union? I am willing to go on that for one.

I am willing, sir, to take this issue—peace without new States, keeping our money to ourselves; or war till these new States shall be acquired? That's the question. It is a question for the people themselves. If they support me and those who think with me in the view I take of the matter, very well. If they will have territory—if they will add new States to this Union, why let them do so and they will be the artificers of their own fortunes, for good or for evil.

But, sir, we tremble before Executive power. The truth cannot be concealed—we tremble before Executive power! Mr. Polk will take nothing else than this, and if we do not take this, "the king's anger may kindle," and he may impose still heavier burdens. Now, who, and what is Mr. Polk? I speak of him in no manner of disrespect. I mean only to ask who and what is the President of the United States for the current moment? He is in the last year of the term of his administration—formally, officially it can only be drawn out till the Fourth of March. Why, really and substantially we know that two short months will, or may produce events that render the duration of the official term of very little importance. We are on the eve of a Presidential election. That machinery resorted to, to collect public opinion or party opinion is to be put in operation two months hence. We shall see its result. It may be that the present incumbent of the Presidential office will be again presented to his party friends and admirers for their suffrages for the next Presidential term. I do not say how probable or improbable that may be—perhaps it is not entirely probable—suppose that not to be the result—but then! Why, then, Mr. Polk becomes as absolutely insignificant as any respectable man amongst the public men of the United States—honorable in his private life—valued in his private character—respectable, never eminent in public life, he will from the moment that a new star arises, have just as little influence as you, sir, or I—and so far as respects myself, God knows that will be very little! Sir, political partizans and aspirants and office-seekers are not sun-flowers—they don't > turn on their pol I when he sets,

> The same face that they turned when he rose."

Now, sir, if the respectable gentleman who is now at the head of the government should be agreed upon, there will be those who will commend his consistency, and be bound to maintain it and the integrity of the party; his friends will require that this should be done. If otherwise, who is there in the whole length and breadth of the land who will care for the consistency of the present incumbent of that office? There will then be new objects. Manifest destiny will have fixed upon some other man. The eulogies are now written; the commendations of the press are already elaborated; I will not say every thing fulsome, but I will say every thing panegyrical is already written out with blanks for names, to be filled when the convention shall adjourn. When manifest destiny shall be reached, then, sir, all these strains of panegyric made beforehand, laid up in pigeon-holes, studied, framed, emblazoned, and embossed, will all come out, and then there will be, there is bound to be, somebody in the United States, possibly, whose merits have heretofore been strangely overlooked—marked by Providence—a kind of miracle—it is a wonder that nobody thought of him before; a fit man, and the only fit man to be at the head of this great Republic. I shrink not, therefore, from any thing that I feel to be my duty, by any apprehension of the power, and importance, and imposing dignity and the power of will which is ascribed to the present incumbent of that office. I wish we had that power of will. I wish we had that firmness—firmness—firmness. Si sit numen nullum absit. If we had adherence! I wish we could gather something from the spirit of our brave corps that have met the enemy under circumstances most adverse and have stood the shock. I wish we could imitate Zachary Taylor in his bivouac upon the field of Buena Vista. He said he would remain for the night; he would feel the enemy in the morning and try his position. I wish before we surrender that we could make up our own minds to feel the enemy and try his position, and I think we should find him, as Taylor did, under the early sun on his way to San Louis Potosi! That is my judgment.

But, sir, I come to the all absorbing question, more particularly of the creation of new states. When I came into the councils of he country, Louisiana had been obtained under the treaty with France, and shortly afterwards Florida was obtained under the treaty with Spain. These two countries were known to us. They lay upon our frontiers. They commanded the outlets of the great river. As I have had occasion to say and shall now only repeat without argument, in the first of these instances, the President of the United States, Mr. Jefferson, supposed the acquisition to be unconstitutional; he acted on that supposition. Mr. Madison was then Secretary of State. He proposed that a proposition for an amendment of the constitution should be submitted in order to bring Louisiana into the Union. He drew up the proposition, and it was submitted to Mr. Adams. Mr. Madison did not go upon the general idea that new states might be admitted. He did not proceed upon the notion of a general amendment to the constitution in this respect, but the amendment of the constitution which he proposed and submitted to Mr. Adams, was article 13th, emendatory of the constitution—"The province of Louisiana is hereby declared to be part and parcel of the United States." Public opinion, owing to the great importance of this acquisition, took a turn favorable to the affirmation of the power, without any new constitutional provision. The power was acquiesed in. Louisiana became a part of the Union, and following the example of Louisiana, Florida was admitted. Now, sir, I consider these transactions as past, settled, legalized. There they stand. They are part of our political history. They are facts against which it would be idle at this day to contend. My first agency in these matters was upon the proposition for admitting Texas into the Union. That, I thought it my duty to oppose upon the general ground of opposing all annexation of new States; and I may add, and ought to add in justice, because there was a proposition then before the country, as to southern States having a slave population being represented in the Congress of the United States, upon the ground of inequality. It happened to me, sir, to be called on to address a political meeting in New York, in 1837–'38, after the recognition of Texan independence. I may state now, sir, what I have often stated before, that no man from the first has been a better wisher—a more sincere well wisher—to the people and government of Texas than myself. I looked upon that achievement of their independence at the battle of San Jacinto as quite extraordinary—almost a marvellous incident—in the affairs of mankind. I was among the first to be disposed to acknowledge her independence, but from the first, and from the first down to this moment, I have opposed as far as I was able the annexation of new States to this Union. I stated my reasons on the occasion to which I referred. I have them in a short abstract before me, but it is hardly worth while that I should trouble the Senate with reading them.

For a few years I held a position in the Executive department of the government. I left the Department of State in 1843, in May. Within a month after another most worthy and respectable gentleman—who came to a very untimely end—had taken my place, I had occasion to know, not officially, but from circumstances, that the annexation of Texas to the United States was taken up by Mr. Tyler's administration as an administration measure, pushed, pressed, insisted on, and I believe that the honorable gentleman to whom I have referred, and for whose memory I entertain much respect—Mr. Upshur—had something like a passion for the accomplishment of this purpose. And I am afraid that the President of the United States at that time suffered his ardent feelings not a little to control his more prudent judgment. At any rate, I saw in 1843 that annexation had become a purpose. I was not in Congress, nor in public life, but seeing this state of things, I thought it my duty to admonish, as far as I could, the country of the existence of this purpose. There are gentlemen—many of them at the North—others now in this capitol, who know that in the summer of 1843, being fully persuaded that this purpose of annexing Texas had been taken up with zeal and determination by the Executive government of the United States, I thought it my duty, and asked their concurrence in an attempt to let this purpose be known to the country. I conferred with gentlemen of distinction and eminence; I proposed some means of exciting public attention to the question of annexation, before it should become a party question; for I had learned that when a matter becomes a party matter, it is in vain to argue against it or argue upon it. But the optimists, the quietests then, who said all things are well and let all things alone, discouraged, discountenanced, repressed, any such effort. They said the North would take care of itself, the country would take care of itself, that it would not sustain Tyler's project of annexation—when the time came the power of the North which was felt in the House of Representatives, would be sufficient to resist the measure. And I could now refer to paragraphs and articles in the most respectable journals at the North, in which the attempt was made to produce an impression, that there was no danger that we should have an addition of new States; that we need not alarm ourselves about it. I was not in Congress when the resolution providing for the annexation of Texas was passed. I only know that up to a very short period before the passage of that resolution, the general impression was in the country where I belonged, that no such resolution could pass. But I have found, sir, in the course of thirty years' exsperience, that whatever measure the Executive government embraces and pushes, is quite likely to succeed. There is a giving way some where. If the Executive government acts with uniformity, steadiness, entire unity of purpose—sooner or later it is quite apt enough, according to my construction of history, too apt to effect its purpose.

Just before the commencement of the present administration the resolutions for the annexation of Texas passed Congress. Texas complied with the provisions of these resolutions, and she was here, or the case was here on the 22d of December, 1845, for her final admission into the Union, as one of these states. I took occasion then to state that I hoped I had shown all proper regard for Texas, that I had been certainly opposed to annexation, that if I should go over the whole matter again I should have nothing new to add; that I had acted all along under the unanimous declaration of all parties, and of the Legislature of Massachusetts; that I thought there must be some limit to the extent of our territories and that I wished that this country should exhibit to the world the example of a powerful republic, without the greediness and hunger of empire. And I added that while I held with as much faithfulness as any citizen of the country, to all the original arrangements and compromises of the constitution under which we live, I never could and I never should bring myself to be in favor of the admission of any states into the Union, as slave holding states, and I might have added any states at all. Now as I have said, in all this I acted under the resolutions of the state of Massachusetts, certainly concurrent with my own judgment, so often repeated, and reaffirmed by the unanimous consent of all men of all parties—that I could not well go through the series of pointing out not only the impolicy, but the unconstitutionality of such annexation. A case presented is this: If a state proposes to come into the Union, and to come in as a slave state, then there is an augmentation of the inequality in the representation of the people, which already exists—an inequality already existing, with which I do not quarrel and which I never will attempt to alter, but shall preserve as long as I have a vote to give, or any voice in this government; because it is a part of the original compact. Let it stand. But then there is another consideration of vastly more general importance even than that; more general, because it affects all the States, free and slaveholding; and it is that, if states formed out of territories thus thinly populated, come into the Union, they necessarily, inevitably break up the relation existing between the two branches of the government, and destroy its balance. They break up the intended relation between the Senate and the House of Representatives. If you bring in new states, any state that comes in must have two Senators. She may come in with fifty or sixty thousand people and more. You may have from a particular State more Senators than you have Representatives. Can any thing occur to disfigure and derange the form of government under which we live more signally than that? Here would be a Senate bearing no proportion to the people, out of all relation to them, by the addition of new states; from some of them only one Representative perhaps, and two Senators; whereas the larger states may have ten, fifteen, or even thirty Representatives, and but two Senators. The Senate added to, augmented by these new Senators coming from States where there are few people, becomes an odious oligarchy. It holds power without any adequate constituency. Sir, it is but "borough-mongering" upon a large scale. Now, I do not depend upon theory; I ask the Senate and the country to look at facts—to see where we were, when we made our departure three years ago, and where we now are; and I leave it to the imagination to conjecture where we shall be.

We admitted Texas—one State for the present—but, sir, if you refer to the resolutions providing for the annexation of Texas, you find a provision that it shall be in the power of Congress hereafter to make four new States out of Texan territory. Present and prospectively, five new States—ten Senators—may come into the Union out of Texas. Three years ago we did this; we now propose to make two States. Undoubtedly if we take, as the President recommends—New Mexico and California—there must then be four new Senators. We shall then have provided in these territories out of the United States along our southern borders, for the creation of States enough to send fourteen Senators into this chamber. Now, what will be the relation between these Senators and the people they represent, or the States from which they come? I do not understand that there is any very accurate census of Texas. It is generally supposed to contain a hundred and fifty thousand persons. I doubt whether it is above one hundred thousand.

Mr. MANGUM.—It contains one hundred and forty-nine thousand.

Mr. WEBSTER.—My honorable friend on my left says, a hundred and forty-nine thousand. I put it down then, one hundred and fifty thousand. Well, sir, Texas is not destined probably, to be a country of dense population. We will suppose it to have near one hundred and fifty thousand population by the best accounts—and I have given over all that I can find. New Mexico may have sixty or seventy thousand inhabitants—such—as—they—are! Say seventy thousand. In California, they are not supposed to be above twenty-five thousand men, but undoubtedly, if this territory should become ours, persons from Oregon, and from our Western States, will find their way to San Francisco, where there is some good land, and we may suppose they will shortly amount to sixty or seventy thousand. We will put them down at seventy thousand. Then the whole territory in this estimate, which is as large as any man puts it at, will contain two hundred and ninety thousand persons, and they will send us whenever we ask for them, fourteen senators. A population less than that of the State of Vermont, and not the eighth part of that of New York. Fourteen senators, and no more people than Vermont! and no more people than New Hampshire! and not so many people as the good State of New Jersey! But then, sir, Texas claims to the line of the Rio Grande, and if it be her true line, why then of course, she absorbs a considerable part, nay, the greater part of the population of what is now called New Mexico. I do not argue the question of the true southern or western line of Texas, I only say that it is apparent to everybody who will look at the map, and learn anything of the matter, that New Mexico cannot be divided by this river, the Rio Grande, which is a shallow, fordable, insignificant stream, creeping along through a narrow valley, at the base of enormous mountains. New Mexico must remain together; it must be a State with its seventy thousand people, and so it will be, and so will be California.

But then, sir, suppose Texas to remain a unit and but one State for the present, still we have three States, Texas, New Mexico, and California. We have six Senators then for less than three hundred thousand people. We have as many Senators for three hundred thousand people in that region as we have for New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, with four or five millions of people; and that is what we call an equal representation! Is not this enormous? Have gentlemen considered this? Have they looked at it? Are they willing to look it in the face and then say they embrace it? I trust in God the people will look at it and consider it. And now let me add, that this disproportion can never be diminished; it must remain forever. How are you going to diminish it? Why here is Texas with a hundred and forty-nine thousand people with one State. Suppose that population should flow into Texas, where will it go? Not to any dense point, but to be spread over all that region in places remote from the gulf, in places remote from what is now the capital of Texas, and therefore as soon as there are in other portions of Texas people enough within our common construction of the constitution and our practice in respect to the admission of States, my honorable friend from Texas will have a new State, and I have no doubt he has chalked it out already. Well, then, as to New Mexico there can be no more people there. The man is ignorant, stupid, who has looked at the map of New Mexico and read the accounts of it, who supposes there can be any more people there than there is now; some sixty or seventy thousand. It is an old settled country; the people living along in the bottom of this valley on the two sides of a little stream, a garter of land only on one side and the other, filled by coarse landholders and miserable peons. It can sustain, not only under their cultivation but under any cultivation that our American race would ever submit to, no more people than there are there now. There will then be two Senators for sixty thousand inhabitants in San Mexico, to the end of our lives and to the end of the lives of our children.

Well now, how is it with California? We propose to take California from the forty-second degree North latitude down to the thirty-second degree, we propose to take ten degrees of latitude along the coast of the Pacific. All along that coast that section are settlements, and villages, and forts; back it is all wilderness and barrenness and Indian country. But if about San Francisco, and perhaps down to Monterey or a little to the North there shall be enough to make up one State, why the people five hundred miles off, in time to come will have another State and then this disproportion of Senators to the people will go on, and must go on, and we cannot prevent it. I say, sir, that according to my conscientious convictions, we are now fixing upon the constitution of the United States, and upon our form of government a monstrosity—a disfiguration—an enormity. Sir, I hardly dare trust myself. I do not know that I may not be under some delusion. I do not know that my head is not turned. It may be that it is the weakness of mine eyes that forms this monstrous apparition. But if I may trust myself—if I may persuade myself that I am in my right mind, then it does appear to me that we, in this Senate, have been acting, and are acting, and are likely to be acting hereafter, a part which will certainly form a remarkable epoch in the history of our government. I hold it to be—to be flagrant—flagrant—and an outrage upon all the principles of a popular representative government and upon the elementary provisions of the constitution under which we live, and which we have sworn to support. But then, sir, what frees the case from this enormity? Why, it is that we stipulate only that these new states shall be brought in at a suitable time. Now, what is to constitute the suitableness of time? Who is to judge of it? I tell you, sir, that the suitableness will come whenever the preponderance of party power here makes it necessary to bring in new States. The time will depend on the state of our politics here, and not upon the condition of these States elsewhere. Be assurred, sir, there will be a suitable time whenever strength, or party power, or votes, are wanting in this Senate. We have some little experience of this. Texas came in suitable time, very suitable! Texas was finally admitted in December, 1845. My friend near me here, (Mr. RUSK,) for whom I have great regard, whose acquaintance I have cultivated with much pleasure, took his seat here, with his colleague, in March, 1845. In July, 1846, those two Texan votes turned the balance in the Senate and overthrew the tariff of 1842, in my judgment the best system of revenue that was ever established in this country. Gentlemen of different opinions think otherwise. They think it was fortunate. They think the Texan votes came in at suitable time. We have now here in New Mexican votes shall come in in suitable time also. I understand it perfectly well. It is a difference of opinion between myself and them. To their policy, to their object, to their purposes, the time was suitable, and the aid was efficient and decisive. Sir, in 1850, perhaps, similar questions may be agitated here—they are not likely to be before—but agitated they will be then, unless some change in the course of the administration of the government take place; and, according to my apprehension, it is likely to general results as flowing from our established system of commerce and revenue, in 1850, two years from this time, we may probably be engaged in a new revision of our system in the work of establishing, if we can, a tariff of specific duties; in the work of protecting, if we can, the domestic industry of this country, and in the work of preventing to some extent, if we can, the overwhelming flood of importations. Suppose this to be the case, and suppose that our opponents require additional strength, that will be exactly the suitable time for two Senators from New Mexico to make their appearance here.

But again, we hear other halcyon, soothing, quieting tones, which quiet none of my alarms, assuage none of my fears, commend me to my nightly rest with no more resignation. It is said we must trust the popular branch of the legislature—we may look to the House of Representatives, the great majority of whom are from the North and Middle States; and we may trust them, that these new States are not admitted sooner than they should be, or admitted for any party purpose. I am compelled by experience, to distrust all such reliance. If we cannot rely on ourselves, when we have a clear and unquestioned constitutional authority, competent to carry us through, I beg to know how we are to rely on others? Have we more respect for the patriotism, the firmness of others than our own? Besides experience shows us, that things of this sort may be sprung upon Congress and upon the people. It was so in the case of Texas. It was so in the 28th Congress. The members of the 28th Congress, were not chosen with the view to decide the question of annexation or no annexation. They came here upon other grounds, political and party grounds, supported by their friends on one side and the other, for reasons not connected with this question. What then? Why the administration sprung the question upon Congress. It obtained a snap-judgment, and carried the measure of annexation. That can be proved by many facts. I will state one. There were four gentlemen in the House of Representatives from Connecticut, elected before this question arose—belonging to the democratic party. They had not been here long, before they entered into the spirit of annexation, and when this became known, remonstrances—public, private, and legislative—were uttered in sounds which any one could have heard, who could hear thunder. Did it move these gentlemen? Not at all. Every one of them voted for annexation. The election came round a few months afterwards, and they were all turned out, but what did those care for that, who had the benefit of their votes? Such agencies, or if it be proper to call them instrumentalities, maintain respect no longer than they continue to be useful.

Sir, we take New Mexico and California. Who is weak enough to think that there is an end? Why, do we not hear it avowed every day, that it is proper for us also to take Sonora and Tamaulipas, and other provinces or States of northern Mexico? Who thinks that the hunger for dominion will stop here of itself? Somebody has said that this acquisition is so mean and lean, and unsatisfactory, that we shall seek no further. In my judgment, sir, you may believe that, if you can believe that a rapacious animal that has made one unproductive foray won't try for a better! But further there are some things that we can argue against with temper, and submit to, if over-ruled, without mortification. There are other things that seem to affect one's consciousness of being a reasonable man, and evince a disposition to impose upon his common sense. And of this class of topics or pretensions, I have never heard of anything, and cannot conceive of anything more ridiculous in itself, more absurd, and more affrontive to all sober judgment, than the cry that we are getting indemnity. Indemnity by the acquisition of New Mexico and California! I hold them not to be worth a dollar, and we pay for them a vast sum of money. We have expended, as everybody knows, large treasures in the prosecution of the war, and now what is there to constitute indemnity? What do gentlemen mean by it? Let us see how this matter stands! We get a country. We get a country in the first instance, either by cession or acknowledgment of boundary—I care not which way you state it—the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. What this country is appears from a publication of an honorable gentleman in the other house, in which he quotes an account given by Major Gaines. He says that the country is worth nothing; that he would not hazard the life of a single individual for every foot of land from San Patricio to the valley of the Rio Grande. This gentleman has been there lately, and is well acquainted with the condition of the country. So far then as that part of our acquisition is concerned, I take it for granted it is not worth a dollar.

Now, of New Mexico. Of that forty-nine fiftieths, at least, is a mere barren waste of desert plain or mountain. There is no wood, no timber—little fagots to light a fire are carried thirty or forty miles on mules. There is no natural fall of rains as in temperate climates. The place and scene are Asiatic—enormously high mountains, running up some to the height of ten thousan i feet, with very narrow valleys at their bases, through which streams sometimes trickle along—a carter winds along, through the thread of white sand in the Rio Grande from afar in the Rocky mountains down to the latitude of about thirty three degrees, some three or four hundred miles. There these sixty thousand persons are. In the mountains, on the right and the left are streams whose natural tendencies would be as lateral streams to flow into the Rio Grande, and in certain seasons of the year, when the rains have been abundant in the mountains, some of them do actually reach the Rio Grande, but the greater part of them, always—and all of them for a greater part of the year, never reach an outlet to the sea. They are absorded in the sandy and desert plains of the country. There is no culture anywhere, save that which can be obtained by artificial watering or irrigation. You can have this along the narrow valley of the Rio Grande, in the gorges of the mountains, where the streams are; but you cannot have it down along the course of those streams that lose themselves in the sands.

Now, sir, there is no public domain in New Mexico. There is not a foot of land to be sold by the government. There is not an acre that will become ours when the country becomes ours—not an acre. But, more than this, the country is full of people, such as they are. There is not the least thing in it to invite the settlement of our planters or farmers. There will go, I dare say, speculators, traders, some of them adventurers, tired of the good country in the valley of the Missippi, who desire to better it. I undertake to say there will not be two hundred farmers or planters from the United States in New Mexico in the next fifty years. They cannot live there. Do you suppose they are going to cultivate lands which cannot be made productive in the slightest degree without irrigation? The people that are there produce little and live upon little. I believe the characteristic of our farmers throughout this country is to produce a good deal and consume a good deal. Again, New Mexico is not like Texas. I had hoped, and still hope, that Texas is to be filled up by a population like ourselves—not by the Spanish race—not by peons—not by coarse, ignorant, vulgar landlords, with tribes of slaves around them, predial and otherwise!

Mr. RUSK.—Will the honorable Senator allow me one word? I did not like to interrupt the Senator when he was reading an account of the country lying in the valley of the Nueces. When that country comes to be known, it will be found to be as valuable as any portion of Texas. From its source to its mouth, the valley of the Rio Grande will be found the same thing. I did not choose to interrupt the honorable Senator, but we do not claim it as indemnity, believing it to be our just and equitable right. So far as Mexican population is concerned, there is a good deal of it now in Texas, highly respectable, and amongst them those who have distinguished themselves as patriots, men of intelligence and of worth. These are coming over and settling in Texas, encouraged by the prospet of peace.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I take what I say in regard to the valley of the Rio Grande, from the statement of Major Gaines. I am glad to hear that there is a part of it fit for the foot of civilized man. I am glad to hear, also, that there are some of the inhabitants of New Mexico, who are not so besotted with their miserable condition, as not to make some effort to get out of the country, and to come into a better.

Sir, I would, if I had time, call the attention of the Senate to a very instructive speech, that was made in the other House by Mr. Smith, of Connecticut. He seems to have examined all our authorities, conversed with all our travellers, corresponded with all our agents. His speech contains all their communications, and I commend it to every man in the United States, who wishes to know what we are about to acquire by the acquisition of New Mexico. New Mexico is secluded, isolated—a place by itself—in the middle of the mountains—five hundred miles, I believe, from Texas.

Mr. RUSK.—Five hundred miles from the settled portions of Texas.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Farther from any where else! It does not belong anywhere. It has no belongings about it. Sir, at this moment, it is absolutely more retired, and shut out from communication with the civilized world, than the Sandwich Islands, or most of the islands in the Pacific ocean. It presses hard on Tyree, and the people are infinitely less elevated in mind and condition, than the people of the Sandwich Islands—far less worthy of our association—far less fit to send their Senators here, than are the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands—far less worthy are they than the better classes of Indians in our neighborhood. Commend me to the Cherokees, the Choctaws—if you please, to speak of the Pawnees, the Blackfeet and the Snake Indians, and the Flatheads—anything except the "Digger" Indians, and I am satisfied with them, instead of the people of New Mexico. They have no notion of our institutions, or of any free institutions. They, any notion of popular government! Why, not the slightest—not the slightest on earth. And the question is asked, what will be their constitution? It is farcical to talk of such a people making a constitution. They do not know the meaning of the term. They do not know its import; they know nothing at all about it. And I can tell you, sir, that when we have made it a territory, and wish to make it a State, such a constitution as the Executive power of this government thinks fit to send to them, will be sent and adopted. The constitution of our fellow-citizens of New Mexico will be framed in the city of Washington. Now, what says Col. Hardin, in regard to New Mexico—that most lamented and distinguished officer, whom I well knew as a member of the other House, and whose death I did most deeply deplore? He gives a description of New Mexico, and speaks of the people of that country in these terms:

"The people are on a par with their land. One in 200 or 500 is rich, and lives like a nabob, the rest are peons, or servants sold for debt, who work for their masters, and are as subservient as the slaves of the South, and look like Indians; and, indeed, are not more capable of self-government. One man, Jacobus Sanchez, owns three-fourths of all the land our column has passed over in Mexico. We are told we have seen the best part of Northern Mexico; if so, the whole of it is not worth much."

I need not read the whole extract. He speaks of all Northern Mexico, and New Mexico is not the better part of it. Sir, there is a recent traveller, who is not unfriendly to the United States, if I may judge from his works, for he commends us everywhere. He is an Englishman, and his name is RUXTON. I believe his work is in the library, and I suppose that gentlemen have seen it. He gives an account of the morals and manners of these people; and Mr. President, and Senators, I will take leave to introduce you to these, your soon-to-be respected fellow-citizens of New Mexico:

"It is remarkable that although existing from the earliest times of the colonization of New Mexico, a period of two centuries, in a state of continual hostility with the numerous savage tribes of Indians who surrounded their territory, and in constant insecurity of life and property from their attacks, being also far removed from the enervating influences of large cities, and in their isolated situation entirely dependent on their own resources, the inhabitants are totally destitute of those qualities which, for the above reasons, we might naturally have expected to distinguish them, and are as deficient in energy of character and physical courage, as they are in all the moral and intellectual qualities. In their social state—but one degree removed from the veriest savages, they might take lessons even from these in morality and the conventional decencies of life. Imposing no restraint on their passions, a shameless and universal concubinage exists, and a total disregard of moral laws, to which it would be impossible to find a parallel in any country calling itself civilized. A want of honorable principle, and consummate duplicity and treachery, characterize all their dealings. Liars by nature, they are treacherous and faithless to their friends, cowardly and cringing to their enemies; cruel, as all cowards are, they unite savage ferocity with their want of animal courage; as an example of which, their recent massacre of Governor Bent, and other Americans, may be given—one of a hundred instances."

"One out of a hundred instances;" and these are soon to be our beloved countrymen!

Mr. President, for a good many years I have struggled to oppose every thing that I thought tended to strengthen the arm of Executive power. I think it is growing more and more formidable every day; and I think that in yielding to it in this as in other instances, will give it strength, which it may be hereafter very difficult to resist. I think it is nothing else than fear of Executive power that commits us to the support of this war for the acquisition of territory,—fear—fear—and nothing else. In the little part I have acted in public life, it has been my purpose to preserve the people of the United States—what the constitution was designed to make them—our people—one in interest—one in character—one in political feeling. When we depart from that we break it all up. What sympathy can there be between these New Mexicans, these Californians, and the inhabitants of the valley of the Mississippi or of the middle States, or of the eastern States in the choice of President? Do they know the same men? Have they any general consentaneous sentiment? Not at all. An arbitrary government may have territorial governments in distant possessions, because an arbitrary government may rule its distant territories by different laws and different systems. Russia may govern the Ukraine and the Caucasus and Kamschatka by different codes or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us—part of us—or else estranged. I think I see, then, in progress what is to disfigure and deform the constitution. While these territories remain territories they will be troublesome and annoying. They will draw after them a vast expense. It will probably require as many troops on an average as we have been in the habit of maintaining for the last twenty years, to defend these territories from the Indian tribes. We must maintain an army at that distance, and when they become States they are still more likely to give us more trouble than benefit. I think I see a course adopted that is likely to turn the constitution under which we live into a deformed monster—into a curse rather than a blessing—into a great frame of unequal government, not founded on popular representation, but founded in the grossest inequalities; and, I think, if it go on—for there is danger that it will go on—that this government will be broken up. I resist it to-day, and always—whoever falters or whoever flies, I resist—although I see that all the portents are discouraging. Would to God I could auspicate good influences! Would to God that those who think with me on this subject had stronger support. Would that we could stand where we would desire to stand! But with few or alone my position is fixed. If there were time I would gladly awaken the country. I believe the country will be awakened—it may be too late—but by the blessing of God, supported or unsupported, I shall do my duty. I see well enough all the sinister indications, but I am sustained by a deep and conscientious sense of duty, and while supported by that feeling of duty, and while such great interests are at stake, I shall defy all augury, and ask no omen but my country's cause!

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after sometime spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1848.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF TEXAS.
